'Oh Mother! Don't do anything that will scar the great reputation of our honourable family and create a situation that will give nothing but ignominy. Keep aside emotions, stop wailing and being sentimental for this is not the time for these things. (Chanda line no. 1)

Whatever is written in my fate, sorrow or happiness, I will get it wherever I go. [Even if you become stubborn and force me to retract from my vows of marrying Shiva in the hope that you will marry me to someone else where I will find happiness, you are sadly mistaken because if my destiny ordains sorrows and sufferings for me I will have to face them and endure them no matter where I go. Even if you keep me unmarried, I will still have to suffer. So please act wisely and abandon this childishness that you are showing now.]<sup>1</sup>' (Chanda line no. 2)

When all the assembled women heard these polite and pleasant words of Uma (Parvati)--- (Chanda line no. 3)

---all of them blamed the Creator in various ways (that he is accustomed to creating confusing by making the world full of oddities, ironies and paradoxes)<sup>2</sup> even as tears (of grief and sympathy for her) flowed from their eyes. (Chanda line no. 4)

At that time, the king known as “Tuhin-giri” (i.e. Himwaan) went to his home (where Parvati was trying to pacify her agitated mother) along with sage Narad and the Sapta-rishis. (Doha no. 97)

[Note—The king was very wise. He brought along with him all the sages who were involved in this episode: (i) Narad because he was the one who had been instrumental in motivating Parvati to do Tapa for Shiva, and because he was accused both by the Sapta-rishis as well as by Parvati’s mother of ruining her future, and (ii) the Sapta-rishis because they had tried to detract Parvati on two occasions by trying to persuade her to abandon her vows of marrying Lord Shiva, and giving the general impression that Narad always throws a spanner in the future happiness of a person by giving a wrong advice.

He did this to clear the air and remove all traces of doubts in the mind of his daughter as well as her mother. When Narad and the Sapta-rishis would stand shoulder-to-shoulder in a friendly manner and explain things up front, all confusions and consternations would be dispelled. It is necessary to do it because otherwise both Parvati and her mother would harbour ill-will towards these great and holy sages who were honourable and had no ill-intention to run the future of Parvati. They were just doing their duties as best as they could.

Narad would get a chance to explain why he had suggested Lord Shiva as the possible groom for Parvati (refer: Doha no. 98 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8 and Chanda line nos. 1-4).

The Sapta-rishis would get a chance to signal that whatever they had said about Narad was part of a strategy to test Parvati’s devotion for Shiva and her sincerity, and they had not actually meant to decry Narad or deride Narad’s character. It was just a part of the test that they were asked to conduct by Lord Shiva himself.]

Then Narad reassured everyone (that there was no wrong-doing on his part by advising Parvati to do Tapa to have Lord Shiva as her husband, and that everything will be okay) by telling them the story of the previous life of Parvati<sup>1</sup>. (1)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This story has been narrated earlier in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 48—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 75.

Narad told the entire story to defend himself before everyone and to tell them the reason why he had given Parvati the advice which he did, because it was he who had motivated her to do Tapa to obtain Lord Shiva as her husband in the first place, and in the second place because the Sapta-rishis as well as Parvati's mother Maina have openly accused him of malfeasance and misusing his stature as a great sage on whom every one relies by giving a wrong advice to Parvati and her parents which has resulted in so much consternation and turmoil in their lives.]

ajā anādi sakti abināsini. sadā sambhu aradhaṅga nivāsini. 3.
jaga sambhava pālana laya kārini. nija icchā līlā bapu dhārini. 4.

Extolling the divine nature of Parvati, Narad said to Maina, her mother—‘Listen to my truthful words<sup>1</sup> Maina. Your daughter is no ordinary girl; she is the Mother of the Universe or the living world (“Jagdamba”) and is universally known as “Bhavaani”, the eternal consort of Lord Bhava (which is one of the many names of Lord Shiva)<sup>2</sup>. (2)

She is the ‘Shakti’ (cosmic Energy, Power and Authority) that is ‘Aja’ (an entity that is without a birth; an entity that simply ‘reveals or manifests’ without undergoing the usual process of coming into being or getting born like ordinary living beings), that is is ‘Anaadi’ (an entity without a beginning and an end; an entity that is eternal), and is ‘Avinaashi’ (that which is imperishable and not subject to decay)<sup>3</sup>.

She occupies an eternal place by the side of Lord Shiva as his divine consort, and is an inseparable half of the Lord<sup>4</sup>. (3)

It is she, as the cosmic Mother of creation, who has made it possible for the world to come into being. She is originator, the sustainer and care-taker, and the final concluder of this creation. She takes a form as she wishes (and no one is responsible for it)<sup>5</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 68 that also reiterates the fact that Narad never speaks a lie.

<sup>2</sup>Even the Sapta-rishis have praised Parvati by honouring her with this title of being a “Jagdamba”, as well as the fact that she is the eternal companion of Lord Shiva in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 81 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 8.

The word “Shakti” means ‘power and authority’. Here the word alludes to the metaphysical concept of creation and its regulation by Brahm, the Supreme Being, who uses his cosmic dynamic powers to control it. Brahm himself does not physically involve in any activity, but employs his power and authority to carry out his wishes just like an emperor who does not do anything personally, physically, but employs his powers and authority as an emperor to get thing done as he wishes them to be done.

<sup>4</sup>The power and authority of Brahm, and the dynamic energy needed to carry out his wishes are represented by Brahm’s “Shakti”. Shakti is as indispensable for Brahm as an emperor’s power and authority is for him. This fact is metaphorically and iconographically depicted in the form of Shakti being the consort of Brahm, or Parvati being the inseparable half of Shiva.

Here, the cosmic “Shakti” (dynamism, power, energy and authority) of “Brahm” (the Supreme Being and the cosmic Lord of creation), and “Brahm” himself have been personified in the form of ‘Parvati’ and ‘Shiva’ respectively.

<sup>5</sup>This is because of what has been said in Chaupai line no. 3—viz. she is ‘without a birth’, she is ‘eternal’, she is ‘imperishable’. These virtues preclude her taking a physical birth with a gross body in the usual manner in which ordinary mortal creatures are born by the process of conception in a mother’s womb. She just ‘reveals or manifests’ herself like fire and wind elements.]

In her previous life she went and took birth<sup>1</sup> in the household of Daksha as his daughter named “Sati” who had a beautiful form. (5)

Even in that birth as Sati, she was married to Lord Shiva. This story is world-famous (and therefore I am not cooking-up any cock-and-bull imaginary story to justify my actions or to mislead you). (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The wording is perfect; it endorses what has already been said in verse nos. 3-4 herein above. The cosmic Shakti went and revealed it's self in a physical form which the world recognised as the 'birth of a daughter of Daksha Prajaapti'. In that manifestation of Shakti, her father named her Sati in accordance with the convention amongst all the living beings who assign a name to their sons and daughters. Like in the present case where revelation of Shakti as "Parvati" has not been recognised by anyone around her, "Sati's" true form was also unknown to her father Daksha in the previous case.]

Unfortunately, Sati was overcome with delusions (and thought that Lord Ram was an ordinary human prince)<sup>4</sup>. Lord Shiva tried his best to overcome Sati's doubts and delusions about Lord Ram (by trying to convince her that what she thinks of Lord Ram is not correct, and that she should banish such irreverent and impertinent thoughts from her mind)<sup>5</sup>, but she wouldn't listen to his advice<sup>6</sup>.

She was so overcome with delusions and its accompanying doubts that she (did not believe what Shiva had said and therefore) assumed the form of Sita (Lord Ram's wife) (in order to verify Shiva's assertions about Lord Ram and to ascertain the Lord's divinity by testing him personally)<sup>7</sup>. Lord Shankar (Shiva) had then discarded Sati for the sin she had committed by assuming the form of Sita (because Lord Shiva worshipped Sita's husband Lord Ram as his revered deity and honourable Lord God, and Sati had violated all norms of ethical behaviour, known as "Dharma", by assuming the form of another person's wife, and that too of Lord Ram in order to test his integrity)<sup>1</sup>. (Chanda line no. 1)

Sati was overcome with immense sorrow and grief arising out of Shiva abandoning her, and she then went and burnt herself in the fire during the religious sacrifice of her father (Daksha)<sup>2</sup>. (Chanda line no. 2)

Now she has taken a birth in your (Maina's) home, and she has done a severe Tapa for her own husband<sup>3</sup>. (Chanda line no. 3)

Understand this situation, and realising the fact of the matter you must abandon doubts of every kind, and harbour no consternations of any kind whatsoever. Understand the fact that "Girijaa" (literally, the daughter of Giri, the king of the mountains) is eternally dear to Lord Shankar (Shiva) and is the Lord's eternal beloved consort.<sup>4</sup> (Chanda line no. 4)

*Hearing the reassuring words of sage Narad, all the grief and sorrow that had been overwhelming everyone till now were dispelled (immediately)<sup>1</sup>.

In a moment this news spread like a wild-fire throughout the city, and every household became aware of it. (Doha no. 98)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The family members of Parvati as well as the citizens of the kingdom of the mountains had thought that Narad had misled Parvati and given her a wrong advice—that she should do Tapa to get a crazy husband like Shiva appeared to be when one limited his vision to the Lord's external form and features. But now they became aware of Parvati's true identity as being the cosmic "Shakti" and the eternal consort of Shiva. Hence, it will be actually wrong on her part to marry someone else, especially when she had asked the Lord God, at the time of her death, to grant her the boon that in whatever life-form she is born she should have unwavering devotion and love for Lord Shiva and be able to serve the Lord—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 65.

An important observation is to be made here. Till now everyone doubted Narad; even the seven Sapta-rishis had openly accused him of giving a wrong advice to Parvati to do Tapa for Shiva—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Doha no. 78—to Doha no. 79. Then how come suddenly they all began to trust him now?

The answer is obvious: Narad has now revealed the past of Parvati in the presence of the Sapta-rishis, which means they are upholding the truth of what he says, they stand witness to his statement. He hadn't done it earlier, which was the reason why doubts existed in everyone's mind. No one knew who Parvati actually was, that she had herself chosen to be eternally devoted to Lord Shiva even before she took birth in the present form as the daughter of Himwaan and Maina. So this clarification by Narad settled the dust and made everyone happy.

*According to "Shiva Puran", 2/3/8/29-48, Narad had explained these things to Himaachal, the father of Parvati, in the very beginning, which is perhaps the reason why he was calm and convinced throughout.]

[The revelations of Narad had a profound and stunning affect on everyone so much so that besides erupting in joy at the thought that they are lucky to have the cosmic

Shakti of the Supreme Being amongst them in a living form as their beloved princess and loving daughter by the name of Parvati, the parents felt obliged to worship Parvati's feet as a token of showing respect to the 'living goddess' and thanking her for choosing them to be her parents.]

Then, Maina and Himwant were overjoyed with delight. They repeatedly worshipped the holy feet of Parvati (because they now realised that she is not their daughter in the conventional sense, but was the cosmic Shakti who has given them the rarest of rare privilege to become her 'parents' when she decided to reveal herself in their household as the living goddess by the name of Parvati). [Not only Parvati's parents, but the entire city erupted in joy.]

All the citizens of the city, whether they were women, men, children or adults, all of them were very jubilant and exhilarated. (2)

Auspicious songs were sung, and their accompanying music began playing in the entire city. Everyone decorated their homes and home-fronts by putting up decorated golden pitchers (or vases) and other paraphernalia. (3)

[Note—A moment ago there was all-encompassing gloom, dejection and despair. But the tide turned all of a sudden, and cheer rang out through the length and the breath of the city as soon as the news spread of what Narad had said.

We observe a similar development unravelling itself in relation to Lord Ram's marriage with Sita. Sita's marriage was centered on a vow made by her father, king Janak, that anyone who would break a bow known as "Pinak" would marry her. A huge congregation was arranged where all the mighty kings and princes of the time had assembled to try their luck. But no one could as much as move the bow, let alone lifting it and breaking it. Even Janak had declared that Sita will have to remain unmarried for life. Obviously this was bad news for all, and a thick pall of gloom and despair descended upon the city of Janakpur. Then as it happened, Lord Ram broke the bow, and as soon as the bow broke the city erupted in a thunder of cheer and joy. These developments have been elaborately narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Doha no. 249—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 265.]

baiṭhē siva bipranha siru nāī. hrdayam sumiri nija prabhu raghurāī. 4.

There was a magnificent and divinely beautiful throne which was so fabulous and wonderful to look at that it is not possible to describe its majestic sight, its glamour and its charm. It appeared to have been made by ‘Biranchi’ (the creator Brahma) himself (especially for this occasion).[That is, the throne on which the groom was to be seated was exceptionally fabulous and grand so much so that it appeared that the creator had designed and moulded it himself with his expert hands and employing his skills as an expert craftsman.] (3)

On this remarkable throne sat Lord Shiva after he had customarily bowed his head before the Brahmins and other elders of the society (“Vipra”)<sup>1</sup>, and had remembered (his dear and revered) Lord Ram in his heart<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Paying one’s respects to elders and the learned Brahmins is a tradition from ancient times. It is observed at the beginning and the end of any function. If the Brahmins and other elders are present personally, then one actually lowers one’s head before them as a gesture of respect, and if they are not physically there then this is done mentally.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Ram is the Lord God and the most beloved deity of Lord Shiva. It is Lord Ram’s holy name “RAM” that Shiva uses as a tool during meditation, employing it as a sacred Mantra or spiritual formula.

So, when he stepped on the throne kept reserved for him, he paid his respects to the elders represented by the Brahmins by bowing before them, and to his beloved deity and Lord, Sri Ram, by remembering him in his heart.

When Lord Ram had arrived at the marriage pavilion, he was also seated on a specially earmarked throne—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 319.]

dēkhata rūpu sakala sura mōhē. baranai chabi asa jaga kabi kō hai. 6.

Once Shiva (the bridegroom) was seated, the sages (who were conducting the marriage rituals) called for Uma (the bride) to be brought in. Uma’s companions adorned her in the finest of ornaments in the best of finery and brought her (to the marriage pavilion)<sup>1</sup>. (5)

She looked so pretty, glamorous and majestic that the gods were overwhelmed by her charm and majesty. Indeed, who is so competent in this world so as to be able to describe the fabulous image of Uma (who was the Mother of the Universe or the entire living world; a personified form of Mother Nature whose beauty is beyond the abilities of humans to describe in words that have limited scope)<sup>2</sup>. (6) jagadambikā jāni bhava bhāmā. suranha manahim mana kīnha pranāmā. 7.

sundaratā marajāda bhavānī. jā'i na kōṭihum' badana bakhānī. 8.

Realising that she was the Mother of the Universe or the entire living world (“jagadambikā”)<sup>1</sup>, and the eternal divine consort of Lord Bhava (i.e. Lord Shiva, who was a “Mahadeva”: the Great God who was senior to all the gods taken together)<sup>2</sup>, all the assembled gods paid their obeisance to her by mentally bowing their heads before her<sup>3</sup>. (7)

Bhavaani (the consort of Bhava) was so beautiful and charming to behold that she represented the bench-mark by which one measures the virtues of beauty, prettiness and loveliness. There was no one who was more pretty and lovely than her in this world. It is not possible even by millions of tongues attempting to describe her glamorous appearance and her charming image to be ever able to do so.<sup>4</sup> (8)

*Even by millions of tongues it is not at all possible to describe the great beauty and exceptional charm of the form of the Mother of the Universe or the entire living world. (Chanda line no. 1)

Who is the dim-witted Tulsidas (the narrator of this epic story called Ram Charit Manas) when even such great orators as the Sruti (the Vedas), the Sesh (the legendary serpent with a thousand head and equal number of tongues) and goddess Saarda (goddess Saraswati, the patron goddess of speech, language and learning) are unable to do so. [In other words, when such experts with words and languages as the (a) 'scriptures' who were able to put into words all that could be said and explained, (b) the 'Sesh' who has thousands of tongues, and (c) even the patron goddess of speech, learning and languages, goddess Saraswati, fail to even give an idea of how glamorous and magnificent Uma looked during that time, how is it therefore possible for Tulsidas, who is a mere mortal human being, to ever scratch even the surface of such description?]<sup>1</sup> (Chanda line no. 2)

Mother Bhavaani (Parvati, or Uma), who was an embodiment of beauty, majesty and glamour, went to the center of the pavilion where Lord Shiva was already seated. (Chanda line no. 3)

She was hesitant to look directly at her eternal husband, so her mind was fixed on the lotus-like feet of Lord Shiva<sup>2</sup> just like a bee fixes its attention on the lotus flower. (Chanda line no. 4)

[Note—*Refer also to "Parvati Mangal, verse nos. 123—126.

<sup>1</sup>This is a standard method and a figure of speech adopted by Tulsidas when he wishes to restrain himself from describing some scene because he feels that his description would never do justice to the actual sight because of the limitations that a language and its words inherently have.

A typical example is found in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 318 where Tulsidas says that no attempt to describe the delight that was felt by Sita's mother when she saw Lord Ram as a bridegroom can be successful even if thousands of Saarda and Sesh try to do it in seven Kalpas—or virtually countless numbers of years.

Besides this, Tulsidas has clearly stated in Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 103 that "he will refrain from narrating or describing the glamour of Lord Shiva and his divine consort Bhavaani because they are the Father and the Mother of this entire creation or the whole living world (and hence it would be indecent, rude, imprudent and impertinent for him to do so)."

<sup>2</sup>A similar situation is described on different occasion with respect to Lord Ram and Sita in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand where we read that Sita too had felt shy from looking directly at her beloved Lord, Sri Ram. Some of the instances are the following: (i) Chanda line no. 13 that precedes Doha no. 325; (ii) Doha no. 326; (iii) Chanda line nos. 9-10 that precede Doha no. 327; and (iv) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 264.

The reason for such hesitation on part of Sita is explained by Tulsidas in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 248 which essentially mean that though Sita longed to look unblinkingly at Lord Ram yet she refrained from doing so because it would look very indecent and impolite for her to do so in the midst of an assembly where all the elders of the society were present and closely watching her every move.]

दो०. मुनि अनुसासन गनपतिहि पूजेउ संभु भवानि ।

muni anusāsana ganapatihi pūjē'u sambhu bhavāni.
kō'u suni sansaya karai jani sura anādi jiyam̐ jāni. 100.

Receiving instructions from the sages who were conducting the rituals, Lord Shambhu (Shiva) and Bhavaani (Parvati or Uma) together worshipped Lord Ganpati (Ganesh).

Let no one express incredulity at this (i.e. at Shiva and Parvati worshipping Ganesh) because the Gods are immortal and eternal<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 100)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Ganesh is worshipped in the beginning of any religious event; his worship is obligatory for success in any endeavour. Now the paradox is that Ganesh is a son of Shiva and Parvati, and therefore it looks absurd and unbelievable that he is worshipped by his own parents.

This apparent paradox and unconventional thing is answered in the 2nd line of this Doha which asserts that the gods are eternal and immortal, and therefore they do not take a birth again to become a son or daughter of someone. They are always present, the only thing is that at some point of time they become visible and at another point of time they are not.

Besides this, they have to conform to the law of Nature which says that everything that has a physical existence must come to an end. So therefore, these eternal and immortal gods exist in a subtle and sublime form as the 'Soul' that has no physical form or a gross body till the time they are required to assume one such form according to the exigencies of the situation. So is the case with Lord Ganesh. He is an eternal God who took the physical form as the son of Shiva and Parvati when it was required of him to do so.

Shiva and Parvati were not worshipping their 'son' here, but a symbolic form of the Supreme God who is eternal, and is revered by all the gods and worshipped at the beginning of any religious ceremony as one of the divine forms of Brahm, the cosmic form of the Supreme Being.

It is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chanda line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 323 that Lord Ganesh was worshipped at the beginning of the marriage rituals of Lord Ram and Sita.

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 323 where we read that during the marriage ceremony of Lord Ram with Sita, the priests had performed similar rites in accordance to established tradition.

Refer also to “Parvati Mangal”, verse nos. 130-132 where Tulsidas has narrated the different steps of the marriage ritual in detail. These steps are narrated herein below also in Chaupai line nos. 2-3 in brief.]

gahi girīsa kusa kan'yā pānī. bhavahi samarapīm jāni bhavānī. 2.
pānigrahana jaba kīnha mahēsā. hiyaṁ haraṣē taba sakala surēsā. 3.

Girish (the king of the mountains and the father of the bride) held in his hands some blades of the Kush grass (which is dark in colour, thin, quite hard, straight and pointed at the end, and is used in all religious ceremonies), a little water, and the hands of his daughter Bhavaani, and then formally handed her over to Lord Bhava with the realisation that she was the eternal consort of the Lord<sup>1</sup>. (2)

When Lord Mahesh (Shiva) formally accepted the hand of the bride by virtue of the ritual known as “Paani-Grahan<sup>2</sup>”, all the gods felt exhilarated in their hearts<sup>3</sup>. (3)

<sup>2</sup>The word “Paan-Grahan” has two parts—viz. (i) “Paani” which means ‘water’, and “Grahan” which means ‘to accept’. It’s a ritual whereby the bride’s father formally transfers the responsibility of his daughter to the groom, and the latter accepts it. The finer meaning of this ritual is that the father of the girl who had been taking care of her till now, formally transfers this responsibility of her safety, happiness and well-being to the groom who pledges to carry out his duty faithfully and diligently for the rest of his life. This promise is made in front of the sacred fire as witness as well as the assembly of guests who attend the ceremony. Going back on this pledge is regarded as a great sin.

When the marriage rituals of Lord Ram were being performed, a similar process of Paani Grahan was done, and a similar exhilaration amongst the gods is observed—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 324 along with Chanda line nos. 10-12 that precede it.]

The sages chanted the Mantras (sacred verses) from the Vedas even as the gods applauded in chorus, repeatedly hailing Lord Shiva and his glories by loudly exclaiming—‘Glory to Lord Shiva; Glory to him; Hail him and his glories!’ (4)

Different kinds of musical instruments were played in a variety of ways; flowers were showered from the sky (heaven) (to celebrate the occasion)<sup>1</sup>. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 324 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 7 where we read a similar chanting of the Vedas, playing of musical instruments, and showering of the flowers during the marriage rituals of Lord Ram.

Refer also to “Parvati Mangal”, Chanda no. 15 which also describes this celebration.]

हर गिरिजा कर भयउ बिबाहू । सकल भुवन भरि रहा उछाहू ॥ ६ ॥

hara girijā kara bhaya'u bibāhū. sakala bhuvana bhari rahā uchāhū. 6.

[Note—*Refer: “Parvati Mangal”, verse nos. 132, 147.

<sup>1</sup>The word “Girija” has two meanings. It means (i) “the one who was born to the king of the mountains”; and (ii) “the one who was born in the lap of the mountains”. When we look at this story from worldly perspective where a man understands everything only from a gross physical angle, the first meaning applies. When we broaden our view to look at it from a subtler angle that relates to the universe and Nature, the second meaning applies.

Now the question is: which view, which perspective, which understanding is better and appropriate to be applied here? The answer is found in the word “Bhuvan”. This word means the universe as a whole, because the entire living creation is divided into 14 Bhuvans or segments, one of which is the world we live in. This cosmic view of Lord Shiva and his union with the cosmic Shakti fits in well with what Narad has said in Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 98 herein above. It refers to Lord Shiva as the Supreme Lord of creation, the Maha-deva, the ‘Great God’, and Parvati as the Mother of the Universe.

Refer: “Parvati Mangal”, line no. 1 of Chanda no. 15 where it is said that there was joy in all the ‘ten directions’ of the world (“Dasa-Dishaa”).

Though two different terms, viz. “Bhuvan or world” and “Dishaa or directions”, have been employed in these two separate instances, they essentially mean the same thing. The idea that is being conveyed is that when Lord Shiva and Parvati were united, there was celebration through the length and breadth of this creation. Everyone rejoiced in every corner of the world, whether it was in the heaven or the earth or the nether world, or whether one lived in the north, the east, the south or the west in any of the worlds.]

---Cereals and pulses, as well as golden utensils etc. were given as marriage gift by the cart-load by the father of Parvati. These gifts were so large and of such huge quantity that one is not able to describe them. (8)

[Note—Refer: “Parvati Mangal”, line nos. 3-4 of Chanda no. 15.

Sita's father, king Janak, too had given Lord Ram cart-loads of such marriage gifts as narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 2-7 that precede Doha no. 326; (ii) Doha no. 333 along with Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede it, and Chaupai line no. 1 that follow it.]

Himwaan gave an abundance of marriage gifts. Then he respectfully joined his palms and stood before Lord Shiva. He said—(Chanda line no. 1)

‘Oh Lord Shankar, what can I give you? You have everything at your disposal in this creation, and there is nothing that you want.’ Saying this, and unable to say anything more (as he was overwhelmed with emotions), Himwaan reverentially clasped the holy feet of Lord Shiva*<sup>1</sup>. (Chanda line no. 2)

Lord Shiva, who is an ocean of grace, mercy and kindness, reassured and comforted his father-in-law (Himwaan) in every possible way. [The Lord assured Himwaan that he need not worry at all for he understood the latter's emotions as well as his affection for him.]<sup>2</sup>. (Chanda line no. 3)

After Himwaan, Maina (Parvati's mother) went and clasped the holy feet of the Lord with her heart overflowing with love and affection (for her son-in-law, Lord Shiva)<sup>3</sup>. (Chanda line no. 4)

[Note—*Himwaan's throat was choked with emotions, and words refused to come out of his mouth. He felt so privileged and honoured to have Lord Shiva as his son-in-law just like king Dasrath felt when his daughter Sita was married to Lord Ram—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 341 along with its Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede it, and Chaupai line no. 1 that follow it.

The marriage gifts which Himwaan gave were inconsequential in view of the majesty and lordship of Shiva who was the Lord of the whole world. But these gifts were to be necessarily given because it was an established tradition, and they were therefore a mere formality. They were not intended for showing off Himwaan grandeur or wealth, or to imply that Shiva needs these worldly articles of comfort because everyone knew that Shiva was an ascetic and lives in Mt. Kailash which is covered by snow the whole year round. These marriage gifts were merely a gesture of thanksgiving and gratitude on the part of Himwaan to express his appreciation of the eternal bond of marriage that was now established between Lord Shiva and his daughter Parvati.

By this humble gesture Himwaan requested Lord Shiva to overlook any shortcomings in these gifts because the Lord lacks nothing. These gifts had to be given as much to conform to tradition as to express Himwaan's token of thanksgiving and gratitude towards the Lord for accepting the hands of his daughter Parvati in marriage, but he did not intend to show-off his wealth.

Further on we read that king Janak, the father of Sita, has expressed his intense love and gratitude for Lord Ram in the same way as Himwaan has done for Lord Shiva here. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 341—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 342.

Now, the question arises: did Janak touch the holy feet of Lord Ram, who was an incarnate Supreme Being, with the same reverence as Himwaan has done here with respect to Lord Shiva? The answer is "yes", he definitely did. He not only clasped but had worshipped Lord Ram's feet with the greatest of respect at his command—this is evident in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chanda line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 324.

Thus we observe that the occasions were different, but the essence was the same.

Maina advised her daughter—‘Always worship the feet of (your husband) Lord Shiva. (Remember that—) For a woman, her husband is like a revered god, and no other god is more respectable for her than her husband<sup>1</sup>.’ (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A similar advice was given to Sita, the wife of Lord Ram, on three occasions. (i) The first was by her mother who had made Sita sit on her lap affectionately as she gave her the same advice as Maina has done to Parvati—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-6 that precede Doha no. 334.

(ii) The second occasion was when her father king Janak had advised her at the time of her departure of the marriage party from Janakpur for Ayodhya—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 339.

(iii) And the third occasion was in the forest where Anusuiya, the wife of sage Atri, has explained the code of conduct for a wise wife—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Sortha/Doha no. 5 and its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-19.]

Maina's eyes were filled with tears as she spoke to Parvati. She once again embraced her beloved daughter<sup>1</sup>. (4)

Say, why has the Creator written a destiny for a woman whereby she has to remain dependent upon others, and in this situation she can never dream of happiness that comes with freedom?<sup>2</sup> (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 334 where we read a similar narration with respect to Sita's mother showing her love for her daughter and lamenting at the compulsion that a woman has to face just prior to her departure from her parental home for the home of her husband, Lord Ram.

<sup>2</sup>The woman in a traditional household is supposed to rely on her husband for all her needs. This means she is not independent. Lack of independence robs a woman of her chance to enjoy the world and the life in it like a free person, because she has to take into account the preferences of her husband.

The main thrust of this statement is that after marriage, it is the girl who has to suffer the most as she is compelled to abandon the freedom that she enjoyed in her home where she was born and brought up to go to her husband's home which is alien to her, and where she will be bound by its customs and traditions that are new to her. It is a virtual new life for her. She has to make a lot of sacrifices and adjustments in her personal life in order to fit in the new environment. The boy has no such compulsion because he does not have to leave his home and hearth after marriage.]

The mother became very agitated due to surging emotions of love and affection for her daughter (because she was soon to be separated from the latter). But she managed to regain her composure as she realised that this was not the proper time to lament and weep<sup>1</sup>. (6)

She repeatedly met (i.e. embraced; hugged) Parvati even as the latter fell down at her mother's feet again and again. The intensity of mutual love, affection and respect between them was so intense that it is not possible to describe it. (7)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Maina realised that she was grown-up while her daughter was still young and of an immature age. If Parvati sees her mother in such a pitiful condition at the time of separation, it will haunt her for a very long time to come, adding to her already intense pain of separation from her parents. This was a time to show courage and resilience, and not weakness of the heart. If Parvati is given a farewell with a smile, it will cheer her up; wailing and lamenting will make her sad and sulk in grief. Such a parting is never good. So, after the initial burst of emotions, her mother decided to control herself and show courage.

When Sita was about to bid farewell to her parents at the time of her departure with the marriage party of Lord Ram, a similar description is given in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precedes Doha no. 337. Sita's mother too had mustered courage to regain self-control even as she embraced her daughter repeatedly just like Maina does here.]

Bhavaani (Parvati) met all the women-folk assembled there, and went once again to her mother, and, falling at her feet, she wrapped herself around it (i.e. she firmly clasped her mother's feet as a last emotional gesture to seek her mother's blessings before taking leave from her to depart for her husband's home). (8)

Parvati met her mother once again for the last time, and made her departure for her husband's home. All those who were assembled there to bid her farewell uttered appropriate blessings for her. (Chanda line no. 1)

Even as Parvati moved away from her mother, she kept on glancing back repeatedly towards her mother (because she was extremely overwhelmed with love and grief of separation from her loving mother)<sup>1</sup>. Her friends insisted that she refrain from being sentimental, and took her forward to where Lord Shiva was. (Chanda line no. 2)

Having satisfied the desires of all the alms-seekers who had gathered there, Lord Shiva started on his journey home (with his consort) Uma<sup>2</sup>. (Chanda line no. 3)

As the marriage procession wend its way back to the home of Lord Shiva, all the gods (who had come to attend the marriage ceremony) became exhilarated and showered flowers. At the same time, musical instruments such as the kettle-drums were played melodiously in the sky (the heaven)<sup>3</sup>. (Chanda line no. 4)

[Note—Compare these lines with the time when Sita took leave of her parents and joined her husband, Lord Ram, as the marriage party of the Lord made its ceremonial departure from Janakpur for Ayodhya, the capital city of Lord Ram.

Himwaan personally accompanied Lord Shiva and escorted the marriage procession for quite some distance to show his affection for the Lord.

When he had come along for a long distance, Lord Brishketu (Shiva) comforted and consoled him in various possible ways, and then sent him back<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 102)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When Lord Ram's marriage party departed from Janakpur, his father-in-law, king Janak, too was overwhelmed with affection, and he too had escorted the procession for quite a long distance out of the city. Though king Dasrath, Lord Ram's father, tried to persuade him to return, Janak insisted on going ahead. Finally, when he had come a very long way from the city, Dasrath stood on the ground and most humbly and affectionately requested Janak to return home.

All this is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 340—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 343.]

Himwaan returned home immediately and summoned all the mountains and rivers who had assembled at his place (to participate in the marriage ceremony of his daughter Parvati with Lord Shiva)<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Then, Himwaan expressed his gratitude to all of them; he duly honoured them and showed his respect to them by giving them gifts, as well politely thanking them with humble words of thanksgiving. After this, he bid them all farewell<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-6 that precede Doha no. 94 where we have already read how Himwaan had invited all the mountains and rivers to come and participate in the marriage ceremony of his daughter. They had assumed charming forms and had joined in the celebrations. The Mountains and the rivers have been personified here. Himwaan was like an emperor amongst them.

<sup>2</sup>In Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chanda line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 326 we learn how king Janak had prayed and showed his respects to the honourable guests who had come to participate in the marriage of his daughter Sita in a very similar fashion.]

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When Lord Ram's marriage party returned home to Ayodhya, king Dasrath, the father of Lord Ram, had expressed his thanks to all the guests who had come to join the marriage celebrations by showing great respect to them and giving them abundant gifts and honours. Then all of them, including the gods in the heaven, went away happily to their respective homes, cheerfully talking about the glorious events of the past days when they had witnessed the joyous events associated with the divine marriage of Lord Ram with Sita, praising their own immense good luck at having been able to witness this divine ceremony, blessing the couple and their father king Dasrath, and in general being ecstatic and exhilarated at the wonderful experience they had had during the entire episode. Lord Sambhu and Bhavaani are the Father and the Mother of the entire universe (the “Jagat”, the living world) respectively<sup>1</sup>. I will therefore not describe (or I shall refrain from narrating about) their physical charm and their love for each other (because it would be highly indecent, indignified, and violating traditional norms of the society to do so). (4)

While living in Mt. Kailash with their attendants, Lord Shiva and Bhavaani enjoyed their married life in different ways. [And for reasons cited above in verse no. 4, it is absolutely not proper to detail how they lived in their marital home and how they enjoyed their married life.] (5)

Every day they enjoyed themselves, and every day there was a new way by which they jovially entertained each other. In this way, a long time passed cheerfully. (6)

In due course of time, ‘Shatbadan’ (i.e. Lord Kartikeya; the deity who has six heads) was born to them, who had later on killed the demon (Tarkasur) in battle<sup>1</sup>. (7)

This story of the birth of Shiva’s son with six heads is well known in the world, and is also well documented in the scriptures such as the Aagams (the ancient Vedas), the Nigams (the Tantras; the scriptures that followed the original Vedas), as well as the Purans (ancient mythological history). That is why I<sup>1</sup> have briefly mentioned about the story of the birth and deeds of the son of Lord Brishketu (Shiva). [Since the story related to the birth of Kartikeya and how he slayed the demon Tarkasur is well documented in the scriptures and well known in the world, I have refrained from detailing it. Another reason for not narrating it in detail is that it would be out of context as the focus of my narration is the marriage of Lord Shiva, and to explain the reason as to why the Lord had married in the first place.] (Chanda line no. 2)

Verily, those men and women who narrate and hear this divine episode of the marriage of Uma with Lord Sambhu---(Chanda line no. 3)

---They would be blessed with auspiciousness and success in all their endeavours related to any activity pertaining to marriage (in their families and the society at large), and at the same time they would always find happiness and peace.<sup>2</sup> (Chanda line no. 4)

However, this original narration is cited by the author of our present book “Ram Charit Manas” who is Goswami Tulsidas, and this is clear in Doha no. 103 herein below. So therefore, it can be either sage Yagyawalkya or Goswami Tulsidas who is meant by the pronoun “I” here.

The life and deeds of the dear Lord of Girija (i.e. Lord Shiva, the dear husband of the daughter of the mountains, Parvati) are like an ocean, i.e. so vast and indescribable, that even the Vedas are unable to cross them (or fully narrate them).

Therefore, how can the humble Tulsidas, who has a limited intellect and is very foolish, ever be able to do so<sup>1</sup>? (Doha no. 103)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This is merely an expression of Tulsidas’ excellent sense of humility and modesty that he does not want to take credit for whatever he has written. The fact remains that Tulsidas’ writings have remained unmatched in their beauty and spiritual depth in the annals of devotional literature anywhere in the world, and so this statement of his is simply to express his humility and modesty.

In Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 and Chanda line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 361, the great poet-saint-savant Tulsidas has made it abundantly clear why he has decided to narrate the divine story which he titled “Ram Charit Manas”. He says that he has done it to “purify his own speech”.

Further, in the very beginning of this book he has expressed his humility and modesty while laying out the groundwork and outlining the reason why he chose to write this epic. Refer especially to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 12—to Doha no. 15.]

Sage Bharadwaj felt very happy and delighted when he heard this magnificent and auspicious story of Lord Shiva (as narrated by sage Yagyawalkya); the narration gave him much comfort, peace and happiness<sup>1</sup>. (1)

His (Bharadwaj's) interest in hearing the rest of the wondrous story<sup>2</sup> grew manifold times even as he felt exhilarated, with tears filling his eyes, and his body feeling the thrill of it all. (2)

He was so ecstatic with joy and thrill that he could not speak a word as his emotions overwhelmed him and literally choked his throat. When sage Yagyawalkya observed Bharadwaj's condition, he too felt glad and exhilarated<sup>3</sup>. (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The 'story of Lord Shiva' referred to here is the one we have read in the previous verses, i.e. Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Doha no. 47—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 103.

This verse rounds up the episode of Lord Shiva's marriage with Parvati which sage Yagyawalkya had narrated to sage Bharadwaj. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 47.

<sup>2</sup>What was the 'rest of the story' which sage Bharadwaj was now feeling so keen and eager to hear till its end? Well, the story of Lord Shiva which had so much enthused him had its genesis in the discourse between sage Agastya and Lord Shiva, where the divine story of Lord Ram was narrated, and the subsequent developments when goddess Sati had doubts about the divinity of Lord Ram which compelled Lord Shiva to abandon her, Sati's burning herself in the fire sacrifice organized by her father Daksha, and her taking birth as Uma or Parvati in the household of the king of Mountains, known as Himwaan, when she did severe Tapa (penance) to marry Lord Shiva.

Sage Bharadwaj grew very curious to learn more about the story of Lord Ram which sage Agastya had narrated to Lord Shiva (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 48), as all the subsequent developments concerning Lord Shiva's disillusionment with Sati, and then his marrying her again in the next birth as Parvati quite intrigued Bharadwaj, as all of it had its origin in the discourse of sage Agastya concerning Lord Ram. So therefore, sage Bharadwaj wished to hear the original story of Lord Ram from the beginning to its end. This eagerness of the great sage led Yagyawalkya to reveal the divine story of Lord Ram, known as the 'Ram Charit Manas' which we are presently reading. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 30.}

<sup>3</sup>To wit, both the sages shared each other's joy and happiness as they drenched themselves in the warmth of the sunshine of bliss and ecstasy which spread over them in a symbolic way when the charming story of Lord Shiva's marriage with Parvati was narrated. It was a shared feeling of bliss and ecstasy. For a while they must have forgotten about the world around them, or who the narrator was, and who the listener.

The reaction of the two illustrious sages shows how an attentive listener would react when he thoroughly enjoys what he hears, and how a good teacher would feel when he finds that his student has thoroughly enjoyed what was taught to him. It is also an example to show how a good thing benefits and cheers the giver as well as the receiver of it, for both Yagyawalkya, who was the 'giver' here, and Bharadwaj, the 'receiver', had equally felt blessed by the narration of Lord Shiva's story.

We discover two things here: One, that when a person eager to learn something or remove his doubts approaches a wise and learned teacher with a request to bless him with the required knowledge, the teacher would not refuse him. Of course it is obligatory on the part of a wise teacher to first determine how sincere the person is, and if he is eligible and competent enough to be told the secrets of desired knowledge. There is no harm or shame in having doubts about anything, but one should be careful not to use it as an excuse to ridicule the wisdom of his teacher, to find constant fault with his teaching, even going to the extent of ridiculing the knowledge itself, and therefore approaching the teacher with a wicked mind and firm intention to prick holes in his knowledge in order to mock him and undermine his reputation and self-respect.

And two, that if the narrator of a story is an expert orator and well versed in the subject matter he has taken up, and if the listener is sincere and really interested in hearing the story, if he has certain queries about the story and wishes to understand its intricacies, then both of them thoroughly enjoy the narration and the time spent on it.

These two observations are endorsed when we closely examine the following verses of Ram Charit Manas: (a) Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 111; (ii) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 114 (where we find that Lord Shiva, who is the narrator of the story of Lord Ram for the benefit of his consort Uma, feels glad that she wants to hear it and clarify her doubts); (iii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 120 (Uma expresses her joy when all her doubts were removed); (b) Uttar Kand, (iv) Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 64; (v) Doha no. 69 (where we read that the saintly crow Kaagbhusund felt exhilarated when Garud approached him with a desire to learn the truth of Lord Ram, and asked him to narrate the divine story of Lord Ram for this purpose); and (vi) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 125 (where Garud has cheerfully expressed his gratitude to Kaagbhusund for removing all his doubts).

This is what has happened presently in the case of sages Bharadwaj and Yagyawalkya too: First Bharadwaj asked Yagyawalkya to tell him the secrets of the story of Lord Ram, then Yagyawalkya tested Bharadwaj's sincerity by narrating the story of Lord Shiva before beginning the actual story which Bharadwaj wished to hear in order to find out if the latter was earnest in acquiring knowledge, or if he was just testing Yagyawalkya, and finally when the teacher found that his student is eligible for receiving the sought knowledge, he was thrilled. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (a) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 45—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 47; (b) Doha no. 47—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 104.}

The positive emotional response of sage Bharadwaj, as has been outlined here, would motivate sage Yagyawalkya to narrate the divine story of Lord Ram in great detail to him now onwards. It also acts an example for all others: a person is eligible to hear the story of Lord Ram only if he has true interest to hear it, finding emotional solace and peace by it, deriving immense spiritual bliss, joy and happiness by doing so. The Lord's divine story ought not to be told to people who are feeling bored, who find it boring and lacking of interest; people who yawn, look repeatedly at their wrist-watches, make side-glances, itch all over the body and scratch, or feel drowsy. These symptoms are the opposite of what sage Bharadwaj exhibited.

The question: 'Who is eligible to hear the divine story of Lord Ram, and who is not?' has been answered in Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-7 that precede Doha no. 9; (b) Uttar Kand, (i) Doha no. 69; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 93; (iii) Doha no. 128 along with Chaupai line nos. 2-8 that precede it.

Further, the hearer of the story must not hear it with a skeptical mind to find faults in it, to ridicule it, but with a sincere and honest desire to understand the mysteries associated with this divine story as well as the divinity of Lord Ram. Lord Shiva had himself used this criterion to start narrating the story of Lord Ram for the benefit of his consort goddess Parvati. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 111 along with Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede it.}

There is another remarkable thing that we observe here: that the narrator, sage Yagyawalkya, has become ecstatic too. Well, other narrators of the divine story of Lord Ram have also become overjoyed when they got an opportunity to do so. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (i) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 41 (general observation); and Doha no. 111 (Lord Shiva); (ii) Uttar Kand, Doha no. 69, and Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 124 (Kaagbhusund).

It is a universal truth that when a good teacher preaches something meant for the good of others, then it definitely sends cheers all around. There are instances in Ram Charit Manas where we read that a message that grants truthful knowledge and peace is always received with great reverence by its hearer. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (i) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 48 (Lord Shiva feeling exhilarated when he heard the narration of Lord Ram's story from sage Agastya); (ii) Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 17 (Laxman feeling joyful when Lord Ram taught him about the relationship between Bhakti and Yoga (devotion and meditation)); (iii) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 53 (Uma feeling exceedingly glad upon hearing the story of Lord Ram as narrated to her by Lord Shiva); and (iv) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 93 (Garud feeling ecstatic when he heard the narration of Lord Ram's divine story from the saintly crow Kaagbhusund).}

When a person is overcome with joy and emotions, he is unable to speak. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 242.

And what can give more joy and happiness to a person than something that grants peace and bliss to his soul as is the case of narrating and hearing of the divine story of Lord Ram. Further, this is possible only when one meets a saint and a pious soul who would tell the story truthfully and without distortions. Hence, it is great blessing of the Lord upon a person who comes in contact with a saintly soul. This fact is reiterated in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 123 where Garud has said that he feels exceptionally blessed and privileged that Lord Ram has granted him the opportunity for a meeting with a saintly soul, in this case it was the saint-crow Kaagbhusund.]

The illustrious sage Yagyawalkya was overwhelmed and delighted at seeing the ecstatic condition of sage Bharadwaj. He praised the latter and lauded him, saying: 'Oh blessed sage; you are indeed very fortunate and great, and truly blessed is your birth, for Lord Shiva (who is the husband of Gauri, goddess Parvati) is as dear to your heart as life itself is dear to it! (4)

Those who do not have devotion and affection for the holy lotus like feet of Lord Shiva are not liked by Lord Ram even in a dream<sup>1</sup>. (5)

To have a sincere and unpretentious devotion and affection for the holy feet of Lord Shiva is a sure sign of one being a true devotee of Lord Ram<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It ought to be noted here that Lord Ram has himself said that if a person wishes to have devotion for him, then he must have devotion for Lord Shiva too. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, (i) Doha no. 2 along with Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede it; and (ii) Doha no. 45.

Lord Shiva worships Lord Ram as his revered deity; Lord Shiva uses the holy name of Lord Ram as a divine Mantra for his meditation purpose; the divine story of Lord Ram had first emerged in the heart of Lord Shiva while he was meditating upon Lord Ram. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 3, 8 that precede Doha no. 19; (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 26; (iii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 30; (iv) Chaupai line nos. 9, 11 that precede Doha no. 35; (v) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 108; (vi) and Doha no. 111 along with Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede it.}

To wit, it is clear that amongst all the Gods, none equals Lord Shiva in his devotion for Lord Ram, thereby making Shiva a favourite of Lord Ram.

panu kari raghupati bhagati dēkhāī. kō siva sama rāmahi priya bhāī. 8.

[In these verses, sage Yagyawalkya explains why Lord Shiva is so dear to Lord Ram.]

Say, who is more diligent, more steadfast, more sincere and more committed to having devotion for Lord Ram than Lord Shiva is—who had discarded even a perfectly chaste and loyal wife as Sati was, for she was surely sinless and immaculate of character. [Lord Shiva had snapped all his relations with Sati, his consort, just because she had doubted the divinity of Lord Ram, even though she was otherwise perfect in all other respects. Lord Shiva had acknowledged to himself that Sati was sinless, and breaking all relationship with her had made him uneasy too.]<sup>1</sup> (7)

But Lord Shiva showed his exemplary devotion and dedication to Lord Ram when he broke his own vows. [Lord Shiva had vowed never to accept Sati as his wife in future. But when she was born again as Parvati, known as Uma too, and did severe Tapa to have Lord Shiva as her husband, and Shiva was reluctant to oblige her, Lord Ram came to him and persuaded Shiva to accept her. Then Lord Shiva told Lord Ram that though it is not proper for him to do so, yet he will obey his revered Lord Ram's command and go back on his own vows.]

Lord Shiva had felt uneasy ever since he had discarded Sati: Refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 75—to Chaupai line no. that precedes Doha no. 76.

[Sage Yagyawalkya continued—] 'By narrating the story of Lord Shiva and by observing your reaction to it I have been able to ascertain the secret thoughts of your heart, and have determined (to my happiness) that you are indeed a true devotee of Lord Ram, and that you are free from all deceit, conceit and pretensions. [Truly, this makes you eligible to hear the divine story of Lord Ram which I shall be glad to recount to you now.]<sup>1</sup> (Doha no. 104)

Sage Yagyawalkya has given three reasons in these verses which would make a person eligible to be a devotee of Lord Ram, as well as for hearing and reading the Lord's story. One: the person must have devotion for Lord Shiva; two: that he must be free from deceit, conceit and pretensions of all kinds; and three: that he must thoroughly enjoy the rendering of the story.

We can make certain important observation here: Goswami Tulsidas, the poet-saint who has composed Ram Charit Manas, has followed the same pattern while writing his own version of the story of Lord Ram that sage Yagyawalkya had followed while narrating it to sage Bharadwaj—viz. first telling the story of Lord Shiva's marriage with Parvati before the actual commencement of Lord Ram's story. Perhaps Ram Charit Manas is the only instance amongst any of the versions of the story of the Ramayana where an event related to Lord Shiva appears before the story of Lord Ram actually begins.

Not only this, Tulsidas has gone a step ahead by including some other events before he commences the actual story. For instance, we shall soon be reading the incident of sage Narad's delusions (Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 124—to Doha no. 139). This is immediately followed by the story of King Manu and queen Satrupa doing severe Tapa (penance) (Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 142—to Doha no. 152). And finally, we read the story of King Pratapbhanu and the birth of the demon race headed by their King Ravana (Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 153—to Doha no. 183).

Though it can be argued that all these stories have a bearing on the main theme, i.e. why the Supreme Being came down to this mortal world in the form of Lord Ram, but they could have been added at the end too, as is the case with other versions of the Ramayana, where the story related to the demon king Ravana appears in the last Chapter, called the Uttar Kand—refer Valmiki's Ramayana and Veda Vyas' Adhyatma Ramayan. This approach would be justified in the sense that the top priority of a book is to go straight to the topic for which it is meant—which in this case is the narration of the story of Lord Ram, and not of Lord Shiva, or King Manu, or Narad's delusions, or Ravana's birth.

So then, why has Tulsidas chosen the new approach? Well, as Yagyawalkya would have said, it is to "test the patience and the sincerity of the reader". If he is shallow in his enquiry, he would be easily put off by these stories which he would treat as superfluous and unrelated. It is only if he is sincere and eager to dig deep and go into the depths of the mystery associated with the mystical story of Lord Ram would he persist and go on reading. It's like a wise teacher taking an interview before selecting serious students for his class, because the crowd can easily be got rid of when not-so-serious students get bored by the many questions asked by the teacher which they consider an irrelevant joke and a waste of time.

Another reason is that all these small incidents help to build the foundation on which the rest of the story is built: they enlighten the reader of the importance of having devotion, faith and love for Lord Ram, why the Lord took the trouble of becoming a human being and undergoing sufferings which he could have easily avoided, and that there are umpteen numbers of reasons why the Supreme Being manifested himself as Lord Ram.

There is yet another crucial reason for Tulsidas to introduce the story of Lord Shiva and praise the Lord as being the greatest devotee of Lord Ram, as well as the one in whose Mana (heart and mind) the divine story of Lord Ram had originally sprouted prior to it becoming known to the rest of the world, before he actually commences narrating the story of Lord Ram to whom this book is dedicated. It was an honest, a sincere and a serious effort by the illustrious saint Tulsidas to put to rest and douse the fire of dissent, discontent, discord and distemper that prevailed between the worshippers of Lord Shiva, known as the Shaivas, and those of Lord Vishnu, called the Vaishnavas. Tulsidas sought to stress that both the forms of the Supreme Being are equally reverential; the followers of one deity ought to show full respect to the other deity. If Tulsidas had narrated the story of Lord Shiva before the story of Lord Ram in own book Ram Charit Manas, without any precedence to support him, then perhaps he would have been roasted for violating standards by both the sects; so therefore he invokes sages Yagyawalkya and Bharadwaj to justify his stand.]

[Sage Yagyawalkya told sage Bharadwaj—] ‘Oh Sage! I have understood your noble virtues and auspicious desires. [To wit, I have realized that you are fully entitled to hear the divine story of Lord Ram—because for one, you have true interest in it as is evident by your emotional response to my narration till now, second, that you have shown your devotion for Lord Shiva which is a first sign of your devotion for Lord Ram, and three, you are free from the negative traits of deceit, conceit and pretensions. All these virtues make you eligible to hear the story of Lord Ram.]<sup>1</sup>

Therefore, now I shall begin the narration of Lord Ram’s divine story. Listen to it carefully and with full devotion.’ (1)

[Praising sage Bharadwaj further, the enlightened sage Yagyawalkya said—] ‘Oh Sage! I cannot describe how great I feel, and how much blessed and honoured I consider myself to be for having had this opportunity to meet you and have a communion with you.’<sup>2</sup> (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, (i) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 9; (ii) Uttar Kand, Doha no. 69.

Observing Parvati’s eagerness to hear the divine story of Lord Ram, Lord Shiva has made a similar observation in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 120 along with Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes it.

<sup>2</sup>When Garud met the saintly crow Kaagbhusund and heard the story of Lord Ram, he too had felt the same way. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 3-8 that precede Doha no. 69; (ii) Doha no. 93-a; and (iii) Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 125.

Even Kaagbhusund had felt delighted when he met Garud and got an opportunity to narrate the story of Lord Ram. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 123—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 124; and also to (ii) Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 64; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 70; (iv) Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 93; (v) Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 95.

rāma carita ati amita munīsā. kahi na sakahim̃ sata kōṭi ahīsā. 3.
 tadapi jathāśruta kaha'um̃ bakhānī. sumiri girāpati prabhu dhanupānī. 4.

Oh Great Sage (Bharadwaj)! The story that describes the deeds of Lord Ram has an infinite limit; it is measureless and immense in its dimension and variety<sup>1</sup>, so much so that it cannot be narrated in its entirety even by thousands of celestial Serpents, each having a thousand tongues, attempting their best to do so. (3)

However, inspite of this I (Yagyawalkya) shall try to tell you what I have heard myself from others (i.e. from illustrious sages who have quoted from the scriptures)<sup>2</sup>. For this purpose I shall first invoke the blessings of Lord Shiva (girāpati#) as well as Lord Ram who holds a bow in his hands.

[#This verse can be interpreted slightly differently if we treat the word “girāpati” to mean ‘the patron deity of speech’—which would be goddess Saraswati. In this case, the reading would change a bit to mean ‘invoking of goddess Saraswati’ instead of Lord Shiva.] (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer to: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 52; (ii) Doha no. 92; (b) Baal Kand, (iii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 13; (iv) Doha no. 33; (v) Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that precede Doha no. 121.

<sup>2</sup>Even Lord Shiva, the all-knowing Lord God who was the first to have this divine story of Lord Ram revealed in his own heart during his meditation session, had said the same thing: refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 114; (ii) Doha no. 120.

Later on, the saintly crow Kaagbhusund says a similar thing to Garud: refer—Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 92.

And finally, our revered poet Tulsidas too says the same thing: refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 30-a and Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that follow it.

Lord Shiva, who being the omniscient Lord knowing the mystery of Lord Ram, must have known all the different versions of the story of Lord Ram, yet he says he will sight only a few of them: refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 122.

What do we conclude here? Obviously it shows that no one can claim full and exclusive authority over the divine story of Lord Ram, for the Lord and his divine story as well as his glories are infinite and beyond the reach of any individual. Even the Vedas, the ancient scriptures said to be a repository of all knowledge, could not find an end of it when they finally gave up and said “Neti-Neti”—i.e. not this, not this; or ‘neither this nor that is a complete picture of the infinite Brahm’. To wit, what they all said is true, but this truth does not exclude the fact there are other similar truths about the Lord which are yet untold and still unknown.]

sārada dārunāri sama svāmī. rāmu sūtradhara antarajāmī. 5.

jēhi para kṛpā karahim janu jānī. kabi ura ajira nacāvahim bānī. 6.

Indeed, the goddess of speech, i.e. goddess Saraswati, is like a wooden puppet, for she would act on the instructions of the Supreme Lord, Lord Ram, who holds the string of this puppet as he controls everything in this creation<sup>1</sup>. (5)

Forsooth and without gainsay, he is the fortunate one whom the Lord favours and selects as his chosen servant, transforming him into a learned savant or a skilled minstrel who would speak on the Lord's behalf and sing his glories<sup>2</sup>. It is like the case of the puppeteer making the puppet dance in a royal courtyard<sup>3</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A similar idea is expressed in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 7 that precede Doha no. 11; (ii) Doha no. 117 along with Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede it; (iii) Doha no. 124 (in the context of the illustrious sage Narad getting deluded).

<sup>2</sup>A puppet does so many acts, but it does so only on the instructions of the puppeteer who remains behind the curtain and holds the string that moves the puppet. Likewise, there are so many poets and bards and minstrels and savants who sing the glories of Lord Ram, but it will be a grave error to think that they are doing it because they have the knowledge, aptitude, skill and the competence to do so. No, they do so because they are fortunate that the Lord has chosen them to spread his good word. If these people think that they are the ones who ought to be honoured and lauded for their excellent abilities and skills, surely then they are ignorant and deluded.

<sup>3</sup>Here, the learned poet or bard or minstrel or savant is like the 'puppet' who does and speaks what the 'puppeteer', here meaning Lord Ram, wants him to do or speak.]

I therefore bow before the most merciful and compassionate Lord Ram (also known as Raghunath), and then begin to narrate the divine glories of the same Lord, glories that are holy, immaculate, legendary and infinite<sup>1</sup>. (7)

[Now begins the actual narration of the story of 'Ram Charit Manas'. Starting his discourse, the illustrious sage Yagyawalkya said to his listener sage Bharadwaj—]

'There is a famed mountain called 'Mt. Kailash'; it is the best amongst all the mountains and is exceptionally pleasant. It is the abode of Lord Shiva where he resides with his consort goddess Uma<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Other narrators mentioned in Ram Charit Manas have also invoked the blessings of Lord Ram while beginning to narrate the Lord's divine story. All of them serve Lord Shiva and derive immense pleasure in it. (Doha no. 105)

tēhi giri para baṭa biṭapa bisālā. nita nūtana sundara saba kālā. 2.

Those who are opposed to Lords Hara and Hari (Lord Shiva and Lord Vishnu respectively)—i.e. those who do not have devotion for the Lords, as well as those who are not interested in obeying the laws of Dharma (righteousness, auspiciousness, probity, propriety, nobility of thought and conduct) and prefer to undermine its principles, such persons cannot dream of ever going there<sup>1</sup>. (1)

There on this holy mountain is a huge Banyan tree; it is evergreen and remains shady and comfortable all round the year<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Where would they not go? Well, the answer is: to the holy abode of Lord Shiva, located on Mt. Kailash. This ‘abode of Lord Shiva’ has a symbolic meaning—i.e. such people will not think of going to a wise teacher to hear discourses on spiritual matters as they find it boring and outdated and irrelevant to life. They think that the physical world is the real truth, the reality and cause of existence, the destiny of all efforts, all there is nothing beyond it. They think it a waste of time that is spent on spiritual discourses, for it would be rather better spent on learning things of the material world that give physical comfort and pleasure. Verily indeed, it goes without saying that such people can never hope to find peace and happiness in the true sense. What they think constitutes peace and happiness is like a thirsty man seeing water in a mirage in a hot desert—it's an illusion that vanishes soon, and only serves to drag him nearer to his own death.

Only foolish people expect to have happiness and peace if they are opposed to Dharma; what they get instead is suffering and grief. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chanda line nos. 1-10 that precede Doha no. 102.

<sup>2</sup>The Banyan tree, or the Indian Fig tree, is regarded as auspicious and holy. It has a wide girth, and its extended branches give shade over a large area so that a congregation of saints and seers can easily and comfortably assemble there and discuss spiritual matters. The saintly crow Kaagbhusund had also given his discourse under a Banyan tree—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 9 that precedes Doha no. 56; and Chaupai line nos. 1, 7 that precedes Doha no. 57.

Lord Shiva had one such tree in Mt. Kailash. He used to sit under its shade to meditate—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 58.]

ēka bāra tēhi tara prabhu gaya'ū. taru bilōki ura ati sukhu bhaya'ū. 4.

The Vedas (“śruti”; the ancient scriptures) say (literally sing; “gāyā”) that this wonderful Tree is the usual habitat of Lord Shiva where the Lord relaxes and meditates under its cool shade where a pleasant breeze having three excellent qualities constantly blows<sup>1</sup>. (3)

Once upon a time, Lord Shiva went near this magnificent Tree. He looked up at it, and felt very happy and comfortable<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>What are these ‘three qualities’ of the breeze that makes it so pleasant and comfortable (tribidha samīra)? Well, it has a sweet fragrance, it is cool, and it is mild and soft. This is the opposite of a wind that carries stink, that is hot, and that blows fiercely as during a storm.

And what makes a tree so pleasant and attractive: It has a cool shade, and its environment is clean (susīтали chāyā).

<sup>2</sup>Shiva approached this Banyan tree, and felt its coolness and the sweet fragrance that spread all around it. It was a pleasant sight, and Shiva experienced bliss. So he decided to sit down under its shade and meditate.

A tree’s shade is always comfortable and soothing for the senses. Even Lord Ram felt delighted when he saw a tree under whose shade he could relax for a while on the way to the forest. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Ayodhya Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 115; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precedes Doha no. 124; (b) Aranya Kand, (iii) Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 41.

We read in Ram Charit Manas that at Chitrakoot, Lord Ram used to sit under a Banyan tree and many great sages assembled around him, and then spiritual subjects were discussed. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 237 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede it.

Sage Kaagbhusund too had his seat under one Banyan tree where his disciples assembled to hear the divine story of Lord Ram narrated, and it was here that Garud too was preached. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Doha no. 56 along with Chaupai line nos. 6-10 that precede it; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1-9 that precede Doha no. 57; and (iii) Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 63.]

The most merciful and gracious Lord Shiva spread a sitting mat consisting of a tiger-skin under the shade of this magnificent tree, and sat down comfortably over it. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Shiva rubs the ash of the fire sacrifice on his body; this gives him a fair or grey complexion.

<sup>3</sup>Lord Shiva is a patron deity of ascetics. So he exemplifies the core values of an ascetic. He therefore dresses himself as an ascetic or hermit would dress.

In this context refer to his appearance when he was on his way to marry Uma. There also we read that Lord Shiva looked the same way as he appears now; he resembled more as an ascetic or a hermit than a groom on his way to his wedding venue. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 92.

So, what message does Lord Shiva intend to give to his devotees? Well, he tells them to remain free from attachments and treat oneself as a hermit internally, even if one has to live like an ordinary householder externally. This is true renunciation; this is true detachment; this is true enlightenment and self-realisation.]

Lord Shiva's holy feet are like a freshly blooming lotus flower with a red hue. The shine of his nails symbolically act as the light that removes the darkness in the heart of his devotees. (7)

Snakes wrapped around his body, and the ash from the fire sacrifice that is smeared over it, are his adornments.

The Lord is the one who had vanquished the demon Tripura—an accomplishment that gave him the title of Tripurari<sup>1</sup>.

The charm of his face is so magnificent that it puts to shame the beauty of the full moon as it is seen in the month of autumn. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The word 'Tripurari' also means the Lord of the three divisions of the creation—viz. the past, the present and the future; the heaven, the mortal world (earth) and the nether world (hell). This is why one of the many names of Lord Shiva is 'Maha-Deva', the Great God.

Lord Shiva is called Tripurari because he was an enemy of the demon Tripura and had vanquished the latter.

The story of demon Tripura and Taarkasur are closely related. Briefly it is as follows:

Taarkasur was the son of Vajraanga and his consort Varaangi. He had done severe Tapa (austerity and penance) as a result of which the creator Brahma had granted him several boons which had made him invincible. He was killed by Lord Subramanya, the son of Shiva and Parvati. He had three sons—Taaraaksha, Kamlaaksha and Vindyumaali. They had also pleased Brahma and by his blessings built three great cities, collectively called 'Tripura'. These cities were made of gold, silver and iron. These three demon brothers were collectively called Tripurasur—the demons of the three cities. When they became a nuisance for the Gods, Shiva destroyed these three cities and the demons with one arrow. Therefore he got the name of Tripurari—one who destroyed the three enemy cities.

The story of Tripurasur with a slight variation is narrated in Bhagwat Mahapurāṇa, 7/10/53-58. According to it, once when the demons were defeated by the gods, they went to take refuge with the greatest demon of them all, the mighty demon named 'Maya Daanav'. He was the one who had created the golden city of Lanka for Ravana.

Maya Danav created three huge planes made of gold, silver and iron. These planes were so huge that they resembled entire cities and were well provided for with all the things necessary for comfortable living. Maya Daanav handed them to the three chief demons named Taaraaksha, Kamlaaksha and Vindyumaali who were said to be the son of Taarkasur. The special quality of these planes was that they were hidden from view and flew stealthily. Emboldened by being invisible, the demons went on the rampage, plundering and laying to waste the three worlds, viz. the heaven, the earth and the sky. The gods could not fight them as these demons were invisible. Besides this, these three city-like planes had a pond of nectar each, the contents of which made the demons invincible and beyond the reach of death.

Frustrated and flabbergasted, the gods approached Lord Shiva to get rid of the demons. Lord Shiva invoked his specially empowered arrow known as the ‘Pashupatastra’. When shot, it produced countless arrows spewing fierce tongues of flame. Though these arrows burnt the three cities or planes (“Tripurs”), the demons however managed to survive by taking a dip in the pond of nectar that was present in each of the three places.

Confused, Lord Shiva invoked Lord Vishnu, the maverick Lord who knows every trick in creation as he is the Supreme Being, to find some solution. Vishnu disguised himself as a cow and made the Creator Brahma a calf. They went to these ponds and drank the nectar. The demons were so dazed by the Lord’s Maya (delusion creating powers) that they could not respond and react. After that, Vishnu prepared for the great war—creating the chariot from Dharma (righteousness), the charioteer from Gyan (knowledge), the war standard from Vairagya (renunciation), the horses from Aishwarya (fame and might), bow from Tapa (penance), the body armour from Vidya (skills), arrows from Kriya (deeds and dynamism), and all other paraphernalia of war by employing other mystical powers he had.

Then, on an auspicious moment of the asterism of “Abhijit” (conquer now), Lord Shiva rode this chariot and burnt the three cities by a single arrow.

According to the Ramayana of Valmiki, Baal Kand, Canto 75, two great bows were made from the bones of Dadhichi. One was known as “Sarang” and the other was known as “Pinak”. The former was held by Lord Vishnu, and the latter by Lord Shiva. Vishnu killed the demons with his Sarang bow, while Shiva used his Pinak to destroy the three cities.

Another version of who the demon “Tripurasur” was appears in Skanda Puran, Aawantya Reva-Khand. It says that the son of the demon king Bali was known as ‘Baana-sur’. He had thousand arms. He worshipped Lord Shiva for a thousand years. Pleased with him, Lord Shiva asked him to seek a boon, upon which Baanasur requested the Lord to provide him with a city that is so invincible that none of the gods can ever conquer it, except of course by Lord Shiva whom he had worshipped as his deity. Shiva granted him his wish.

The cunning Baanasur then decided to please the other three gods of the Trinity, i.e. Lords Vishnu and Brahma. So he worshipped them one by one and extracted similar boons from them as he had done from Shiva. Once done, he now had three invincible cities that symbolized his sway and domain covering the three dimensions of creation—viz. the heaven, the earth and the nether world. Then he went mad with recklessness, plundering and pillaging at will. Terrified, the gods approached Lord Shiva as he was the one who had initially blessed Baanasur, and also because the demon had himself exempted Shiva from the boon of immunity from destruction. Then, Shiva stringed his bow called Pinak, mounted an arrow called Aghor, and angrily shot it at the three cities ruled by Baanasur. This arrow instantly burnt and reduced the three cities to ashes. Their residue fell in the holy river Narmada. Then Baanasur fervently prayed to Lord Shiva to be pleased with him and give him abode in his own divine Loka known as the ‘Shiva-Loka’, the divine abode of Shiva in the heaven.

The Sharav Upanishad of Atharva Veda, verse no. 14 describes that Lord Shiva is also known as the slayer of the demon Tripurasur. Hence, Shiva or Rudra is also called Tripurari. The three cities ruled by Tripurasur symbolised the three worlds, viz. the heaven, the earth and the nether world.

The story of the birth of Taarkasur in ‘Padma Puran, Sristi Khanda’ is as follows—By the blessings of sage Kashyap, mother Diti gave birth to a son named ‘Vajraanga’ because his body was as strong as Vajra, the hardest and the strongest material in existence. [Vajra + Anga (body)]

As soon as he was born he became an expert in the knowledge of all the scriptures. On the instructions of his mother he went to the heaven and ensnared Indra (the king of gods) and brought him captive before his mother. At the intervention of Brahma (the creator) and sage Kashyap (his father), Vajraanga freed Indra. He then requested Brahma that he may be inspired to do Tapa and succeed in it.

Brahma created a girl named 'Varaangi' and gave her to him as his bride. Then, both the husband and the wife, i.e. Vajraanga and Varaangi, began doing severe Tapa (penance). Brahma was pleased and blessed Vajranga that demonic tendencies would not emerge in his heart.

After successfully completing his Tapa, Vajraanga returned home but did not find his wife Varaangi there. When he went out to search for her, he saw her crying in the forest. On enquiry she told him that Indra had not only tormented her and made her miserable but had even compelled her to leave home. She wished to have retribution, and therefore asked her husband (Vajraanga) to provide her with a son who would punish Indra and avenge her insult at his hands.

Vajraanga did Tapa once again, and Brahma blessed him with a son as desired. This son was "Taarak" as he liberated his mother from her torments by severely punishing Indra: he captured Indra and put him in shackles. [A similar narration of doing Tapa and receiving a son as a boon is narrated in 'Matsya Puran', Chapter 147, verse no. 17.]

Varaangi had borne the child in her womb for a thousand years before he was born. Taarak, her son, was a brave and invincible warrior. To avenge his mother's insult at the hands of Indra (king of gods), he went to Mt. Paariyaatra and did so severe Tapa that the gods and the rest of the world began to get scorched by the heat generated by it. [Refer: (i) 'Matsya Puran', Chapter 148, and (ii) Kalidas' 'Kumar Sambhav', Sarga 1, verse no. 56.]

According to 'Matsya Puran', Chapter 148, verse no. 18 onwards, Taarak prayed to Brahma as follows—'Oh Lord! You live in the heart of all living beings, and as such nothing is hidden from you. Everyone wants to treat others the way the latter treat him. The gods have an eternal jealousy with us (the Asurs, the non-gods, the sons of Diti) and do not want us to live peacefully and prosper. I want to liberate the demon race. Hence, please grant me the boon that no warrior can kill me with any weapon. This is all I want.'

According to 'Padma Puran', Taarak asked Brahma for the grant of a boon that he is not killed by any living being.

In both the cases Brahma told him that this is impossible because all those who are born must die, without exception. So it is better if he re-phrases his request and specifies the person or entity from which he seeks immunity. Taarak then asked that he may not die at the hands of anyone except an infant of seven days of age or younger—in the hope that it would be impossible for such a small child, who is not even eight days old, to kill him, thereby making him invincible and immune to be killed by anyone who is old enough to confront him.

After the granting of the desired boon, both Brahma and Taarak went back to their respective homes. When the news spread that Taarak has successfully acquired a unique boon which would make him virtually immune from defeat and death, all the known famous demons of the time, viz. Mahish, Kaalnemi, Jambha, Grasan, Shumbha etc., came and joined forces with him, vowing their allegiance to him and declaring him as their chief. [Refer: 'Matsya Puran', Chapter 148, and Chapter 154, verse nos. 20-26, 47-49.]

Thus emboldened, Taarkasur unleashed mayhem and terror in the heaven: rampaging and plundering, imprisoning the gods and terrorizing them. The entire composite army of the gods failed to dent his strength and stop his seeking revenge from the gods. The gods approached their patriarch Brahma to help them. Brahma told them about the boon he had to grant Taarak, and advised them that since only a child below the age of seven days could kill the demon, they should make an effort in this direction and see how Shiva can be motivated to marry and beget a son. Brahma then told them (the gods) about Parvati's Tapa with the intention of marrying Shiva, and that he has already granted her wish alongside Lord Ram requesting Shiva to forgive her for her past sins in her previous life as Sati (when she had defied Shiva and had assumed the form of Lord Ram's wife Sita in order to test the integrity of Lord Ram) and marry her.

Meanwhile, Shiva is submerged in doing meditation, so the gods must try to devise a method whereby Shiva would marry Parvati. Their son would then kill Taarkasur. [Refer—(i) 'Matsya Puran', Chapters 146 and 154; and (ii) Kalidas' 'Kumar Sambhav', Canto 2, verse nos. 57, 59, 61.]

In Goswami Tulsidas' epic story of Lord Ram by the name of 'Ram Charit Manas', this entire episode is narrated in Baal Kand, (i) from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 82—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 89; and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 3-8 that precede Doha no. 103.]

A crown of matted hairs from which emerges the holy river Ganges<sup>1</sup> adorns Lord Shiva's head. His eyes are large like the petals of a lotus flower.

His neck is of a blue hue<sup>2</sup>, and a crescent moon adds to the overall attractiveness of Lord Shiva's appearance. Indeed, the Lord is an embodiment of the finest virtues of beauty and charm.# (Doha no. 106)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When the mighty river Ganges descended from heaven with a gigantic roar, the creator Brahma and other gods feared that its swift currents would crack the earth and completely drown the whole creation if something was not done quickly to contain it. They in fact needed a dam. So they requested Lord Shiva to trap the surging waters of Ganges in the tangled lock of his long hermit like hairs and dam it, or stop the flow of the Ganges in it. Later on, the river would be allowed to flow out in a restraint and controlled manner like water flowing out from a dam.

<sup>2</sup>When the scorching poison known as Halahal was produced at the time of the churning of the ancient ocean by the gods and the demons, everyone feared that even if a drop of it falls on the world then everything would be burnt alive. So Lord Shiva was kind enough to scoop it up and bottle it in his neck. The poison was so hot and dangerous that though it could not do much harm to Lord Shiva, yet the skin of the neck got a blue tinge, implying that its tissues had suffered and stiffened. Even today, when anyone drinks poison, his body turns pale and blue.

#That said, it will be both pertinent and interesting for us to read a little more about the Great Lord Shiva. Here goes:

Meaning of the word Shiva: This word Shiva refers to the third God of the Trinity, and the one who has been assigned the task of bringing the world to an end. The word itself briefly means the eclectic, glorious and beautiful virtues of truthfulness, purity, auspiciousness, wisdom, enlightenment, erudition, sagacity, blissfulness, dispassion, detachment, holiness and divinity. These are accompanied by a high degree of peace, tranquility, serenity, and their attendant happiness, joy and bliss. Since ‘truthfulness and auspiciousness’ are qualities that are beautiful, this word also means something that is beautiful and beyond reproach.

Briefly therefore, the word ‘Shiva’ means ‘one who is auspicious, always pure, holy, divine, truthful, beautiful and blissful’. Shiva is the Lord who is self-realised and a personified form of the cosmic Consciousness and the Absolute Truth.

The Maho-panishad of Sam Veda tradition, in its Canto 1, verse no. 7 describes that Shiva was born from the forehead of the Viraat Purush, the macrocosmic, invisible and all-inclusive gross body of Brahm, the Supreme Being.

The Panch Brahm Upanishad of Krishna Yajur Veda, verse no. 41 espouses that Shiva lives in the heart of the creature as an embodiment of ‘Sat-Chit-Anand’, i.e. as his Atma—“Shiva, as Sat-Chit-Anand personified, always lives in the heart. He is a constant witness of all that is happening. That is why the heart is regarded as the doorway to liberation and deliverance from the traps that have been laid out by this delusory and cunning world of artificiality to ensnare the creature in its tentacles.”

The Bhasma Jabal Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition was preached by Lord Shiva himself to sage Jabal Bhusund, and it highlights the fact that Lord Shiva is no ordinary God, or even a senior one being a member of the Trinity of Gods consisting of Brahma the creator, Vishnu the sustainer, and Rudra the concluder, but is the supreme transcendental Brahm himself personified. Shiva is the Supreme Being himself. Refer Bhasma Jabal Upanishad, Canto 1, paragraph no. 1; Canto 2, paragraph no. 3, 6-8.

The Yogtattva Upanishad of Krishna Yajur Veda tradition, in its verse nos. 92-94 says that Lord Shiva, in his form as Rudra, is the patron deity and personification of the fire element, and it is no wonder then that he is surrounded by ‘fire-spitting’ serpents as a symbolism of this fact. In this Upanishad’s verse nos. 98-102 it is asserted that Shiva is the patron deity and personification of the sky element.

The Dakshin Murti Upanishad of Krishna Yajur Veda, in its verse nos. 8, 10, 13, 15 and 19 affirms that Shiva is invariably wrapped by serpents.

The Dakshin Murti Upanishad of the Krishna Yajur Veda describes Lord Shiva as the south-facing Lord and elaborately elucidates the metaphysical significance of this form.

The Brihajjabal Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition, in its Brahman 4, verse no. 29 says that the Lord with three eyes (Trinetrum) is the bearer of this world having three aspects or the one who is the foundation upon which all the three Gunas such as Sata Guna, Raja Guna and Tama Guna rest (Trigunadhaaram) and is the one from whom the Trinity Gods (i.e. the creator Brahma, the sustainer Vishnu, and the concluder Rudra) are born. This Lord is none other than Lord Maheshwar, the great Ishwar or Lord of creation who is also known as Shiva, Ishan, Isha etc. This Lord is synonymous with the supreme transcendental Brahm. This fact is endorsed Krishna Yajur Veda's Varaaha Upanishad, Canto 4, verse no. 32, and in Dakshin Murti or Dakshin Mukhi Upanishad.

As the deity of the fire element, he is said to have 'three eyes' (Yogtattva Upanishad, verse no. 93), and as the deity of the sky element he is depicted as having a moon tucked in his lock of hairs, besides having five mouths, ten arms and three eyes (Yogtattva Upanishad, verse no. 100).

Tulsidas' epic Ram Charit Manas which endorses this view that Lord has three eyes and five heads. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 92 that says Shiva has 'three eyes'; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 220 which reiterates that Shiva has 'five heads'.

The Ram Uttar Tapini Upanishad of the Atharva Veda, Canto 5, verse no. 4/42 says that it is Lord Ram who has manifested as 'Maheshwar', the great God. Since this term is conventionally applied to Lord Shiva, it follows that Shiva is actually Lord Ram in this form. Its verse no. 4/43 clearly endorses this view when it says that Lord Ram has manifested himself as Mahadev—the great God. This term 'Maha-dev' is also conventionally used for Lord Shiva.

The Atharva Veda's Pashupat Brahm Upanishad, Purva Kanda/Canto 1, verse no. 32 emphasises that Lord Rudra or Shiva is also known as Pashupati. To quote—"One must understand that the knowledge of the self-illuminated Hans that has been revealed in this Upanishad deals with the eclectic and the divine knowledge of the pure cosmic Consciousness known as the Atma as well as Brahm.

This 'Hans' is also revealed in the form of Lord Rudra (Lord Shiva), who is also known as Lord Pashupati<sup>1</sup>.

It is this Brahm that is represented by Pranav, the cosmic ethereal sound encapsulated in the word Mantra OM. It is this Pranav representing Brahm that provides one with liberation and deliverance from this mortal gross world (32).

The Tripura Tapini Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition, Canto 1, verse no. 8 says that Shiva is known as Hans; and Canto 1, verse no. 9 says that he is Brahm.

The Tripura Tapini Upanishad, Canto 4, verse nos. 10, 14 assert that Shiva is the creator of everything in this creation, and Canto 1, verse no. 13 says that Shiva represents the creation itself much like Brahm, the Supreme Being who is also treated as being an embodiment of the entire creation.

The Tripura Tapini Upanishad, Canto 4, verse no. 11 says that Shiva represents the third state of consciousness known as the Sushupta state, and this is symbolized by the third eye which burns all delusions.

The Atharva Veda's Bhasma Jabal Upanishad, Canto 2, paragraph no. 6 asserts that Shiva and Rudra are one. The difference between the two names is due to the fact that the same Lord exists in two forms which appear to be diametrically opposite of each other in their characteristic features.

If we closely examine this verse we will understand the difference between the two terms 'Shiva' and 'Rudra' on the one hand, and between 'Brahm' and 'Shakti' on the other hand. Lord Shiva is extremely calm, serene, self-contented, self-realised and blissful like Brahm, and is therefore regarded as a personification of the latter (i.e. of Brahm). He remains perpetually involved in doing mediation and contemplation, remaining happy and submerged in the thoughts of the transcendental Truth. Hence, he is regarded as the patron deity of ascetics who themselves are regarded as personified forms of Brahm because they have become extremely self-realised, i.e. they have experienced the truth about themselves as being the Atma which is pure consciousness. This Atma is a microcosmic form of the cosmic Consciousness and the Absolute Truth of creation known as Brahm.

When the same Shiva assumes an angry form of Rudra at the time of conclusion of creation, he shows an astonishing and an astounding level of dynamism, energy, power, strength and vigour that are synonyms of the cosmic Shakti of Brahm. It is like the case of lightening that is present in the dark rain-bearing clouds in the sky. This lightening appears suddenly, streaks across the sky and causes a huge blast of light and thunder, and if it happens to strike the earth leaves behind scorched trees and ruined buildings, only to vanish without trace in another moment in the sky, withdrawing itself into the thick bank of cloud from which it made its appearance.

This analogy of the lightening appearing from and disappearing into the clouds in the sky would explain the phenomenon of Rudra vis-à-vis Shiva, and Shakti vis-à-vis Brahm. Rudra appears momentarily from Shiva, accomplishes the task for which Shiva had to assume this ferocious and ruthless form of anger, wrath and vehemence personified, only to vanish into the calm and tranquil form of Shiva. Similarly Shakti appears from the neutral cosmic entity known as the divine Brahm, accomplishes what is expected of it, and then disappears into Brahm without trace. Since everything in creation is a manifestation of Brahm, this unique character of Brahm and its relationship with its dynamism revealed as Shakti is also revealed in all the five primary elements of creation such as sky, air, water, fire and earth. Let us take one example of earth to understand how it works out.

The earth is the grossest of the five elements, being heaviest and most dense. It is inert and lifeless on the outside like any other celestial body of the fathomless heaven, but still it conceives and harbours all imaginable forms of life, takes proper care of them and provides endlessly for their necessities of existence. The earth is self-sufficient in this respect, and it does not need any other help to sustain life, or even to replenish its reserves which never deplete inspite of constant exploitation. So in this sense the 'earth' is Brahm personified. But when the 'mother earth' becomes angry, she vents her anger as earthquakes, landslides, floods, tsunamis, famines and draughts, leading to large scale destruction and havoc. This is the Shakti form of earth.

Then again, the earth is a solid piece of cosmic body which is lifeless, neutral and barren at one place as evidenced by the endless stretches of rocks and sand seen at some place on its surface, but at the same time it constitutes of charming and vibrant forms of endless variety of fauna and flora symbolizing life in all its splendour and grandeur at the other place. Even when the earth seems to be neutral, lifeless and inane, it still has its inherent dynamism and energy as shown by its magnetic field and its movement not only around its own self but also around the sun. This means that 'earth' stands for Brahm as well as for Brahm's Shakti simultaneously.

Likewise, if we take the example of the fire and the water, we find that on the one hand they are harbingers of life, growth and development on the one hand, and when annoyed become the cause of widespread destruction and havoc on the other hand. For instance, fire is an essential component of life because without the fire there will be no warmth and light, and the resultant chill and darkness would snuff life out of this creation. But the same fire can scorch everything to ashes if it becomes annoyed and decides to punish the world it had so benevolently nurtured.

The water also behaves in a similar fashion. While water is called the benevolent 'elixir of life' as it is the only element which actually cradles life in its merciful arms by providing it with readymade nourishment and acts as a buffer, a coolant and a soft lubricant that helps this creation to overcome the harsh and abrasive conditions on earth, which is nothing but a solid and rugged ball of thick and hardened rock that would have caused severe injury to the creation if it was not protected by the water, the same water can wipe out life if it turns malevolent as is evident during floods, high ocean tides and huge waves, tsunamis etc., or as observed during draughts when the water decides to withdraw itself and let the life parch itself out by thirst.

Air also exhibits similar characteristics. On the one hand the air is absolutely essential for life to exist in this world, because without air the life would suffocate to death, but the same air can cause ruin when it becomes angry, as is proved during fierce storms and cyclones.

The sky is the cosmic bowl which harbours everything that exists in this universe, from the smallest piece of cosmic debris to the huge galaxies and planetary systems. It is in the sky that our earth lives, and it is in the sky that the air we breathe is contained. But it is the same sky in from which devastating meteors and asteroids might strike upon the earth to wipe out entire generations of creatures. [It is one such event that had wiped out the ancient dinosaurs from the surface of earth, and more recently one such meteorite had blasted its way down to earth across the skies in the Ural Mountains of northern Russia which injured thousands of people and cause material damage to buildings and factories.] During severe thunderstorms, hurricanes and cyclones, it is the sky that is said to 'open up' and pour rain on the earth which cause deluge, or blow fierce winds that strike out viciously any thing standing up in its path much like the swing of the Vajra of Indra, the king of Gods. It is one such deluge pouring down from the sky or heaven that is expected to wipe out the present generation at the time of doomsday. Then again, during wars, it is from the sky that rockets, missiles and arrows shower down upon armies to kill and slay mercilessly.

So we conclude that while all the elements and all the units of creation are indeed manifestations of Shiva or Brahm, the latter's life-fostering and benevolent nature is displayed in these units when they act as aids to development of life and its growth, while their destructive aspect is a representative of Rudra. The dynamism, energy, vigour, strength and abilities displayed by all the units of creation are, however, a manifestation of the Shakti in its many myriad forms.

To wit, Lord Shiva is the Lord God who has full control over his sense organs and their inherent animal-like instincts and behaviour—because he is a highly self-realised and enlightened deity who is chosen by exalted ascetics and spiritual aspirants as their patron God—is known as Pashupati, literally the Lord of animals. Since Lord Shiva tolerates no nonsense and ruthlessly overcomes the wayward tendencies of the sense organs and the mind, showing anger at them for their natural grossness and tendency to commit mischief and misdeeds, he is also known as 'Rudra', the angry one. Lord Shiva is uncompromising and unrelenting in his pursuit of immaculacy, purity, auspiciousness, righteousness, nobility, probity and propriety, and hence called Rudra, the angry God.

'Rudra' has zero tolerance for impertinence, mischief and nonsense. 'Shiva' is, on the other hand, calm, tolerant and forgiving. Shiva always remains in a state of meditation and contemplation, a state that is depicted in his posture of blissfulness and half-closed eyes. Rudra, on the other hand, spews fire and brimstone. While Shiva symbolizes the virtues of Brahm marked by blissfulness, tranquility, calmness, wisdom, enlightenment, self-awareness and contentedness, Rudra represents the qualities of dynamism, vitality, vigour, strength and energy present in Brahm.

The question arises 'why did Shiva become Rudra (angry)?' The answer is that when Shiva found that his sense organs and mind did not allow him the peace that he sought by meditation and contemplation upon the ‘Atma, the self’, he became angry over them, and severely took them to task—i.e. he became ‘Rudra’ or angry. It is like the case of a teacher who is of a very calm nature and loves his students like they were his own sons, but when he finds that his kindness and loving nature is being misused by the students who create ruckus in the class, he has to become stern and spank them in order to restore discipline and decorum. But that does not mean that he is cruel or wishes to harm his students in the least. This same thing applies to Shiva.

Shiva becomes Rudra in order to ruthlessly punish the creatures of this creation who behave like savages or animals. This is necessary for him as he is the Supreme Being who has the mandate to maintain order and balance in this creation, and he would be failing in his moral duties and obligations if he tries to maintain a false exterior of calmness when his interior is agitated by the upheaval all around. The Supreme Being that Shiva is has an obligation to uphold positive traits and the virtues of auspiciousness, righteousness, probity and propriety in this creation even if it means that his own image of being calm and forgiving is questioned and overshadowed by anger and vehemence.

Just as the case of severe and malignant diseases like cancer and tuberculosis requiring an equally strong medicine, the evil, pervert and demonic forces of creation require an equally strong antidote to be overcome.

Therefore, that aspect of Brahm, the Supreme Being, which helps the Jiva (the living beings of this creation) control evil tendencies and negativity which make him animal-like is known as ‘Pashupat Brahm’, and the effort that a Jiva makes to achieve this eclectic goal is known as ‘Pashu-harta Yagya’.]

Now let see the significance of the various symbols or accoutrements associated with Lord Shiva.

The Shiva Lingam/Jyotirlingam—References: The Atharva Veda’s (i) Bhasma Jabal Upanishad, Canto 2, paragraph nos. 11-12,14 refer to the Shiva’s ‘Lingam’ and to his ‘Jyotirlingam’; (ii) Gopal Uttar Tapini Upanishad, verse no. 12.

The Atharva Veda’s Gopal Uttar Tapini Upanishad, verse no. 12 gives the names of some of the twenty Shiva Lingams as follows—“Vireshwar, Rudreshwar, Ambikeshwar, Ganeshwar, Neelkanth, Gopaleshwar, Bhadreshwar etc.”

The Shiva Lingam is a gross manifestation of Shiva who himself is a divine, subtle and sublime Being. Just like the case of the rest of this creation being a visible and gross manifestation of the supreme transcendental Brahm, the cosmic Supreme Being, Lord Shiva’s Lingams too represents the otherwise invisible, attribute-less, cosmic, all-pervading and the most sublime Lord Shiva’s subtle form in its grosser aspect or form that is visible, and has attributes like the other grosser manifestations of the Supreme Being known as Brahm. This is one of the primary reasons why Lord Shiva is also called ‘Maha-deva’, the Great God, because he is none other than Brahm himself.

The Shiva’s Lingam is like an icon that is normally used to stand as a unique symbol for a particular deity or God. It is an emblem of Shiva. If we look at the Lingam closely we observe that it is a cylindrical structure passing through the center of a circular girdle or ring. This structure reminds one of a wheel with the central axle. This imagery is used to indicate the fact that Shiva is the supreme transcendental Brahm around whom the whole of the creation rotates. ‘Rotates’ is a metaphoric way of saying that the entire creation depends upon Brahm; it is centered around Brahm; Brahm is the pivot that supports the entire edifice of creation. Just like the wheel cannot move if the axle is removed, this creation cannot survive if Brahm, the Consciousness and the Truth of creation, is removed from it. The fact that this creation is like a wheel rotating around the central axle called Brahm is endorsed in a number of Upanishads, e.g. (a) Atharva Veda = Prashna Upanishad, Canto 1, verse no. 11; Canto 6, verse no. 6; Mundak Upanishad, Mundak (Canto) 2, section 2, verse no. 6; Nrisingh Purvatapini Upanishad, Canto 5, verse nos. 2-7; Naradparivrajak Upanishad, Canto 9, verse nos. 4, 6; Tripdvibhut Maha-Narayan Upanishad, Canto 7, paragraph 3-14 (which describes the 'Sudarshan Chakra' of Vishnu); Shandilya Upanishad, Canto 1, section 4, verse no. 6-7 (which describes the wheel or Chakra that is present in the navel and how it keeps the creature trapped in it); Tripura Tapini Upanishad, Canto 2 (which describes the Sri Chakra dedicated to Goddess Tripura who is regarded as the Mother Goddess; Surya Upanishad, verse no. 1 (describes the Sun God as the one who keeps the wheel of life and death, known as the Kaal Chakra, rotating). (b) Krishna Yajur Veda = Shwetashwatar Upanishad, Canto 1, verse no. 4, 6; Canto 5, verse no. 12; Canto 6, verse nos. 1-3. (c) Shukla Yajur Veda = Paingalopanishad, Canto 4, verse nos. 3-4.

Besides this eclectic viewpoint we also observe that a cylinder is a smooth surface that is round from all sides. It appears the same from whichever side one sees it. This signifies the fact that Brahm is uniform and even in all respects, and neither does it have any specific form and feature. Like the Lingam passing through the circular girdle around it, the entire creation too forms a ring that moves around Brahm which holds the creation together and passes through its center. Now, this 'center' also means a core, and hence this refers to the Atma, the soul, that is the pivot or the core around which life revolves in this world.

If we look further ahead and observe a potter's wheel and how the potter moulds his pots and pans on it we find that it has a striking resemblance to the Shiva Lingam. As the wheel turns the potter expertly raises the shape of his wares at its center, and the rotating potter's wheel can be treated as an apt metaphor for the way the Shiva Lingam represents the phenomenon of creation moulded from the dynamic energy of Brahm revealed as the Shakti that continuously revolves around the principal known as Brahm.

Iconographically, the Shiva Lingam has three distinct parts—the lower part fixed to the ground stands for Brahma the creator; the middle part of the wheel stand for Vishnu the sustainer and protector of creation; and the upper part of the cylinder represents Rudra the concluder. These three Trinity Gods stand for the three basic and fundamental aspects of creation—birth, development and growth, and finally the end. They thus represent Brahm in its entirety.

The Shiva Lingam is called Jyotirlingam because it is mentioned in the Linga Puran, Chapters 17-20 that the Shiva Lingam appeared as an endless shaft of fire. And 'fire' is characterized by the virtues of light and illumination. It came to be known as the 'Linga' because all the creatures of this creation have a gross body in which their soul or their Atma lived, called the 'Linga Deha', and they reproduced themselves with the help of the genitals, called the 'Linga'. Since only the Supreme Being has this capacity to create and then sustain his creation, the grosser form of the Lord in the form of this creation and its self-replicating creatures was symbolized in the grosser symbol of the Linga. In other word, the Lingam represents the whole creation in a miniature gross form. This icon of Brahm is called 'Shiva' Lingam because Shiva is a personified form of Brahm.

It is also believed that it is called 'Lingam' because the entire creation would collapse at the end in Brahm, the ethereal cosmic Consciousness. The phrase 'Linga Deha' literally refers to the ethereal form of the corporal body of a creature. So when the creature sheds the body, his Atma would merge with the cosmic Atma known as Parmatma. Since Lord Shiva is the Parmatma—the Supreme Being—of this creation, it is natural that his symbol would be called a Lingam. It is to emphasize the fact that one should not be misled by its outer gross structure of being merely a cylindrical structure made of stone or rock but a divine symbol of the cosmic Atma that cannot be visualized by the naked eyes.

The physical Lingam is the visible form of the invisible Linga Deha of Shiva which is the Lord's ethereal and cosmic form.

The fact that the Lingam is an image of Lord Shiva is affirmed by the Lord himself in the Atharva Veda's Bhasma Jabal Upanishad, Canto 2, paragraph nos. 12 where the Lord preaches about the immense symbolic metaphysical importance and significance of the Lingam, and in paragraph nos. 14-15 when he preaches about the great many benefits of worshipping the Shiva Lingam which is his image, and how to worship it. To quote—“verse no. 12 =[This verse emphasizes the importance and the significance of the Shiva Lingam as follows—] Even the Sun God, the Moon God, the Fire God and the Wind God (i.e. the primary Gods) are unaware of the mysteries and enigmatic glories of this Shiva-Lingam.

The self-illuminated and self-emerged or self-created Lingam extends as far as the pit of the earth known as Paataal.

This Shiva-Lingam is an image of me who am the Lord of the world. Hence, it is known as ‘Vishwanaath’ Lingam.

Worshipping it and paying obeisance to it is directly worshipping and paying obeisance to me.

A worshipper who offers his worship and obeisance to me, who serves me and honours me with full devotion, sincerity and faith, by offering three leaves of the Bilva tree, and then offers the auspicious rewards of such exemplary worship to me (rather than expecting any gain for himself in return for such worship or service), who wears the Bhasma (sacred ash) and the Rudraksha beads as prescribed, who has sought my shelter and has taken refuge in my holy feet, and who is an unquestioned and most committed devotee of mine—verily I say that I accept his worship and free him from the fetter represented by the endless cycle of birth and death.

Even a great sin and its evil consequences are neutralized by offering daily worship to my Shiva-Lingam, by offering libations to me (a process known as ‘Abhishek’) and praying to me by reading or reciting the hymns of the Rudra Skuta daily with the greatest of devotion and faith, and then drinking the water left over after the completion of worship and offering of libations to my Lingam.

Such a devotee is free from all sorrows, grief, miseries and torments. He is freed from the shackling effect of this mundane and entrapping world. [12]

“verse no. 14 = (Benefits of worshipping the Shiva Lingam—) By offering libations to my Lingam, which is my image, with the milk drawn from a Kapila cow (i.e. a cow with reddish-brown, white, or white-spotted skin) while reciting the hymns of the Rudra Sukta, a devotee can obtain purification (pardon) from the horrendous sin of killing a Brahmin.

Offering of libations with the curd made from the milk of the Kapila cow helps one to eliminate or clean the great sin caused by drinking intoxicating liquids.

Offering of libations with clarified butter made from the milk of the Kapila cow helps one to overcome the grave sin caused by stealing gold (or theft of any kind).

Offering of libations with honey helps one to overcome the horrible ignominy and sin caused by being amorous towards the wife of one's Guru (teacher and moral preceptor).

Offering of libations with white sugar helps one to overcome the sin of being cruel to others.

Offering of libations with milk and other products (as prescribed above) helps the devotee fulfill all his aspirations, desires and wishes.

By offering libations one hundred times with quantity of materials that are one hundred times more than that used for one standard routine offering (i.e. roughly 100 kilograms or 1 quintal by weight) helps the aspirant to free himself from the fetters that shackle him to this world. [14]

“verse no. 15 = (How to worship the Shiva Lingam—) My (Shiva's) image in the form of the Shiva-Lingam should be offered worship during the time of the Aadra Nakshatra (an asterism known as Aadra), on the full moon day, on the new moon day, the Vyatipaata Yoga (the seventeenth astrological union of stars), on the occasion of eclipses (solar and lunar), and on the day of the Sakranti (the summer and winter solstice).

During these days, worship should be done by first offering libations followed by oblations. For this, the following items are to be used—sesame seeds, rice, barley, three leaves of the Bilva tree, clarified butter made from the milk of the Kapila cow, scents and fragrances, incense sticks, lighted lamp, sweets, fruit etc. Then flowers and water in cupped palms of the hands should be offered most respectfully at the end of the worship.

By offering worship and service to me with devotion and faith, the devotee obtains Sayujya Mukti (i.e. he becomes one with me).

If the worship is done with rice of quantity that is one hundred times that used for standard routine worship (i.e. roughly 100 kilograms or 1 quintal), the worshipper obtains the abode of the Moon God known as Chandra-loka.

If equal quantity of sesame seeds (i.e. roughly 100 kilograms or 1 quintal) is used for worship, the worshipper obtains the abode of the Vayu God (the Wind God).

If equal quantity of horse beans (i.e. roughly 100 kilograms or 1 quintal) is used for worship, the worshipper obtains the abode of the Varun God (the Water God).

If equal quantity of barley (i.e. roughly 100 kilograms or 1 quintal) is used for worship, the worshipper obtains the abode of the Surya God (the Sun God).

If twice the above amount of items are used for worship (i.e. if roughly 200 kilograms or 2 quintals are used), the worshipper obtains the higher heaven known as the Swarga-loka.

If four times the above quantity of items are used for offering worship to me (i.e. if roughly 400 kilograms or 4 quintals are used), the worshipper obtains the abode known as Brahma-loka, or the abode of Brahma the creator.

If worship is offered to me or my Lingam by using the items needed for such worship measuring one hundred times than the standard offerings (i.e. if roughly  $100 \times 100 = 10,000$  kilograms or 100 quintals are used), the worshipper is freed from the jurisdiction of death, or clutches of death, as far as the Brahm-Kosha. [That is, he is freed from the fear of death till the time the creator would be born again. The word 'Kosh' means the source from which Brahma the creator was born, the point of time when Brahma was born. Refer paragraph no. 20 of this Canto 2 below.]

Since he is my devotee, he crosses over from the abode of Brahma and reaches my abode known as the Shiva-Loka that is beyond it. There is no abode or heaven better than it. He becomes free from all miseries and sorrows upon attaining it. He is freed from all fetters and encumbrances that had kept him shackled.

By worshipping me in my form as the Lingam, ascetics have attained great mystical powers. Those who do fire sacrifices (i.e. the worshippers of the sacred fire) are actually offering their obeisance to me when they offer their oblations to the sacred fire. It is me whose magnificence, holiness, eclectic glories and divine virtues are sung and lauded by the Vedas in their hymns.

It is proved beyond doubt by the great scriptures such as the Vedangas (branches of Vedas), the Upanishads, and the Itihasas (ancient mythological histories) that there is nothing besides me in this creation. Everything is me; everything is established in me; I am the foundation and basis of everything. [This is because Lord Shiva is the supreme transcendental Brahm personified. Nothing exists in this creation that is not Brahm; it is Brahm who has manifested or revealed in every single unit of creation.] [15]”

The significance of the moon on his forehead, and his five heads and the ten arms—

Lord Shiva has been depicted in the Purans as having a crescent moon on his forehead. The moon is said to have sixteen Kalaas or phases, symbolising the sixteen Kalaas or aspects out of the total of sixty four Kalaas of the supreme Brahm. These sixteen Kalaas represent the visible world which is one fourth part of the entire creation consisting of the remaining of the Kalaas of Brahm. The visible world is called ‘one Pada’ or one leg or one aspect or Kalaa of Brahm. So, Shiva is the Lord who presides over the entire visible part of creation, and this world is his ornamentation in the sense that the Lord appears to be so beautiful if we consider the beauty of Nature as the astounding beauty and the expert craftsmanship of Shiva on display.

The moon present on Shiva’s forehead also stands for the various eclectic qualities called Kalaas that he possesses and which adorn him like the moon. Symbolically, the devotee is advised to follow the example of his chosen deity Lord Shiva and note the symbolism of the Moon on his head. These eclectic qualities should be as prominent as the moon on the head of Shiva and they should form an integral part of the character of the devotee if he wishes to place himself in the position of being called a sincere follower and worshipper of Lord Shiva. Now let us have a glimpse of these Kalaas. They are the various eclectic qualities or attributes that an exalted man should possess, and briefly they are the following—(i) Shraddha (श्रद्धा—faith, believe, conviction, reverence, respect, devotion), (ii) Pran (प्राण—life; the very essence of creation; the vibrations of life; the rhythm and essential functions pertaining to life), (iii) Akash (आकाश—the all-pervading, all-encompassing sky or space element), (iv) Vayu (वायु—wind, air element), (v) Tej (तेज—energy, splendour, radiance, glory, might, majesty and fire element), (vi) Apaha (अपः—water element which is the all-important ingredient for life), (vii) ‘Prithivi’ (पृथ्वी—earth element which is the base or foundation for all mortal creation), (viii) Indriya (इन्द्रिय—the organs of the body, both the organs of perception as well as of action), (ix) Mana (मन—the mind and heart complex and their stupendous potentials), (x) Anna (अन्न—food, the element without which life is simply not imaginable because it provides it with the basic nourishment and energy), (xi) Virya (वीर्य—semen, sperms, standing for courage, valour, potency, vitality and prowess), (xii) Tapa (तपः—austerity and penance, tolerance of hardship as a means of penitence, forbearance as well as carrying out strict religious vows in order to purify one's self) (xiii) Mantra (मन्त्र—the ability to give good advise, the power to contemplate and think, concentrate and focus, logically arrive at a conclusion), (xiv) Karma (कर्म—taking actions and doing deeds), (xv) Loka (लोक—worldly interactions and behaviours), and (xvi) Naam (नाम—good name, fame, reputation, honour and glory).

Reference should be made to the Chandogya Upanishad, 6/7/1-6 of Sam Veda tradition in this context.

The five heads of Shiva stand for the 'Panch Vyom' or the five forms that the sky element is said to have. According to Vedanta, the concept of the sky or 'Akash' has many connotations. According to one interpretation, there are five subtle skies representing the space surrounding the five sheaths or Koshas present in the body of a creature. They are the sheaths that surround the Atma and are called 'Panch Akash'. These are the following—(1) the Food Sheath called Anna Maye Kosh; (2) the Vital Air Sheath called Pran Maye Kosh; (3) the Mental Sheath called Manomaye Kosh; (4) the Intelluctual Sheath called Vigyan Maye Kosh; and (5) the Bliss Sheath called Anand Maye Kosh. Refer—Mudgal Upanishad, 4/5 of the Rig Veda.

The ten arms of Shiva stand for the ten forms of the subtle sky element. They are the following—(1) Ghataakash—the space inside a hollow pot; (2) Mathakash—the space inside a holy building, such as a holy shrine, a monastery, an abbey etc.; (3) Hridayakash—the subtle space inside the heart; (4) Akash—the vacant or blank space above the earth; (5) Suryakash—the space of the solar system; the space around the sun, or the solar system illuminated by the light of the sun; (6) Paraakash—the space above or beyond the solar system, it is said to burn with the celestial fire; (7) Mahakash—the great sky that is aglow with divine illumination, the heaven; that space which is radiant with a divine glow; (8) Paramakash—the supreme sky beyond the Mahakash, it is said to be very magnificent and encloses everything that exists, including all the other skies; that space which is illuminated, all pervading, all encompassing and full of bliss and felicity; (9) Tattwakash—the elementary space that is at the core of the concept of space, or the space that surrounds the basic elements of creation; by natural corollary it refers to the subtle, sublime, ethereal and supreme space where the eternal, transcendental Brahm has his abode because Brahm is the cause of all the basic elements of creation; there is complete beatitude and felicity there; that space which surrounds the essential truth known as Brahm; and (10) Anatariksha—the physical space where stars are present in deep space; the intergalactic space. Besides these, there is one more space called 'Swarga' which means heaven or the Duloka.

These skies have been ascribed different names just to facilitate understanding, and not because any one form of sky is fundamentally different from the other. For example, the space present inside the mud-pot, called the Ghata-kash, is the same as the space present outside the body of the pot. When the pot is broken, the demarcation wall of the body of the pot is removed, and both the space inside and outside of the erstwhile pot become indistinguishably and inseparably the same. Therefore, the various names are artificial and misnomers.

To quote Yogtattva Upanishad, verse no. 100—"This Lord Shiva is most pure and immaculate, and as clear and clean as pure crystal<sup>1</sup>. He has a crescent moon tucked in the lock of hairs on his head. He has five mouths, is very sober, gentle and pleasant, has ten arms and three eyes (100).

The significance of the serpents wrapped around his body—The snakes that are wrapped around Lord Shiva show that he is beyond the power of death and poison.

These coiled serpents around his body indicate the fact that he constantly reminds himself of imminent death, because serpents are very poisonous and symbolise immediate death. They also remind him about the unholy and poisonous nature of the gross world. This helps him to remain focused on his spiritual aim of self-realisation instead of being attracted by the material charms of this material world of sense objects and getting deluded by them.

The serpents also signify that Shiva is the Lord of death; he is death personified. Since he is able to wrap the serpents around his body and they cannot harm him, it indicates the fact that he has conquered death. That is why he is called 'Mrityunjay', the conqueror of death.

Again, the coiled serpents represent the Kundalini, the coiled subtle cosmic energy center at the base of the spine which when activated can entitle the spiritual aspirant to experience a burst of stupendous spiritual energy which provides him a glimpse of his own divine powers as well as the powers of the cosmic Consciousness present inside his bosom as his Atma. This Kundalini is activated by doing numerous Yoga exercises as described in the Upanishads on the subject of Yoga.

The coiled serpents may also represent cycles of time in the macrocosm and the basic energy of life in the microcosm in the form of sexual energy.

These reptiles are very ferocious, dangerous, poisonous, and a symbol of male potency. The symbolism is that Shiva is a very potent God who can be extremely ruthless and unforgiving towards sinful creatures. He has exercised extreme self control and has 'girdled' or readied himself in preparation for enduring the greatest of hardships and sufferance for self-realisation as well as to provide the world with liberation and deliverance. The serpents warn his enemies not to fool around with him. That is also why he has fire in one of his hands. This fire signifies his ability to reduce to ashes the entire physical world consisting of falsehood and sins as well as eliminate all impurities, imperfections, faults and shortcomings that cripple the creature's spiritual well being.

The Trident of Lord Shiva is known as 'Trishul', and it represents the three Gunas, or the three natural tendencies or the three fundamental qualities that are inherent in this creation and they govern all characteristics in the living world. These three Gunas are known respectively as the Sata Guna, the Raja Guna, and the Tama Guna.

The Trident is known as the 'Trishul', and is one of the most popular symbols associated with Lord Shiva. It is a weapon used by Lord Shiva for the restoration of Dharma. But the Trishul has a deeper symbolic meaning as follows—

The Trishul symbolizes the balance of the three forces of preservation, creation and destruction. It represents the three aspects of consciousness—cognition, conation and affection.

The sound of Shiva's two-sided drum represents the cosmic sound known as Naad that reverberates in the background of the cosmos. This sound is symbolically represented by the sound that is produced by uttering the word OM.

The vehicle or mount of Lord Shiva is the white bull called the Nandi—which means the cheerful one, the joyful one. The bull on which Lord Shiva rides represents virility and strength, the animal-like power and basic instincts in a man.

In Shiva temples, there is always a reclining bull placed in front of the chief shrine or just outside it, with the head turned away from the deity but the gaze fixed on it. It is interpreted as the Jivatma, the individual soul of all living being, with its animal-like nature pulling it away from God, but the Lord's grace pulling it back towards him.

Lord Shiva is often depicted in the Purans and imagery as seated on a tiger skin or wears a tiger skin. Here, the tiger represents the stupendous power of the mind.

Lord Shiva lives on Mount Kailas that is located in the northern side of the mighty mountain range known as the Himalayas.

What is the Importance of having devotion for Lord Shiva according to Tulsidas?

Well, there are several reasons for it: One, that Lord Shiva was worshipped by Lord Ram himself, and the Lord asserted that without having faith and devotion for Lord Shiva, one cannot attain him; Two, that Lord Shiva worships Lord Ram and uses Ram's holy name as the Mantra for his spiritual pursuits; Three, the divine story of Lord Ram itself was conceived by Lord Shiva in his Mana (heart and mind) when he was meditating; Four, Lord Shiva is so devoted to Lord Ram that he even mutters the holy name of Lord Ram in the ears of a dying creature to ensure the soul's liberation and deliverance from the cycle of transmigration, and to provide the creature with emancipation and salvation; Five, Tulsidas says that it is due to Lord Shiva's grace and blessings that he had developed devotion for Lord Ram and was able to narrate the divine story of the latter in his book 'Ram Charit Manas' which the reader is currently reading.

Tulsidas has sung the glories of Lord Shiva in his book Kavitaawali in its Uttar Kand, verse nos. 149—164.

In another great and legendary narration of Lord Ram's divine story, the famous 'Adhyatma Ramayan' by sage Veda Vyas, the classifier of the Vedas and the author of the Purans, it is stated that after being crowned as the king of Ayodhya, Lord Ram had established countless numbers of Shiva Lingams in his kingdom—refer: Adhyatma Ramayan, Uttar Kand, Canto 4, verse nos. 27.}] baiṭhē sōha kāmariṇi kaisēm. dharēm sarīru sāntarasu jaisēm. 1.

pārabatī bhala avasaru jānī. gaīm sambhu pahim mātu bhavānī. 2.

While Lord Shiva, who was a vanquisher of Kamdeo (the patron deity of passion and lust)<sup>1</sup>, sat calmly (under the shade of the magnificent Banyan tree), he looked truly like a personification of the grand virtues of peace, tranquility, bliss and beatitude. (1)

Observing that it was the right opportunity, mother goddess Parvati (the consort of Shiva) went near Lord Shiva<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This episode is narrated in detail in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 82—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 87. Lord Shiva had burnt Kamdeo to ashes when the latter tried to disturb his meditation. This is why Lord Shiva is also called ‘Kaamaari’-one who had slayed Kamdeo.

<sup>2</sup>Parvati was fully aware of her husband’s stern nature. She had heard how Lord Shiva had angrily burnt Kamdeo to ashes. She had also experienced Shiva’s nature of not liking any kind of disturbance when he is meditating; she was also aware of the fact that Shiva is also known as ‘Rudra’, a personified form of anger and wrath. She herself was at the receiving end of Shiva’s curse when he had abandoned her in her previous birth as Sati. {We have read about it earlier in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 57.}

So therefore, she was waiting for an opportunity when she can approach Lord Shiva and frankly speak to him, without fear of being punished or rebuked. Now she saw that Lord Shiva was in a calm mood; he was relaxed and cheerful as was evident from his calm demeanours and the smile on his face.

One must do anything at the right time and when the right opportunity presents its self in order to achieve success. There are other instances in Ram Charit Manas where we read this same thing—that a good use is made of the right opportunity. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 89; (ii) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 191; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 314; (iv) Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 321; (b) Ayodhya Kand, (v) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 281; (c) Aranya Kand, (vi) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 41; (d) Sundar Kand, (v) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 38; (e) Lanka Kand, (vi) Doha no. 114-b.}

baiṭhīṁ siva samīpa haraṣāī. pūruba janma kathā cita āī. 4.

When Lord Shiva saw his dear consort approaching him, he welcomed her warmly and most affectionately, offering her a seat to his left to sit down<sup>1</sup>. (3)

She sat down cheerfully near Lord Shiva. The events of her previous life became fresh in her memory<sup>2</sup>. (4)

At that time, Lord Shiva was also in a calm mood, so he could have easily forgiven Sati if she had begged for forgiveness. But as was the fiat of fate, she behaved otherwise, and to add fuel to the fire she defied Shiva's advice not to go to attend her father's fire sacrifice program as he was opposed to her husband Lord Shiva. Obviously, Sati's insistence on going and defying Shiva's advice was not acceptable to him, and so he decided to finally discard Sati for good. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 61—to Doha no. 62.}]

<sup>2</sup>Parvati recalled how she was made to sit in front by Lord Shiva when she approached him in her previous life when she was called Sati. Now that Shiva had offered her a seat to his left assured Parvati that the Lord has at last forgiven her. She felt extremely glad and happy.

She recalled the events of her past life, as those events still intrigued her much. The main cause of Lord Shiva abandoning her was her doubts about Lord Ram. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 50—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 54.}]

So, now finding her husband in a peaceful mood, she wished to ask him once again about the truth of Lord Ram, as this question was constantly nagging her since those last events.]

पति हियँ हेतु अधिक अनुमानी । बिहसि उमा बोलीं प्रिय बानी ॥ ५ ॥

pati hiyaṁ hētu adhika anumānī. bihasi umā bōlīm priya bānī. 5.
kathā jō sakala lōka hitakārī. sō'i pūchana caha sailakumārī. 6.

Realising that her husband had more affection for her this time than what he had for her in the previous meeting with him (in her last birth as Sati)<sup>1</sup>, Uma (Parvati) smiled pleasantly and said words that were sweet to hear (because now she felt encouraged to ask Lord Shiva certain questions that had been troubling her for long). (5)

Verily indeed, Parvati, the daughter of the king of mountains (sailakumārī), wished to ask about the divine story (of Lord Ram) that would be exceptionally good and auspicious for the whole world<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Sati had last met Lord Shiva before going to her father's place where she burnt herself in disgust upon finding that Lord Shiva was publicly rebuked. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 60—to Doha no. 64.}]

<sup>2</sup>The difference between this meeting and the previous one is obvious here: In the earlier meeting, Sati was very skeptical about Lord Ram's divinity as well as her husband, Lord Shiva's wisdom in bowing to Lord Ram and praising him. But this time around, her approach is different—she now wishes that Lord Shiva narrate to her the whole divine story of Lord Ram. Here she does not cast aspersions either on Lord Ram or Lord Shiva's wisdom in worshipping the former.

She simply wants this divine story to be told, not only for herself but also for the good of the rest of the world. It was a charitable approach, done with a pure intention, without a trace of deceit or conceit, and therefore it was perfectly correct and acceptable to Lord Shiva, for he would willingly start the narration soon.]

Oh Lord, your holy name is like the all wish-fulfilling Tree, known as the ‘Kalpa Tree’, for those who come to seek refuge at your holy feet. [To wit, your holy name fulfils the desires of all your devotees; they get what they want by chanting your divine Mantras.] (Doha no. 107) tau prabhu harahu mōra agyānā. kahi raghunātha kathā bidhi nānā. 2.

Oh Lord who is an embodiment of blissfulness and joy (sukharāsī)! If thou art pleased with me, and consider me as thy true and faithful maid<sup>1</sup> --- (1),

--- Then oh Lord, please be kind to remove my ignorance and get rid of my delusions by telling me the mystical story of Lord Ram in a comprehensive and extensive manner, narrating it from different angles, weaving in thy narration the many reasons for the origin of the story and why Lord Ram had to take birth as a human being, as well as the many intricate details of the story-line itself<sup>2</sup>.

[Oh Lord, also be kind to put in a word of advice and caution here and there throughout thy narrative so as to clear doubts on the spot and prevent the mind from getting distracted and confused.] (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The word 'maid' does not mean a maidservant here in its literal term: one who does all the manual household chores of her lord. Here it means a wife who is very devoted and loyal to her husband, and who serves him faithfully and diligently.

<sup>2</sup>Parvati wished to delve deep into the mystery of Lord Ram in order to remove her doubts about him and become firm in her devotion for the Lord just like her husband Lord Shiva was. She knew that Lord Shiva was well acquainted with all the mystical aspects of Lord Ram, and so he was best suited as a teacher who could reveal everything to her and remove her delusions about Lord Ram.

Since she asked Lord Shiva to tell her the story of Lord Ram in a comprehensive manner, incorporating in it the different versions of the origin of the story, as well as the many details that vary from one version of the story from the other, Lord Shiva obliges her by telling the story in great detail, incorporating many different reasons for its origin, and variations in detail of the story-line itself in his own narrative. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) from Doha no. 120—to Doha no. 124; (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 140—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 141; (iii) Doha no. 152 and Chaupai line no. 1 that follows it.}

Shiva concluded his narration by telling Parvati that he has told her the divine story of Lord Ram as he observed that she was sincere in her quest to learn about the truth of the Lord and hear his glories, and then wound up his discourse by outlining the spiritual rewards that accrue to one who is fortunate to hear and read it. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 128; and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 129.}

And indeed it was so—for Parvati acknowledges her total satisfaction; she thanked her husband Lord Shiva for fulfilling her quest for truthful knowledge, as a result of which devotion for Lord Ram took firm roots in her heart. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 129.}

Why should anyone who resides under the shade of the Kalpa Tree, the all wish-fulfilling tree, suffer from grief arising from any kind of unfulfilled desire or unsatisfied wants?<sup>1</sup> (3)

Keeping this point in mind (and considering me to be an honest seeker of truth and knowledge), oh Lord for whom the crescent moon is an ornament (sasibhūṣana)<sup>2</sup>, please be gracious and kind to dispel my delusions and ignorance that have baffled my mind and confused my intellect<sup>3</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, since I have the good fortune to have you, the all-knowing Lord of the Universe and the greatest devotee of Lord Ram, as my beloved husband and well-wisher, why should I not enjoy the bliss that comes with hearing the divine story of Lord Ram in its entirety; why should any trace of doubt linger in me as to the holiness and divinity of Lord Ram with you by my side? It would be like the case of a person living right below the famed Kalpa Tree and still suffering from unsatisfied desires.

Oh Lord! Wise and enlightened sages assert that Lord Ram is the Supreme Being, known as ‘Brahm’, who is eternal and infinite (brahma anādī)<sup>1</sup>. (5)

Lord Ram’s divine glories are sung in laudatory terms by all those who are competent in this field, such as Lord Seshnath (the celestial serpent with his thousand tongues), goddess Saraswati (the patron deity of knowledge, speech and wisdom), the Vedas (ancient scriptures which are repositories of all knowledge) and the Purans (ancient histories)<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A similar idea is expressed in Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, Doha no. 198; (b) Aranya Kand, Chanda line nos. 9-10 that precede Doha no. 32; and (c) Kishkindha Kand, Chanda line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 10.

Oh Lord who had vanquished Kaam (anamṅa ārātī; the patron deity of lust and passion who had been tormenting you)<sup>1</sup>! Even thou repeat the divine name of Lord Ram day and night with great reverence<sup>2</sup>. (7)

Is Lord Ram who had taken birth as a son of the king of Ayodhya the same Lord who is famed as the Supreme Being having no birth, no attributes, and who is all-pervading, invisible and beyond perception, or are these two forms of Lord Ram separate and different from one another<sup>3</sup>? (8)

(who is known as the Supreme Being and praised by great sages, Vedas, goddess Saraswati, Lord Seshnath etc.) the same;

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Kamdeo, the deity of lust and passion, is called “anamṅa”, one without a physical body, because he has no perceptible and visible form as he lives quietly in the heart of a person and controls his passions and lustful desires from within. The word “ārātī” means one who torments, one who is aggressive and an intruder, one who creates chaos and uneasiness. Surely these are the characters of Kamdeo. Hence, he is referred to as “anamṅa ārātī”

Lord Shiva had himself named Kamdeo as ‘anamṅa’—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 87.

<sup>2</sup>There are umpteen numbers of verses in Ram Charit Manas where we read this fact. For instance, refer to: Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 3, 8 that precede Doha no. 19; (ii) Doha no. 46 and Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes it; (iii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 60; (iv) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 119.

<sup>3</sup>We have read earlier that Lord Shiva has already answered such questions of Parvati in her previous birth when she was called Sati, but she was so stubborn that she still persisted with her doubts. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 35—to Sortha no. 51.

But this time around her attitude had changed, for she had suffered for her impertinence; now she seemed ready to accept the truth, and had no inclination to argue with and challenge Lord Shiva’s wisdom. This is very clear by Parvati’s own admission in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5 and 7 that precede Doha no. 109 that she does not suffer from the same degree of delusions as was the case during her previous birth as Sati, but she still wishes to get rid of whatever little doubts that still linger on in her mind. This will also be clear when we read how Lord Shiva welcomed her question, without getting annoyed as he was the last time, though he regretted that she still harboured doubts in her mind—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no. 114.

But at the same time, Shiva was also pleased with her as she has given him the chance to recall the divine story of Lord Ram once again to purify his mind and speech, and feel blessed thereby. It will also give the world a chance to hear the story of Lord Ram in detail. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 112—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 113; (ii) Doha no. 115.

And finally we read that Shiva had succeeded in his effort to convince Parvati about the divinity and holiness of Lord Ram—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 129 along with Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede it.]

If Lord Ram is indeed the Supreme Being known as Brahm, then why was he so upset at losing his wife Sita<sup>1</sup>? This has completely baffled me.

The Lord's deeds are at odds and incompatible with what one expects in the background of his fame and glories as a Supreme Being. This has confounded my intellect and bewildered me. (Doha no. 108)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This was the primary reason which had confused Sati, and culminated in Lord Shiva abandoning her because she defied all his advice and went to test Lord Ram by assuming the form of Sita herself. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 48—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 57.

Oh my Lord (nātha)! If Lord Ram is someone else who has no desires (anīha), who is sublime, all-pervading and omnipresent (byāpaka), and who is the Supreme Lord of creation known as Brahm, the Lord who has a cosmic existence in the form of the Supreme Consciousness (bibhu)<sup>1</sup>—then please enlighten me about that form of Lord Ram who is Brahm too<sup>2</sup>. (1)

Please do not get annoyed with me for my delusion and folly, because I am humble, meek, ignorant and innocent. Taking into consideration my earnest quest to know the truth, and my innocence and humility, be gracious, oh kind Lord, to take necessary steps that would dispel my ignorance and delusions (and give me peace of mind)<sup>3</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 13 which reiterates this idea that Lord Ram is indeed Brahm with the characters mentioned by Parvati—viz. “anīha, byāpaka, bibhu”.

Earlier too, Parvati in her previous life as Sati had a similar doubt about Lord Ram’s truth—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 50.

<sup>2</sup>Parvati was not alone to have such delusions about Lord Ram. Even great sages were not spared from such delusions regarding the truth of Lord Ram. The best example is that of sage Bharadwaj who expresses the same sort of confusion and doubts pertaining the divinity and holiness of Lord Ram, about the reality and the truth of the Lord, when he asked sage Yagyawalkya to enlighten him on this subject. The learned sage Yagyawalkya did not get angry, but said that it was an opportunity to narrate the divine story of Lord Ram which is good for one and all. This conversation appears in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 45—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 47.

Then we have the instance of Garud, the mount of Lord Vishnu. He too was confounded by the way Lord Ram behaved like an ordinary human being inspite of being the Supreme Being himself. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Doha no. 55—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 62; and (ii) Sortha no. 68—to Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 69.

<sup>3</sup>Parvati was well aware of the risk of annoying Shiva; so she is very polite, humble and submissive in her query. She gives no hint of stubbornness or any intention to test Lord Shiva’s wisdom and knowledge. She says that as an honest seeker of truth she is within her right to approach a wise teacher to remove doubts and become enlightened, and at the same time the teacher too is obliged to tell her what she wishes to learn. She has not come to Shiva with a skeptical mind, but with a sincere desire to become enlightened.

Lord Shiva must have frowned at Parvati as she began asking him questions regarding Lord Ram, and this alerted her. She did not want to repeat the bad events of her previous life when the same sort of questioning had provoked her husband to abandon her. Her apprehensions were, to some extent, correct as soon we shall read that Shiva has expressed his annoyance at her for doubting Lord Ram—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 114 along with Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede it. So, Parvati immediately begged forgiveness and pre-empted any unsavoury development from precipitating.]

mair̥ṁ bana dīkhi rāma prabhutā'ī. ati bhaya bikala na tumhahi sunā'ī. 3.
tadapi malina mana bōdhu na āvā. sō phalu bhalī bhām̐ti hama pāvā. 4.

I had witnessed the mystical aspects of Lord Ram and experienced his divine powers and glories, but I was so stunned and scared of repercussions of my misdemeanours at the time that I dared not divulge anything to you, and thought it better to keep my discretion and hold the developments as a secret<sup>1</sup>. (3)

Still my mind is so stupid and dumb that it could not become wiser, it could not convince itself about the truth of Lord Ram's divinity, and I have already suffered gravely on account of it<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In her previous birth as Sati, Parvati had gone to test Lord Ram's powers and had disguised herself as Sita, the Lord's wife, to see if the Lord knew who she actually was. As it turned out, Lord Ram smiled at her, immediately recognizing her as Sati, the consort of Lord Shiva; then he asked where her husband Shiva was, why was she wondering alone in the forest, and asked her to say his respect to her husband when she went back. Not only this, when the dazed and amazed Sati turned back to go to where Lord Shiva waited for her, she was stunned to see a magical scene—so many forms of Lord Ram and Sita, and each form was being served by numerous gods and goddesses. She saw the Lord everywhere before her, behind her, by the side of her, above her.

The sight numbed her senses; for some moment her mind was befuddled and her intellect muddled and completely lost its bearing. She was so terrified with what she had witnessed that more than this experience itself what worried her much was what answer would she now give to Lord Shiva when he asked her what she had found out about Lord Ram. She realized to her consternation and dismay that unwittingly she has offended Lord Shiva by defying him and questioning his wisdom. 'Oh gosh', she shuddered at the very thought, 'what will happen now to me?'

So she decided not to tell Lord Shiva about her experiences and what she witnessed. Eventually she lied to her husband, but Lord Shiva closed his eyes, and with the aid of his transcendental powers learnt about Sati's impertinent deeds that amounted to a grave sin. As a punishment, Lord Shiva decided to forsake her.

We have already read these events earlier in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 52—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 57.

<sup>2</sup>“Oh Lord”, quoth Parvati, “I was discarded by thee. But still I continued to defy thee, and went to attend my father's fire sacrifice against thine advise not to do so, where I burnt myself by jumping into the fire pit in aggravated anger. How much I suffered due to my stupidity and stubbornness! I sincerely regret it and ask for forgiveness.”

All the above developments are narrated in detail in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 57—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 64.]

Some doubt still lingers on in my mind. I join my palms in supplication before you with a humble and polite request to please be kind upon me. (5)

Oh gracious Lord (prabhu)! During our previous interaction, you had tried repeatedly to convince me and explain to me the truth (about Lord Ram), but unfortunately I had paid no heed then<sup>1</sup>. So Lord, do not become angry with me this time by recalling my previous impertinence. [Why? The answer is given in the next verse that follows herein below.] (6)

kahahu punīta rāma guna gāthā. bhujagarāja bhūṣana suranāthā. 8.

Oh Lord! I don't have the same sort of delusions nor doubts (about the divinity and mystical powers of Lord Ram) that I had the last time<sup>1</sup>. This time around, however, I have keen interest in the story of Lord Ram with a sincere desire to hear it in detail. (7)

Therefore oh Lord of the Gods (suranāthā), and the one who uses serpents as his ornament (bhujagarāja bhūṣana)! Please be kind to tell me the most holy and purifying story of Lord Ram in detail<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Parvati is obviously referring to her previous birth as Sati when she was utterly confounded when she saw her husband, Lord Shiva, showing so much respect to and becoming overwhelmed with emotions when he saw Lord Ram whom Sati, on the contrary, thought to be an ordinary human being because of the Lord's ordinary human-like behaviour, for he grieved at the loss of his wife Sita who was abducted by the demon king Ravana, and was frantically searching for her in the wilds as if he did not know who had taken her away or what had actually happened to her, inspite of the fact that Lord Shiva asserted to Sati that Lord Ram was none else but the all-knowing and all-powerful Supreme Being himself. Lord Shiva's assertions about Lord Ram and what Sati actually saw in physical terms concerning the latter did not tally with each other, which made her bewildered and vexed. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 48—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 52.}

So now, how come that her doubts about Lord Ram's mystical powers and divinity were reduced to a great extent as she says presently? Well, it is because when she went to test Lord Ram disguised as Sita herself in order to see if the Lord could see through her trick and recognize her, she witnessed a scene beyond her imagination—Lord Ram not only recognized her but also bowed before her, asked about the welfare of Lord Shiva, her husband, and enquired from her why she was wondering alone in the wilds. To add to her embarrassment, she saw Lord Ram with Sita wherever her eyes could see, and all the gods and goddesses were serving them. Surely this sight convinced Sati that Lord Ram was definitely not a human being as she had assumed him to be, but was in fact what Lord Shiva had told her about him, i.e. that Lord Ram was none but the Supreme Being in his form. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 52—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 55.}

This incident, which she had witnessed herself, had convinced Parvati that Lord Ram was indeed not an ordinary human being as she thought him to be, and he himself appeared to be, but that the Lord had divine powers and mysticism about him that were in line with what Lord Shiva had asserted. So therefore, she wished to hear Lord Ram's story in detail, as all these mysterious developments had aroused in her a keen interest in the story of Lord Ram with an eagerness to delve deeper into the mysteries surrounding the Lord, and to learn more about him.

[Parvati made an earnest prayer to Lord Shiva thus—] 'I put mine head on the ground before thine holy feet, oh Lord, and pray to thee most humbly and earnestly, by joining the palms of my hands as a gesture of prayerful request to thee, to please narrate the divine story of Lord Ram by incorporating in it the essential spiritual wisdom of all the scriptures'<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 109)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This Doha itself tells us the benefits of reading Ram Charit Manas—for, one, it was narrated by Lord Shiva himself, two, that it tells us the holy story of Lord Ram who was a manifestation of the Supreme Being, and three, it contains the essential spiritual wisdom of the scriptures collected together and placed at one place.

In this context, refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 31—to Doha no. 32; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 7-13 that precede Doha no. 35; (iii) Doha no. 113—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 114.

Parvati's sincerity and politeness was evident to Lord Shiva; he was sure that this time his consort was free from the evil character of stubbornness and skepticism that had had a firm grip over her the last time she questioned him concerning Lord

Ram. So, Lord Shiva would willingly oblige her as is evident in Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 114 that would follow herein below soon.

Parvati said: “Oh merciful Lord! Glory be thine! I beg thee to tell me, thy humble maid and faithful wife, the divine story of Lord Ram in detail, in a simple language so that I can easily follow it, and include in thy narrative all the essential principles of spiritualism and metaphysics that the famed scriptures have all along been expounding, and of which you, in all sooth and without gainsay, are an expert exponent. Oh merciful Lord; I will be extremely grateful to thee! My simple mind is puzzled and befogged by the apparent contradictions in what I personally witnessed myself concerning Lord Ram as well as thine assertion about him, and what was physically seen on the ground while Lord Ram was wondering in the forest grieving and searching for his lost wife Sita, as both these things were completely at odds with each other#. I humbly request you, therefore, that as a true Guru (teacher) who is obliged to impart true knowledge to an earnest seeker who comes and submits himself or herself before the learned one, thou shouldest too enlighten me about the truth of Lord Ram, and thereby grant me peace of mind and soul. My mind and intellect have become muddled by the mystery surrounding Lord Ram, causing immense bewilderment and uneasiness to me. So oh kind Lord, please grant me thine gracious blessings in the form of narration of the holy and divine story of Lord Ram in its entirety.” {#Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 48—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 55}

One important point to be noted here is how Parvati requests Lord Shiva to tell her the story of Lord Ram, and compare it with her last interaction with her husband in her previous birth as Sati. Now she ‘puts her head on the ground before Lord Shiva, folds her hands and joins her palms to pray, and speaks in a most humble, polite and submissive way’. She even tells him that she does not have the delusions that had clouded her mind last time (refer: Chaupai line no. 7 herein above). We will observe that during her last interaction with Shiva, she appeared to be haughty and arrogant; she neither bowed before him nor seemed humble and prayerful at all. Even when Lord Shiva told her to go and test Lord Ram herself if she isn’t satisfied with what he has said, she did not as much as bow before her husband or show any sign of politeness and courtesy by seeking to take his leave before departing to test Lord Ram. And to add to her woes that compounded her follies and aggravated her indecent behavior was that when she came back to her husband, she once again did not show him basic courtesy by bowing before her husband, and made matters worse for herself by telling Lord Shiva lies that she hadn’t tested Lord Ram. This impertinent and rude behaviour of Sati had prompted Lord Shiva to abandon her. This is clear when we examine Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 55—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 57.]

Although as an ignorant woman who is not at all aware of the profundity of spiritual and metaphysical philosophies and the wonderful principles related to them as expounded in the Upanishads and other scriptures, I feel that I am not qualified to comprehend the secrets and mysteries associated with the divine play of the Supreme Being in his manifestation as Lord Ram, nor competent enough to dive into the depths of the Lord's divine story to unravel and understand it in its entirety, yet I am but your humble and faithful maid in my thoughts, deeds and words<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Verily indeed, great saints and enlightened teachers do not desist from revealing the profoundest of truths and expounding upon the greatest of mysteries<sup>2</sup> whenever they find an earnest seeker of knowledge pleading before them to be enlightened about it. (2)

Oh venerable Lord of the Gods (surarāyā)! This being the case, I plead before you most humbly and prayerfully to be kind upon me and narrate the divine story of Lord Raghubir (Lord Ram, the brave Lord of king Raghu's line).<sup>3</sup> (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Parvati has said this same thing in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 120.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Ram's story is no ordinary story; it has great depth and profound spiritual import; it is pregnant with metaphysical principles that present the essence of the scriptures. Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Doha no. 30-b; (ii) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 47.

<sup>3</sup>“Oh venerable Lord”, quoth Parvati, “So therefore, inspite of my being in-eligible to hear the divine story of Lord Ram and competent to understand its deep meaning, I still nevertheless think I am qualified to hear it at least, because, for one, I am a faithful and loyal follower of thine honourable self, being thy faithful wife, and second, being free from pretensions and deceit, I am a sincere seeker of knowledge who wants to know the truth of Lord Ram. Lord, I am not under the cloud of delusions that had confounded me last time, but now I have a noble intention in my heart to hear the story. Further, it will serve a greater purpose—for this holy story will do good to the world at large. So therefore, even if I don't fully grasp its mysteries, yet it will help others, a reason that would in its own self justify its telling. And, since an enlightened teacher ought not to turn away a seeker of knowledge if he or she comes to him with a humble request for the same, so likewise thou art also obliged to tell me the divine story of Lord Ram to satisfy my quest for knowledge.”

Did Lord Shiva oblige Parvati? Oh yes, sure enough he did. Lord Shiva narrated the full divine story of Lord Ram to Parvati as is evident from the following verses of Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, Doha no. 120; and (b) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 52; and Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 128.]

*[Parvati now would outline herself the salient points in the story of Lord Ram which she wants to hear in detail, thereby indirectly asking Lord Shiva to tell her the story using these points as its landmarks, and not to miss anyone of them in his narrative, so that she can easily follow it. It also shows that Parvati was not totally ignorant about the story of Lord Ram as she knew its main outline, but what confounded her intellect and left her confused was the apparent mismatch between Lord Ram's human-like behaviour, as she had seen him wondering in the forest in search of his lost wife Sita, grieving for her and looking devastated at her lost, and what Lord Shiva had asserted about him as being a manifested form of the Supreme Being who is almighty, all-knowing, all-powerful and the Lord of the world. If Shiva was correct, reasoned Parvati, how come Lord Ram did not know who stole Sita, and what was the need for seeking help from the monkeys and bears to free her from the clutches of the demon king Ravana when Lord Ram could have easily slayed her abductor by mere his wish as he was the omnipotent Supreme Being as Lord Shiva affirmed?]

This was the reason why Parvati wished to hear the story once again to remove her doubts about Lord Ram that lingered on in her mind and had been nagging her since her last birth as Sati. So she says—]

To begin with, first of all please tell me why the Supreme Being who has no form and attributes, as his presence in this creation is subtle, invisible and all-pervasive, had assumed a visible form that had many physical attributes and characters<sup>1</sup>. (4)

Then, please narrate about the manifestation of this Supreme Being in the form of Lord Ram, incorporating details about Lord Ram's birth and his many childhood deeds<sup>2</sup>. (5)

Then, tell me about the Lord's marriage to Janki (Sita, the daughter of king Janak)<sup>3</sup>.

Next, please narrate why Lord Ram had to discard his kingdom and go to the forest; who was responsible for this sad development, and how did it unfold<sup>4</sup>. (6)

Please tell me all about the Lord's life in the forest where he stayed for quite a time<sup>5</sup>, and then tell me how and why he slew the demon king Ravana<sup>6</sup>. (7)

Finally, Lord Ram came back and was crowned as the King of his kingdom (of Ayodhya)<sup>7</sup>, after which he ruled wisely like a great and noble King, doing auspicious deeds and ruling in accordance to the laws of righteousness<sup>8</sup>.

Oh gracious and kind Lord Shiva, the Lord who grants peace, bliss and happiness (saṅkara sukhasilā)! Please tell everything in detail. (8)

[Note—*Parvati has outlined the whole story of the Ramayana here: right from the beginning where we read about the cause of Lord Vishnu manifesting as Lord Ram, followed by the Lord's birth in Ayodhya, his childhood days, marriage with Sita, going to the forest, life in the forest, killing of the demons in the fierce war of Lanka, his coming back to ascend the throne of Ayodhya, and culminating with the description of the Lord's long rule as a noble and righteous King-Emperor of a mighty kingdom.

We shall read by-and-by that Lord Shiva has specifically answers this query of Parvati, that she wants to hear “why Brahm had manifested as Lord Ram”, in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 141 where he tells her that he would narrate the reason why the supreme Brahm manifested in this world as a king of Ayodhya known as Lord Ram. Lord Shiva then proceeds to narrate two particular events in this context—one was the event of Manu and Satrupa doing severe Tapa (penance and austerity) which pleased Brahm who appeared before them, and then promised the couple that he would become their son as they wished it to be so*; and then the second event was of king Pratapbhanu who had been cursed to become demon Ravana, upon which the gods had prayed to Brahm to protect them against the tyranny unleashed by him#. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, *Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 142—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 152; and #Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 153—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 187.}

How do we know that during these two events it was Brahm, the Supreme Being who represents cosmic Consciousness, and who is the Father of the entire creation, who was speaking? The answer is clearly found when we read these two events—for the Lord who spoke on both these occasions, first to Manu and Satrupa, and then to gods and mother earth, was Brahm who had no form but whose voice filled the whole sky as if the entire firmament was speaking. It is because Brahm is a personified form of cosmic Consciousness that pervades throughout the universe and fills the whole of the sky. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 145; (ii) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 150; (iii) Doha no. 186; (iv) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 187.}

bahuri kahahu karunāyatana kīnha jō acaraja rāma.
prajā sahita raghubansamani kimi gavanē nija dhāma. 110.

Oh merciful Lord (karunāyatana)! Then, finally to conclude the narration, please tell me the strange and mystical event when Lord Ram, the jewel of king Raghu's line of great and famous Kings of Ayodhya (raghubansamani) left this mortal world and went to his primary abode in the heaven along with all the subjects of his kingdom<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 110)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It is to be noted here that this particular question of Parvati was not specifically answered by Lord Shiva in his narration of Ram Charit Manas that is available to us and which we are reading presently. However, in all other versions of the story of the Ramayana, this episode is narrated in detail. Refer: Adhyatma Ramayan of sage Veda Vyas, Uttar Kand, Canto nos. 8 and 9. An English version of the Adhyatma Ramayan has been written and published by this humble author and is available at the same online internet platforms from the learned reader has accessed this book Ram Charit Manas.

Now, the question arises: why has this episode not been included by Tulsidas in his version of Lord Ram's story in 'Ram Charit Manas'? Well, the probable reason is that Tulsidas was a great devotee of Lord Ram who loved his Lord so dearly and intensely that he could not bear to suffer from the grief and agony that would overwhelm him if he went on to narrate the departure of his beloved Lord Ram from this world. For Tulsidas, Lord Ram had never left the world, for in his considered opinion the Lord has an eternal presence here amongst the creatures to bless them and help them at all times.

The grief and agony of the very idea of Lord Ram departing from this world was so overpowering that it made Tulsidas feel orphaned; he swooned at the very thought that his Lord has gone somewhere else, leaving him alone in this sorrowful world. So therefore, he thought it wise and better to omit this painful event altogether.

Another reason is this: Even Lord Shiva could not come to terms with the painful idea of having to narrate the departure of Lord Ram from this world. Shiva could not gather his wits together to narrate something that was out of the question for him—because he believed, and rightly so too, that Lord Ram has an eternal presence, albeit in a subtle and sublime form, amongst us all. It is like the case of Jesus Christ: for he too was crucified and physically his body died, but his divine soul continued to live on for eternity amongst his followers, as is believed in the principle of Christ's resurrection, to bless them and help them right in this physical world. So is the case with Lord Ram—both Tulsidas and Lord Shiva could not endorse the idea of Lord Ram ever leaving this world to go elsewhere, leaving its creatures to their fate.

What is the significance of the above observations? Well, we must remember that Ram Charit Manas is a book that stresses on the virtue of devotion for Lord Ram, for its primary focus is on 'Bhakti', i.e. devotion and love for Lord Ram, as compared to other versions of the story of Ramayana where this particular virtue of Bhakti is not a prominent and defining feature of the narrative as it is in 'Ram Charit Manas', as this particular trait distinguishes this book from all other versions of the story.

A devotee can't tolerate separation from his revered and beloved deity, so speaking of the deity's leaving the devotee alone in this world is a notion with which the devotee cannot come to terms with, and this possibility is just out of the question as far as he is concerned. Since both Lord Shiva and Tulsidas are renowned devotees of Lord Ram, hence they could not bring themselves around to come to terms with the idea of Lord Ram leaving this world.

Remember: Goswami Tulsidas is the narrator of the present book 'Ram Charit Manas' that we are reading, and he quotes Lord Shiva as the primary narrator of the story. Both are sincere, faithful, ardent and dedicated devotees of Lord Ram, who venerate, worship, revere and adore the Lord as their only Lord God, Protector and Saviour. Hence, they could not cope with the notion of separation from their beloved Lord Ram on any account. Therefore, they skipped answering this particular question of Parvati as mentioned in Doha no. 110 herein above.

But it goes to Parvati's credit that she fully understood Lord Shiva's emotions that made him reluctant to describe the events leading up to Lord Ram leaving this mortal world and going to his abode in the heaven along with all those who lived with him in this world, such as the subjects of his kingdom. Her main objective in hearing the story was to remove her doubts about the divinity of Lord Ram, and to be convinced that he was not an ordinary human prince as his worldly deeds mislead one to think him to be, but the Supreme Being himself in his form, and therefore Lord Ram was to be venerated, worshipped, adored and praised as a personification of the Supreme Being himself.

The fact that Parvati was fully satisfied by the story which Lord Shiva had told her, and that no more doubts lingered in her mind inspite of her last question remaining unanswered is clear in the concluding verses of Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 129 along with Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede it. She never asked Lord Shiva why he didn't answer this question of hers.

To wit, she realized that for a devotee, the Lord God is always with him, for the Lord is eternal and infinite, he is the cosmic Spirit and supreme Consciousness that are beyond the purview of death and birth.]

* [Parvati continued—] ‘Oh Lord! Please expound elaborately on that essence of true spiritual knowledge and metaphysical principles (kahahu sō tattva bakhānī) which keep wise, self-realised and enlightened sages, seers, hermits and ascetics absorbed in meditation and contemplation<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Not only that, please enlighten me about the various aspects of the virtues of Bhakti (devotion and love for Lord God) and Gyan (gnosis; truthful knowledge; metaphysics, spiritual wisdom), the difference between them, and how one complements the other<sup>2</sup>. (2)

<sup>2</sup>This query of Parvati is answered in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 44—to Doha no. 46 by Lord Ram; and by Kaagbhusund in (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 85, (iii) Doha no. 90 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede it, and (iv) Doha no. 114—to Doha no. 122.

*In the verses that preceded Doha no. 110, Parvati had asked about the story of Lord Ram that describes the Lord’s ‘Saguna’ form, a form of the Supreme Being that is visible, that has attributes and characters like other mortal beings, albeit they are of a higher quality and exalted in nature, but nevertheless are related to the Lord’s life like an ordinary person in this mortal world.

But Lord Ram was no ordinary human, and the real and true benefit that one gets from hearing his story is not simple worldly entertainment to pass one’s time like one reads so many historical novels, but it is to become enlightened about spiritual and metaphysical wisdom that grants eternal peace and beatitude to the soul of the creature, helping him to attain liberation and deliverance from the cycle of transmigration, and leading to his emancipation and salvation.

Parvati’s second round of questions are aimed straight at this objective. And to speak the truth, this is the real benefit of reading the story of Ram Charit Manas; it is what distinguishes this book from other versions of the Ramayana. For, besides the process of telling the story of Lord Ram from the perspective of its historical chronology, this book Ram Charit Manas also presents to the discerning reader the essence of spiritual and metaphysical wisdom contained in the scriptures in a simple and straightforward manner, in a style that even an ordinary person can follow and understand easily, without the usual technical jargon and the complexities in the narratives so typical of ancient scriptures. In a gross mortal world that traps the creature in an endless whirlpool of miseries and pain and delusions, in which the creature swoons and yearns for deliverance, this divine story acts as a lighthouse of hope and salvation.]

jō prabhu mair̥m pūchā nahir̥m hō'ī. sō'u dayāla rākhahu jani gō'ī. 4.

Besides what I have asked, there may be many other secrets and mysteries associated with Lord Ram<sup>1</sup>. So oh venerable Lord, please be kind to narrate them too, for your knowledge and wisdom are deep and pristine pure in this regard<sup>2</sup>. (3)

Oh gracious and merciful Lord (prabhu -- dayāla)! Please do not avoid enlightening me about any other related matter even if I have inadvertently omitted it and not asked you about it specifically<sup>3</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Indeed, there really were certain things that were secret, and Lord Shiva might have desisted from telling them had Parvati not particularly requested him to divulge them too. This will be evident in the following verses of Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, (i) Doha no. 195 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that follow it (when Lord Shiva accompanied sage Kaagbhusund to witness the birth celebrations of Lord Ram); (ii) Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 318 (when goddess assumed human form and participated in the festivities during Lord Ram's marriage); (b) Aranya Kand, (iii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 23—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 24 (when Lord Ram told Sita that the time had come for her to be abducted by Ravana as it would be used as a pretext by the Lord to eliminate the demons, so she must hide her true identity and leave her shadow behind); (c) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 79—to Doha no. 82 (where we read about the mysterious event when the saintly crow Kaagbhusund had entered the mouth of Lord Ram when the Lord was yet a child, and inside the Lord's belly he could see countless universes where he kept on wondering for a long time, till finally he came out in the present world when Lord Ram opened his mouth again).

Besides the above referred instances, the holy book 'Ram Charit Manas' is full of pearls of wisdom, both spiritual and metaphysical, spread throughout its text. The author of the current English version of Ram Charit Manas, which the esteemed reader is reading presently, has collated all such pearls and threaded them together in a garland and presented them in the form of two books titled 'Ram Geeta' and 'Bhakti Sutra Mala', which the reader can easily access from the same online internet platforms from where he or she has accessed this book.

<sup>2</sup>Parvati acknowledges finally that she was in grave error in questioning Lord Shiva's wisdom during her previous life as Sati when she had not believed him when he had told her about the divinity of Lord Ram and had advised her not to doubt him in this regard—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 50—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 51.

By praising Lord Shiva's wisdom and purity of wisdom presently, Parvati intended to pre-empt the possibility of repeat of what happened to her on that previous occasion when Lord Shiva had abandoned her in annoyance of her impertinence, stupidity and stubbornness—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 56—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 57.

<sup>3</sup>The approach of Parvati is an excellent guide for a keen student and a true seeker of knowledge. First the student or the seeker must tell the teacher the specific purpose for which he has come to the latter, and then give the teacher freedom to enlighten him about any other matter which the teacher things fit to be taught even if the student or the seeker had not specified it. In this approach, the imparted knowledge becomes comprehensive and broad, for otherwise there may be many important points that would remain unknown to the student or the seeker if the teacher were to stick only to answering specific questions asked of him.]

You are the wisest teacher in all the three divisions of this world<sup>1</sup>, so affirm the Vedas. All other teachers are but lowly mortal beings, how can they compare themselves with you, and how can they know the mysteries and secrets of Lord Ram as much as you do?’ (5)

The questions of Uma (another name of Parvati) were honest queries, free from skepticism and ill-intentions, for she had no deceit, conceit and pretensions in her heart and mind. Hence, Lord Shiva was pleased by her enquiry as it appealed to his heart and mind too (for it would give him a chance to remember Lord Ram and narrate his holy story that would be for the good of the world and provide peace to him as well)<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The three divisions of the world are heaven, earth, and nether world.

Lord Shiva is known as ‘Maha Deva’, the Great God. This epithet is used for him in acknowledgement of his stellar erudition, sagacity and wisdom. He is self-realised and the most enlightened God. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 107 along with Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede it.}

When earth and the sages were horrified by the demons and were searching for Lord Vishnu, the Supreme Being, to request the Lord to protect them, but were unsure where to find him, it was Lord Shiva who finally came to their rescue by advising them “that the Lord is present everywhere, and he would reveal himself if the gods and earth prayed to him sincerely”. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 185.}

On another occasion, it was Lord Shiva who advised Garud to go to Kaagbhusund to remove his delusions and confusions regarding Lord Ram. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 58—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 62.}

हर हिउँ रामचरित सब आए । प्रेम पुलक लोचन जल छाए ॥ ७ ॥
श्रीरघुनाथ रूप उर आवा । परमानंद अमित सुख पावा ॥ ८ ॥

hara hiyaṃ rāmacarita saba ā'ē. prēma pulaka lōcana jala chā'ē. 7.
śrīraghunātha rūpa ura āvā. paramānanda amita sukha pāvā. 8.

Lord Shiva recalled (or remembered) the whole divine and holy story of Lord Ram in his heart; this made his body experience thrill of ecstasy and tears welled up in his eyes. (7)

Lord Raghunath's (i.e. Lord Ram's) divine form appeared in his heart, and it gave Lord Shiva extreme bliss and joy. (8)

[Note—The question arises that if the story of Lord Ram had already revealed itself in the heart and mind of Lord Shiva on an earlier occasion#, and that if he was always submerged in the thoughts of Lord Ram as he repeated the Lord's holy name and meditated on him*, then what does it mean that “the story of Lord Ram and his image revealed themselves in his heart now”? {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, #Chaupai line no. 9 that precedes Doha no. 35; and *Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 19; Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 108.}

Well, the answer is this: Lord Shiva used to meditate upon Lord Ram and employed the Lord's holy name “RAM” (pronounced Raam or Rām) as the Mantra (a spiritual formula) during it for the purpose of contemplation, focusing of his mind, and doing of Japa (repetition of a holy Name or Mantra of a revered deity). Lord Ram's divine image was enshrined in his heart as a deity is done in a physical temple, and the Lord's divine story had revealed in Shiva's heart as a lotus emerges in a pristine pure lake. Now currently, Parvati's questions gave an occasion for Lord Shiva to remember his revered Lord Ram afresh, and recall his holy story. It was a sort of a refreshing of his memory. The very thought that he would now be engaged in retelling the story to Parvati in detail filled Lord Shiva with enthusiasm and ecstasy. It was like the lotus flower opening its petals and blooming in all its beauty.

In Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 30, and Chaupai line no. 11 that precedes Doha no. 35 it is said that “Lord Shiva had conceived the story of Lord Ram in his Mana (heart and mind), and at the opportune time he revealed it to Uma”. Well, this ‘opportune time’ referred to in these verses is now.

We experience this thing in our day-to-day lives too. There are many good and bad events in our lives that have left their permanent imprints on our mind and heart. Over time we tend to live with these memories; we don't pay special attention to them as life goes on. But it often happens that certain development or situation in the present time makes us recall these long-ago events afresh in our mind, which would either make us happy or sad depending on the sort of impression these events had cast on our memories and sub-conscious mind.

In the case of Lord Shiva, the very memory of Lord Ram was cheering for his spirits; it rejuvenated him and filled him with exhilaration. This was a good omen—because now he will tell the story of Lord Ram enthusiastically to Parvati, with a lot of emotional involvement and zeal put into the narrative.]

Lord Shiva became meditative, and he remained in this state of bliss and ecstasy for around two quarters of an hour.

Then Lord Mahesh (Shiva) recovered from his trance and revealed the story of Lord Ram that was enshrined in his Mana (heart and mind). The Lord began to narrate it enthusiastically and with great zeal. (Doha no. 111)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>There are many instances in Ram Charit Manas where we read that enlightened souls become thrilled when they reveal or hear something holy and divine. For instance, refer to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 41; (ii) Chaupai line no. 10 that precedes Doha no. 39 (Tulsidas); (iii) Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 104 (sages Yagyawalkya and Bharadwaj); Uttar Kand, (iv) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 64 (sage Kaagbhusund).]

jēhi jānēm jaga jā'i hērāī. jāgēm jathā sapana bhrama jāī. 2.

Lord Shiva started his preaching as follows: 'Out of ignorance and effects of delusions, a person treats something that is completely false as being true, just like the case of his erroneously treating a lifeless length of rope as a live snake (and becoming terrified by it)<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Truthful knowledge and true enlightenment is that which helps one to overcome this delusion and ignorance, just like the case of person who wakes up from his sleep to realize that the world he was witnessing in his dreams has vanished instantly (as if it was a mirage)<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Due to lack of knowledge about the reality of a length of rope, a person may think it to be a snake lying on the ground just because of the rope's external appearance that resembles a serpent, and this misconception grossly agitates him.

Lord Shiva hints at the confusions about Lord Ram that have so much bewildered Parvati. Lord Ram's worldly behaviour is like that of an ordinary human being, leading to so much misconception about the Lord's true identity. So here Shiva says that when Parvati or anyone else comes to learn about the Lord's truth and why he behaved in the way he did, all confusions and delusions would vanish just like the world of dreams that vanishes as soon as the person wakes up from his sleep.

In the example of the rope and the snake, as soon as a person realises the truth that what had terrified him so much is nothing but a harmless length of rope, he will laugh at his own stupidity and fearlessly grab the rope and swing it.

Similarly, as soon as the reality of Lord Ram dawns on the horizon of the seeker's mind and intellect, all his doubts and confusions about the Lord would vanish in a trice.

So therefore, suggests Lord Shiva to Parvati, she must listen to the story of Lord Ram attentively.

The concept of a rope being mistaken for a snake has been employed in the Upanishads too. It is used as a standard metaphor to describe how lack of awareness of the truth leads an ignorant man to imagine that a harmless piece of rope is a vicious snake and instill in him a horrible fear of life. References of this concept—(a) Krishna Yajur Veda: Kathrudra Upanishad, verse no. 17; Rudra Hridaya Upanishad, verse no. 34; Yogkundali Upanishad, Canto 1, verse no. 79-80; Yogshikha Upanishad, Canto 4, verse nos. 1-2, 22; Tejobindu Upanishad, Canto 5, verse nos. 48-49; Canto 6, verse no. 77. (b) Shukla Yajur Veda: Nirālamba Upanishad, verse no. 14. (c) Atharva Veda: Atma Upanishad, verse no. 27.

Now let us see what the Atharva Veda's Atma Upanishad, verse no. 27 has to say—"When one is under the false impression that a harmless length of rope is a dangerous venomous snake, he is afraid of the former; he becomes terrified of the rope. But when he comes to know the truth, this fear disappears on its own. He would no longer be afraid of the rope because he knows that it is not a snake.

This explains the difference between false and misleading knowledge, and true knowledge that shows the correct path. While the former kind of knowledge leads one to be trapped in fetters of ignorance and delusions, the latter type of knowledge is liberating and a provider of deliverance to the creature. While ignorance creates a trap that shackles a creature in a snare of delusions, knowledge frees him and is emancipating as well as empowering. While ignorance bogs him down, knowledge sets him free (27)."

The Tejobindu Upanishad of the Krishna Yajur Veda, Canto 6, verse no. 77 says "The erroneous belief that a harmless length of rope is a snake does not make the rope bite anyone. The world is also as imaginary as this snake in the rope. Similarly, a polished and brilliantly shining golden arrow that glints in the rays of the sun does not spew fire that can burn anything though its glint might resemble the spark from a burning fire. The world is also as imaginary as the presence of fire in this arrow.

To wit, "Even as a harmless length of rope imagined to be a snake does not bite, and an ordinary arrow of gold does not spew fire, this world too does not exist." (77)]

banda'um̐ bālarūpa sō'i rāmū. saba sidhi sulabha japata jisu nāmū. 3.

maṅgala bhavana amaṅgala hārī. drava'u sō dasaratha ajira bihārī. 4.

[Oh Parvati! Continued Shiva, ---] 'I bow my head and revere the form of Lord Ram as a child (banda'um̐ bālarūpa sō'i rāmū) by doing Japa (repetition) of whose holy name all successes and accomplishments are easily achieved (saba sidhi sulabha)<sup>1</sup>.’

[Lord Shiva remembers the form of Lord Ram as a child and invokes the Lord’s divine grace and seeks his blessings before commencing the narration of the story of Ram Charit Manas. He prays: ] ‘That Lord (Sri Ram) who is an embodiment of all auspiciousness and is a dispeller of all that is inauspicious, and who plays around (as a child) in the royal courtyard of king Dasrath (of Ayodhya where the Supreme Being manifested himself as Lord Ram)—let that Lord bless me and grant his grace upon me.’<sup>2</sup> (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>We read that the saintly crow Kaagbhusund was also devoted to this form of Lord Ram which Lord Shiva adores. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 2-7 that precede Doha no. 75; and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 113.

Kaagbhusund also gives the reason why this form of Lord Ram as a child was very attractive to him—‘it is pleasant and charming, it gives immense joy and happiness to a creature when he thinks how the child-Ram plays around, laughing heartily, cheering and speaking with a lisp in his voice, stumbling and rising up to run away, dancing and frolicking merrily. Kaagbhsund had experienced the joy of being with Lord Ram during his childhood days, so the mere memory of those moments are so mesmerizing for him that he prefers no other form of Lord Ram but as a child. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 75—to Doha no. 77.}

Lord Ram’s form as a child was an innocent form and free from any taints. What Lord Shiva and sage Kaagbhusund wishes to hint here in a subtle way is that a child is an image of Lord God, for it is innocent and free from all worldly taints as attachments, longings etc. A child is easy to please like the Lord himself; the child pleases everyone around him like the Lord too does.

The glory of a child as a representative of the Lord God is stressed in the Holy Bible where we read the following verses of the Gospel of St. Matthew, 18/1-6—1: “At the same time came the disciples unto Jesus, saying, Who is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven? 2: And Jesus called a little child unto him, and set him in the midst of them, 3: And said, Verily I say unto you, Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven. 4: Whosoever therefore shall humble himself as this little child, the same is greatest in the kingdom of heaven. 5: And whoso shall receive one such little child in my name receiveth me. 6: But whose shall offend one of these little ones which believe in me, it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea.”

Again, we read in the Gospel of St. Mark, 9/36-37—36: “And he took a child, and set him in the midst of them: and when he had taken him in his arms, he said unto them, 37: Whosoever shall receive one of such children in my name, receiveth me: and whosoever shall receive me, receiveth not me, but him that sent me.”

The Atharva Veda’s Annapurna Upanishad, Canto 4, verse no. 38 says that a Brahm-realised man is as innocent and un-prejudiced as a child. To quote—“Be steady and calmed-down by obtaining the knowledge of Brahm by becoming like a child (who is innocent, untainted, unprejudiced and uncorrupt)<sup>1</sup>.

The knowledge of Brahm makes a man Brahm-realised, and this eclectic mental state is equivalent to that of a child as it is not only innocent, untainted, unprejudiced, uncorrupt and contented, but is also cheerful, happy, blissful and free from any worldly worries (38).”

Saint Tulsidas has written prolifically about Lord Ram as a child. He has described the beauty and the enchanting image of the Lord as a child, and becomes enthralled and captivated at the beauty of Lord Ram as a child. For Tulsidas, it is a sort of meditation on the Lord’s most pure, innocent and uncorrupt physical form as a human being. In his book Dohawali, verse nos. 117-122, Tulsidas has described the charms of the Lord of creation known as Ram in the form of a child when the Lord took birth on earth as a human being.

In the great epic Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 198, Tulsidas has affirmed the fact that the Supreme Lord of creation known as Brahm who is all-pervading, all-encompassing, omnipresent and immanent in creation, the Lord who has no taints, shortcomings and faults that are associated with mundane existence in this world, the Lord who has no attributes and is free from the effects or influences of the three Gunas known as Sata Guna, Raja Guna and Tama Guna, and the Lord who is neutral and dispassionate and indifferent to sensory impulses that make a living being feel a sense of joy and happiness or inspires him to enjoy the pleasures and comforts of this world of sense objects—it is the same supreme Brahm who has today become a child named Ram in the lap of mother Kaushalya.

Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1 and 7 that precede Doha no. 200 proclaim that Lord Ram is the Supreme Father and Parent of this creation, and it is the same Lord Ram who had taken birth as a human being, and his childhood activities and playful pranks had given a lot of happiness and joy to the subjects of the kingdom of Kaushal (Ayodhya).

Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 199 explicitly affirm that Lord Ram who is performing enchanting deeds as a child is none but the Supreme Being who is an embodiment of happiness and bliss, is beyond the scope of doubts and confusions, is beyond the purview of delusions, transcends the three Gunas known as Sata Guna, Raja Guna and Tama Guna, and is beyond the reach of speech and expressions—i.e. cannot be narrated or described, cannot be limited by words and languages on which expressions depend.

Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 204 clearly state that the Lord’s childhood activities are simple and pleasant. They have been sung by the Vedas, Lord Shiva, goddess of speech Saraswati, and Seshnath, the legendary serpent who holds the earth afloat in the vast ocean of ether. If any one does not find the enchanting image and the most pleasant deeds of Lord Ram as a child as being attractive to the mind and heart, then surely the creator is opposed to such an unfortunate person, i.e. he is very unlucky and stone-hearted, and he will never enjoy the nectar of bliss that comes by hearing of the Lord’s divine story.

In Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 203, it is said that “all the four brothers (Lord Ram and his brothers Laxman, Bharat and Shatrughan) move around doing most pleasant and enchanting things. The Lord who is beyond the imagination of the mind, who cannot be attained by merely doing formal rituals, who is beyond the reach and purview of words and speech (i.e. who cannot be defined or described or explained or expressed by the spoken word), and who is invisible in his cosmic all-pervading subtle form, becomes a boy and moves in the royal courtyard of king Dasrath.”

Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 17 says that the childhood deeds and playful pranks of Lord Ram gives immense pleasure to saints and sages, and they have been sung by the Gods. Tulsidas drinks this nectar and lives happily in the bliss obtained by it.

The beauty of the child Ram has been described in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-12 that precede Doha no. 199.

Tulsidas has also said in his Kavitaawali Ramayan, verse no. 6 that one should have love and devotion for the Supreme Being who manifested as child Ram if one hopes to obtain the same result as it got by doing Japa, Yoga and Samadhi. To quote—“Attractive shoes adorn his (the child Ram’s) feet, a tiny bow and arrow is in his small hands, and accompanied by children (of his age), he playfully moves about either on the banks of the river Saryu or the market places of Ayodhya. Tulsidas says that if one cannot develop love and affection towards such children, then what is the utility of doing Japa (reciting and repetition of the Mantras), practicing Yoga (meditation and concentration on the Pure-Self) or being in a state of Samadhi (a trance like state of consciousness when one is lost in deep contemplation)? Such people (who do all these exercises but cannot inculcate love and devotion for the Lord) are similar to donkeys, pigs and dogs. Say, of what use is their life (i.e. what fruit or benefit have they got from taking birth)?”

करि प्रनाम रामहि त्रिपुरारी । हरषि सुधा सम गिरा उचारी ॥ ५ ॥
धन्य धन्य गिरिराजकुमारी । तुम्ह समान नहिं कोउ उपकारी ॥ ६ ॥

kari pranāma rāmaḥi tripurārī. haraṣi sudhā sama girā ucārī. 5.
dhan'ya dhan'ya girirājakumārī. tumha samāna nahim kō'u upakārī. 6.

Lord Tripurari (i.e. Lord Shiva, the Lord of all the three divisions of the world)<sup>1</sup> bowed his head before Lord Ram, and then cheerfully spoke words that were like nectar (i.e. sweet, pleasant, rejuvenating, and a provider of exhilaration and profound bliss). (5)

[Expressing his gratitude to Parvati for asking him to narrate the holy story of Lord Ram, Shiva said—] ‘Oh the Daughter of the King of Mountains (gīrīrājakumārī; i.e. Parvati); you are extremely fortunate and blessed indeed! Verily, there is no one who is a better benefactor and well-wisher than you are<sup>1</sup>. (6)

पूँछेहु रघुपति कथा प्रसंगा । सकल लोक जग पावनि गंगा ॥ ७ ॥
तुम्ह रघुबीर चरन अनुरागी । कीन्हिहु प्रस्न जगत हित लागी ॥ ८ ॥ pūm̐chēhu raghupati kathā prasaṅgā. sakala lōka jaga pāvani gaṅgā. 7.

tumha raghubīra carana anurāgī. kīnhihi prasna jagata hita lāgī. 8.

You have asked me about the divine and holy story of Lord Ram (raghupati kathā) which is purifying for the whole world just like the sacred river Ganges is<sup>1</sup>. (7)

You have affection for the holy feet of Lord Ram (raghubīra), and I understand that you have asked questions regarding Lord Ram and his story just for the sake of the good and welfare of the world (and its creatures)<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, just like the waters of river Ganges is regarded as holy and purifying for the creatures of this mortal world as it symbolically washes away their sins and impurities by cleaning their bodies that represents their external self, the divine story of Lord Ram too washes away the sins and impurities sticking to the soul of the creature, thereby cleaning his inner self.

Even as the refreshing and cool waters of the river Ganges provides comfort to the physical body, the divine story of Lord Ram is refreshing and rejuvenating for the spirit of the creature.

Just like a weary traveler finding solace and succour by taking a bath in the waters of river Ganges, a creature who is tired of turning around endlessly in the wheel of transmigration, and is tormented by the countless miseries of mortal life in this gross world, would find peace and rest for his soul by hearing this story of Lord Ram.

In this context, refer to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 34 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that follow it.

<sup>2</sup>A similar observation was made by sage Yagyawalkya for sage Bharadwaj when the latter asked him to narrate the story of Lord Ram. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 45—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 47.

Just like the case of river Ganges which provides relief to one and all who come to its banks to sip its water or to take a bath in it, without any distinction regarding caste, creed, age, gender, faith and belief, Lord Ram's holy story also benefits one and all who listen to it, who read it, who recite and sing it, who preach it.

It's like nectar that tastes sweet and refreshing to everyone, irrespective of who the drinker or taster is.]

दो०. राम कृपा तें पारबति सपनेहुँ तव मन माहिं।

rāma kṛpā tēm pārabati sapanēhum̐ tava mana māhim̐.
sōka mōha sandēha bhrama mama bicāra kachu nāhim̐. 112.

Oh Parvati! In my opinion you have the blessing and grace of Lord Ram upon you, and so therefore I am certain you don't have the taint of worldly sorrows, delusions, doubts and confusions even in your dream<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 112)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Shiva said: “See Parvati, you wish to hear the divine story of Lord Ram for the good and welfare of the world at large, and you feign ignorance about it merely in order to inspire me to retell the whole story to you once again. I have proof of your being aware of the story. Remember, just a while ago you have already outlined the main events of Lord Ram’s story, so how is it that you don’t know it. So therefore, I am convinced that you wished to hear the story of Lord Ram so that the world could benefit from it.” {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Doha no. 110 along with Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede it; (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 113.}

As we have noted earlier, the same observation was made by sage Yagyawalkya with respect to sage Bharadwaj. Refer to note appended to verse no. 8 herein above.

Another instance is found when sage Kaagbhusund tells a similar thing to Garud when the latter asked the former to tell the story of Lord Ram to him. Here, Kaagbhusund says that actually the fact is that Lord Ram wishes to honour him before the world and so he has motivated Garud to go and ask him to tell the Lord’s story and glories in detail as if no one else can do it. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 70.

If we consider this view, then surely Lord Shiva means that he is blessed that his revered Lord Ram has given him another chance to recall the Lord’s holy story as a means of deriving fresh a round of joy and bliss. So therefore, Lord Shiva feels happy with Parvati instead of being annoyed at her. This is clear in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 111 along with Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede it.]

jinha hari kathā sunī nahim kānā. śravana randhra ahibhavana samānā. 2.

[Lord Shiva continued—] ‘But still since you have expressed some form of doubts regarding Lord Ram<sup>1</sup> and wish to hear the Lord’s sacred story (inspite of my belief that you don’t have any real doubts about Lord Ram’s divinity and holiness, but you have asked me to tell you the Lord’s story with the intention that it would be for the larger good and auspiciousness of the world)—so therefore I will narrate it to you, as this story provides auspiciousness and does good to narrate as well as to hear it<sup>2</sup>. (1)

Those who have not heard the auspicious story of Lord Hari (Lord Vishnu, the Supreme Being who is an eliminator of all sorrows of the creature), their ears are like the dark holes where serpents live<sup>3</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>What was it about Lord Ram that had perplexed Parvati and vexed her mind so much? The answer is found in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 108—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 109.

Primarily, in the opinion of Parvati, Lord Ram’s worldly deeds and behaviour were not in line with what one expects from the Supreme Being who is supposed to be almighty, all-knowing and omnipotent, though Lord Shiva as well as the scriptures have firmly affirmed the fact that Lord Ram was none but the Supreme Being himself. These two apparently contradictory aspects of Lord Ram—one as a human being, and the other as the Supreme Being, which did not tally with each other—was the primary cause of all confusions in Parvati’s mind.

<sup>2</sup>Quoth Lord Shiva to Parvati: “Verily indeed and forsooth, Parvati, both the narrator and the hearer benefit from Lord Ram’s glorious story as it grants bliss, beatitude, joy, happiness and auspiciousness equally to both of them. Hence, I, as its narrator, will enjoy the blissfulness and joy that accompanies this story naturally as much as you will, as its listener, and by extension all others too would derive immense spiritual bliss and beatitude who would be retelling it and hearing it later on. So it will serve a much larger purpose than merely a discourse between us two. Therefore, I am willing to tell you what you wish to hear. I am full of gratitude to you rather, for giving me a chance to recount the story of my beloved and revered Lord Ram, something that thrills me to the core of my heart, rejuvenates my mind and intellect, nourishes my soul, and lifts my spirits to great heights of ecstasy.”

In this context, refer to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 112; (ii) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 31—to Doha no. 32; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 47.

So therefore, he whose ears are like an ocean that continues to receive so many rivers from every direction, rivers that represent the different versions of the holy story of Lord Ram told in different ways, and where all such stories converge to become one body of holy knowledge pertaining to the Lord like the waters of so many different rivers merging with each other to become one when they fall into the ocean—verily indeed, such a person is lucky who has this kind of ear. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 128 (sage Valmiki tells this wisdom to Lord Ram when the latter asked the sage to tell him the places where he is expected to live).

Refer also to: Ram in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 126 where Lord Shiva tells Parvati that “hearing of Lord Ram’s story helps one to free one’s self and his soul from the trap symbolized by this mortal world of delusions and transmigration that tie a creature down”. And of course, one can hear something with the ‘ears’ only.]

नयनन्हि संत दरस नहिं देखा । लोचन मोरपंख कर लेखा ॥ ३ ॥

ते सिर कटु तुंबरि समतूला । जे न नमत हरि गुर पद मूला ॥ ४ ॥

nayanānhi santa darasa nahim dēkhā. lōcana mōrapaṅkha kara lēkhā. 3.
tē sira kaṭu tumbari samatūlā. jē na namata hari gura pada mūlā. 4.

Those people whose eyes have not had the good luck to be blessed by the sight of saints are nothing more than the false eyes found on the tail of a peacock<sup>1</sup>. (3)

Those unfortunate heads which do not bow before Lord God and one's Guru (teacher, preceptor and guide) are no better than bitter pumpkins<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A peacock's tail has a colourful design marked in the center of it that is called the 'eye of the peacock's tail'; but it does not see anything, and is merely a decorative addition to the bird's plume. Likewise, eyes that are not fortunate to see saints and feel blessed by this sight are worthless instruments of the body.

Then, what is the good use of the eye? Valmiki answers it: "Oh Lord Ram! You must dwell abidingly in the heart of those people whose eyes derive immense pleasure in beholding your beauteous and divine form, and remains focused on it, just like the eyes of the bird known as Chatak that constantly looks up to the rain-bearing cloud to grant it nectar-like drops of water to quench its thirst." {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 128.}

To wit, the 'good use of the eye' is not to be attracted to worldly things and seek material pleasure, but to search for holy people, the saints referred to in this verse, who can show a person the correct way to live a happy life revolving around spiritualism and auspiciousness, a life of good conduct and morality that not only gives him abiding peace but also prepares him for deliverance from this world and its endless miseries.

In this context refer to: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 127 where the good effect of company of saints is emphasized.

जिन्ह हरिभगति हृदयँ नहिं आनी । जीवत सव समान तेइ प्रानी ॥ ५ ॥
जो नहिं करइ राम गुन गाना । जीह सो दादुर जीह समाना ॥ ६ ॥

jinha haribhagati hr̥dayam̐ nahim̐ ānī. jīvata sava samāna tē'i prānī. 5.
jō nahim̐ kara'i rāma guna gānā. jīha sō dādura jīha samānā. 6.

Those people who do not have the virtue of 'Bhakti' (devotion and affection for Lord God) in their hearts, the bodies of such people are no better than corpses<sup>1</sup>. (5)

If the tongue does not use its abilities to speak to sing and praise Lord Ram's glories, holiness and divinity, then verily indeed, that tongue is no better than that of a frog (which does nothing else but catch flies and croak)<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, without having Bhakti for Lord God, a person's life is worthless. Those people who allow themselves to remain engrossed in worldly affairs, without bothering to take care of their spiritual interests, they are dumb and good for nothing just like a dead body that is of no use to anyone.

In this context we can refer to what Angad told Ravana in Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 31. Angad says, inter alia, that: "Those who are opposed to Lord Vishnu (the Supreme Being) as well as the scriptures and saintly people, those who are interested only in caring for their gross mortal bodies and gratification of their sense organs, those who are under the grip of passions and lust and greed, those who are extremely old and always sick, those who are exceptionally poor and deprived of even the basic needs of life, those who are a mine of vices and all sorts of evils—verily indeed, their life is no better than hell, and if they live in this world they live just like a corpse does.”

The idea behind comparing such persons to dead bodies is that their life has been spent in vain, and just like a corpse that serves no good to the society and is better disposed of as soon as possible, lest it would rot and spread a nasty stink all around it, it is better for a wise person to move away from the company of those who have neither any spiritual bent of mind nor any love for Lord God, for keeping company with people who are opposed to Lord God would have a negative and corrupting effect on a good person’s own psyche, and pollute his inner self in the long run.

The learned sage Kaagbhusund told Garud: “There is no better form of body that the soul of a creature can have than that of a human being, and if one does not develop Bhakti for Lord Ram inspite of acquiring this human body, and instead remains engrossed in worldly affairs and gratification of sense organs, then verily indeed such a creature is most unfortunate and an ill-fated, one who is doomed to live a miserable life and an existence like that of an animal. Such people are utter fools like those who throw away a priceless piece of gem and grab a worthless piece of glass in its place.” Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 9-12 that precede Doha no. 121.

Refer also to sage Valmiki’s advice in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 131 where the sage tells Lord Ram: “Oh Lord, you must abide in the heart of those people who discard everything else in this world, such as wealth, relations, society, religious groups, family and kin etc. if they are not conducive to development of Bhakti and promote love for Lord God, and instead exclusively enshrine you in their hearts. To wit, whose hearts have place for nothing else but you, who have devotion and affection for you firmly established in their hearts to the exclusion of everything else—oh Lord, you must live there, for it is your holy abode.”

In Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 295, goddess Saraswati, the goddess of wisdom, says in regard to Bharat, the younger brother of Lord Ram: “Lord Ram and his divine consort Sita live in the heart of Bharat (who loves them and is fully devoted to Lord Ram), say then, how can darkness (symbolizing all sorts of evil tendencies and taints of character) ever exist where there is the light of the sun? To wit, since Bharat has devotion for Lord Ram, it is not at all possible that negativities of any kind, such as greed for kingdom, selfishness, perversions, pretensions, deceit, falsehood, etc. can ever exist in the heart of Bharat.”

The idea is that a person who has the virtue of Bhakti for Lord God in his heart, his inner self is illuminated with the light of spiritualism just like a room is illuminated with a lighted lamp. In such a heart, there is no fear of gloom and darkness, there is no fear from fate and worrying about destiny—because a devotee is certain that his Lord God would take care of him.

The virtues and glories of Bhakti have been extolled in Ram Charit Manas at many places. For instance, we can cite Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 45—to Doha no. 46 (as espoused by Lord Ram himself); (ii) Doha no. 78 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that follow it; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 9-10 that precede Doha no. 86; and (iv) Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 84 (as expounded by sage Kaagbhusund).

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 128 where sage Valmiki reiterates exactly the same thing. The sage says: “Oh Lord, you must live in the purified heart of those who use their tongue to sing your glories, praise you, offer prayers to you, and pick gems of spiritual wisdom while discarding all other worthless clutter, much like a swan that can separate pearls from an assortment of gems.”

A frog has only two uses for its tongue: to croak, and to catch flies with it. The human tongue should not be allowed to go to such low levels as that of a frog by talking endlessly about worldly matters, and spending its entire life babbling and chattering and gossiping about worthless things, but finding no time to praise Lord Ram, or pronounce his holy name, or talk and discuss about spiritual matters that can give true peace and abiding happiness to the soul of the creature.]

That chest or bosom (here meaning the heart) of a person is to be regarded as extremely stern, emotionless and hard like the Bajra (kulisa; the hardest substance in existence) if it does not become thrilled and exhilarated by hearing the story of Lord Hari (i.e. Lord Ram)<sup>1</sup>. (7)

[Lord Shiva praised Parvati for her desire to hear the divine story of Lord Ram, telling her that those who wish to hear it are truly blessed. Therefore, she must now pay attention to the story of Lord Ram that he was about to narrate to her.]

Lord Shiva said, ‘Oh Girija (i.e. Parvati; the daughter of the king of mountains)! Now, listen to the sacred story of Lord Ram that narrates the Lord’s deeds and sports in this world. This story of the Lord gives joy to the gods (representing positive forces and holy souls in this creation), but it confounds the demons (representing negative forces and evil spirits of creation)<sup>2</sup>.

[To wit, this mystical story of Lord Ram is beneficial for the Gods who represent holy souls as it grants blessedness and welfare to them, and on the other hand it deludes and confounds the Demons who represent evil souls as it completely bewilders them, mystifies their soul, and instills fear in their mind and heart.] (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 128 where sage Valmiki says: “Oh Lord! Those whose ears and hearts are never contented by hearing your holy stories just like the ocean that is never filled by so many rivers and streams falling into it continuously—you must live in the hearts of such pious people.”

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 41 where it is said that one should feel exhilarated and thrilled by hearing and narrating the divine stories of Lord Ram.

Sage Kaagbhusund says that those who do not like to hear the stories of Lord Ram are harming their own self and preventing their Atma from deriving eternal peace. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 53.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Vishnu came down to earth in the form of Lord Ram to grant fearlessness to gods and mother earth against the tyranny of the demons. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that precede Doha no. 187; (b) Aranya Kand, Doha no. 9 along with Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede it; and (c) Lanka Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 10-11, and Chanda line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 103, and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 8-12 that precede Doha no. 110 (immediately after Ravana's death when the gods praised and thanked Lord Ram).

Verily, Lord Ram was the saviour and protector of pious souls, gods, saints, sages, ascetics, hermits etc., granting them joy, happiness, peace, solace, succour and hope, while those who were evil and sinful like the demons were scared of him, for the Lord eliminated them one by one so that peace-loving creatures of the world, the 'subjects of his kingdom', could live peacefully.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, (a) Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 127; (b) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 73.]

rāmakathā suradhēnu sama sēvata saba sukha dāni.
satasamāja suralōka saba kō na sunai asa jāni. 113.

The magnificent, glorious, divine, holy and sacred story of Lord Ram (rāmakathā) is like the all wish-fulfilling cow of the gods known as Kaamdheni, because it fulfils all the wishes of the devotees who serve it with faith and devotion.

In the same vein, the assembly of saints and pious people is equivalent to the abode of gods on earth. [It is in this assembly that the story of Ram Charit Manas is sung and explained; it is the community of saints where one would hear discussions on spiritual matters and discourses on Lord God.]<sup>2</sup>

Keeping this in mind, who would not love to serve it (i.e. enjoy the company of saints where the divine story of Lord Ram is narrated, spiritual discourses are held, and all doubts are removed)? (Doha no. 113)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The benefits of hearing the sacred story of Lord Ram have been enumerated at many places in Ram Charit Manas. For instance, refer to: (a) Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 5 that precede Doha no. 31—to Doha no. 32; (b) Uttar Kand, (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 53; (iii) Doha no. 61 along with Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede it; (iv) Doha no. 128 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that follow it; (v) Chaupai line nos. 2-8 that precede Doha no. 130.

<sup>2</sup>Whereas it is extremely difficult to access and enjoy the environment of bliss and joy that prevails in the heaven where the gods live, its symbolic form can actually be experienced right here on earth when one keeps the company of saints where the story of Lord Ram is recited, expounded, read and studied.

The glory of company of saints has been lauded in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 45 (where Lord Ram has praised company of saints, saying that such company is sure to eliminate all form of sorrows associated with this mortal world and its miseries); (ii) Chaupai line no. 13 that precedes Doha no. 121 where Kaagbhusund says that meeting there is no greater joy than meeting true saints.]

चौ०. रामकथा सुंदर कर तारी । संसय बिहग उड़ावनिहारी ॥ १ ॥

रामकथा कलि बिटप कुठारी । सादर सुनु गिरिराजकुमारी ॥ २ ॥

rāmakathā sundara kara tāri. sansaya bihaga uṛāvanihārī. 1.

rāmakathā kali biṭapa kuṭhārī. sādara sunu girirājakumārī. 2.

The ‘Ram Katha’ (meaning the sacred story that narrates the life, time and deeds of the Supreme Lord during his manifestation on earth as Lord Ram, the prince of Ayodhya) is like clapping together of the palms of the hands as it drives away all sorts of birds symbolising various spiritual delusions, miseries and doubts that cause immense bewilderments, consternation and perplexities in the heart and mind of a person (who is keen to find some source that would give him internal peace and happiness)<sup>1</sup>.

[To wit, the magnificent, glorious, divine, holy and sacred story of Lord Ram (rāmakathā) is like the clapping of one’s hands which chases away birds symbolising doubts and confusions.] (1)

‘Ram Katha’ is like an axe that can chop off the huge and abominable tree representing all the miseries and torments associated with life in Kaliyug, the dark age of lack of spiritual peace and happiness, as well as uncertainty regarding one’s destiny<sup>2</sup>.

[To wit, his wonderful and mystical story of Lord Ram acts as an axe by which one can chop-off the huge tree represented by Kaliyug.]

This being the case, oh daughter of the king of mountains (“girirājakumārī”; i.e. Parvati), listen to the narration of this divine, holy and sacred story of Lord Ram with full attention, respect, reverence, faith and belief<sup>3</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In this analogy, recitation or narration of the ‘Ram Katha’ is like the clapping of the palms of the hands, and just like a farmer chases away myriad birds destroying his crop in the field by clapping loudly, the divine story of Lord Ram too eliminates all sorts of spiritual confusions and uneasiness that torment a person, thereby granting his soul abiding peace, comfort, solace and succour, as well as providing a hope for deliverance from the seemingly endless chain of miseries associated with the cycle of transmigration, assuring him of salvation and emancipation of his soul.

In the context of Lord Ram’s sacred story eliminating all delusions and spiritual uneasiness, refer especially to Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 68 where we read that Garud has told sage Kaagbhusund that after hearing this story all his delusions and confusions have vanished.

A similar idea is expressed by Parvati at the end of the narration by her husband Lord Shiva in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 129 along with Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes it.

The mystical powers and glories of Lord Ram's sacred story known as 'Ram Charit Manas' have been extolled at numerous places in this holy book. For instance, refer to (a) Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 31—to Doha no. 32 (Tulsidas); (b) Uttar Kand, (ii) Chaupai line nos. 2-5 that precede Doha no. 52 (Lord Shiva to Parvati); (iii) Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that precede Doha no. 53 (Parvati to Lord Shiva); (iv) Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 64 (Garud to Kaagbhusund); (v) Doha no. 68 (Garud to Kaagbhusund); (vi) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 123 (Kaagbhusund to Garud); (vii) Doha no. 126 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede it (Lord Shiva to Parvati); and (viii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 128—to Doha no. 129 (conversation between Lord Shiva and Parvati).

<sup>2</sup>The holy story of Lord Ram grants internal peace to its narrator, to its listener, as well as to the reader. Like a wood-cutter who is able to fell down even a huge tree if he has a good and sharpened axe in his hand, a devotee of Lord Ram and a wise person can also get rid of all sorts of internal uneasiness pertaining to his soul and the worry about his spiritual destiny if he listens to, reads and narrates this divine story that would act as a magic charm and a panacea for all his spiritual problems. It would stabilize his inner-self and give him internal peace and succour by removing all causes of his consternations and fears pertaining to this mortal gross world, and his fear of sinking in the choppy waters of this symbolic ocean represented by life in the dark age of Kaliyug just like a ship caught in a fierce storm fears of capsizing and sinking till the time it finds a lighthouse that directs it to a harbour where it can lay its anchor and lie at rest.

<sup>3</sup>It is important to listen to the story of Lord Ram keeping in mind Lord Shiva's advice. One must listen to it with due reverence, belief and faith; one must pay attention to it, and not feel bored by its narration. One must have faith in Lord Ram and be convinced of the Lord's divinity and holiness, because then the listener would listen to the Lord's story as something that is divine and holy and sacred, something that can help him out of his or her spiritual problems, something that can grant internal peace, happiness, stability, solace and succour. Otherwise it becomes an ordinary story, an imaginary tale that is full of fancies and contradictions, which skeptical people would tear apart at the drop of a hat with all sorts of arguments and logics in their zeal to punch holes in it and prove it incredulous and ridiculous.

rāma nāma guna carita suhā'ē. janama karama aganita śruti gā'ē. 3.
jathā ananta rāma bhagavānā. tathā kathā kīrati guna nānā. 4.

The Vedas (śruti) have declared that Lord Ram is infinite and beyond measure and comprehension, and so are the Lord's many names, his countless virtues and glories, the countless mystical deeds done by the Lord in his different incarnations in different eras, so much so that they cannot be enumerated and listed exhaustively<sup>1</sup>. (3)

Indeed, in all sooth and without gainsay, just as Lord Ram is infinite and beyond measure and comprehension, so are the stories dedicated to him, and so are his glories and virtues (i.e. Lord Ram's virtues and glories are infinite and beyond comprehension)<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This verse essentially says that Lord Ram, being the Supreme Being himself, as well as the cosmic Consciousness itself personified, is the One who has revealed himself in the form of this vast and infinite universe with its mind-boggling diversities and intellect-defying variations. Hence, it is impossible that the Lord be defined and comprehended. Each unit of this creation is a revelation of Brahm, the all-pervading and all-encompassing cosmic form of Lord Ram as pure Consciousness, and so therefore, it is impossible to count his names, virtues, glories and deeds which are as infinite and incomprehensible as the creation itself—because it is not possible to prepare a list all the units of creation as they are countless, and hence it is also not possible to comprehensively enumerate the virtues and glories of Lord Ram.

In this context, refer to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 23.

Meanwhile, the glories of Lord Ram's holy name have been extolled in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 19—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 22; (ii) Doha no. 23—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 28.

In this context, refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Chanda line nos. 17-24 that precede Doha no. 13 (prayer of the Vedas); (ii) Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 52 (Lord Shiva's declaration); (iii) Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 91 (sage Kaagbhusund's view).

All these verses say that both Lord Ram and his stories are infinite and beyond comprehension. Learned saints and illustrious sages describe them in accordance with their understanding, but they only say what they have understood, but there is much more that yet remains to be understood and narrated.]

tadapi jathā śruta jasi mati mōrī. kahiha'um' dēkhi prīti ati tōrī. 5.
umā prasna tava sahaja suhāī. sukhada santasammata mōhi bhāī. 6.

[Lord Shiva continued—] ‘Yet, inspite of all the limitations in telling the story of Lord Ram fully and in a comprehensive way (as I have said herein above), I would still endeavour to narrate this glorious and sacred story to you because I find you have an affectionate interest in it and keen to hear it<sup>1</sup>.

So let me tell you Lord Ram’s story in accordance to my understanding and wisdom, and also according to what I have heard of it myself<sup>2</sup>. (5)

Oh Uma! Your query is polite and inherently free from deceit and skepticism; it is also a genuine desire to be enlightened about the mysteries of Lord Ram which even great sages and learned saints would welcome as it signifies a keen desire of a seeker to learn something about the Supreme Lord, a query which no wise teacher can ever refuse to answer. Besides this, it has given me joy too<sup>3</sup>. [So therefore, I am willing to narrate Lord Ram’s story to you.] (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Doha no. 120-c; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that precede Doha no. 121; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 2-6 that precede Doha no. 140 where Lord Shiva has asserted the same thing about Lord Ram’s story being infinite, and it being narrated by different narrators according to their understanding of it.

<sup>2</sup>Where has Lord Shiva heard this story? He has heard this story on two occasions at least as mentioned in Ram Charit Manas. One was from sage Agastya*, and the other was from the saintly crow Kaagbhusund#. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, *Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 48; and #Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 56—to Doha no. 57.}

Lord Ram’s story is infinite and varied because of the many manifestations of the Lord, as is clearly mentioned by Lord Shiva in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 3-4 herein above; (ii) Doha no. 121 along with Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede it; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 140.

<sup>3</sup>A similar idea is expressed by Lord Shiva in precisely the same way in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 111 too.

Lord Shiva says Parvati’s query about Lord Ram and her eagerness to hear the Lord’s story would give Shiva joy as now he would have an opportunity to recall the holy story that he himself had first conceived in his Mana (heart and mind)*. This opportunity would also help Lord Shiva to revive the sacred memory of his revered Lord Ram. So obviously he welcomed it. {*Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) (ii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 30; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 10-11 that precede Doha no. 35.}] tumha jō kahā rāma kō'u ānā. jēhi śruti gāva dharahim muni dhyānā. 8.

[Lord Shiva expressed his displeasure with Parvati when he reprimanded her for questioning the authenticity and divinity of Lord Ram as follows:-]

But however Uma, there is one thing which I don't like about your query, though you have said it out of your ignorance. (7)

[And what is it that Lord Shiva did not like about Parvati's question? Well, it is this:-]

I don't like your saying 'Is Lord Ram different from what the Vedas and great sages say of the Supreme Being'<sup>1</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Parvati has said this thing in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 108—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 109.

The question arises: inspite of expressing his displeasure with Parvati, why has Lord Shiva not become annoyed with her, and why does he say that her query is otherwise liked by him except for this little transgression and impertinence on her part?

The answer is this: Parvati has herself begged forgiveness and requested Lord Shiva not to get angry at her in the very beginning of her questioning him. She has honestly admitted that she has doubts and confusions, that she is not learned, that though she has some doubts yet she is free from the intensity of delusions that had effected her last time when she questioned Lord Shiva in her previous birth as Sati on the same subject. She politely tells Lord Shiva that inspite of these shortcomings, she has a genuine desire to learn the truth and become enlightened about Lord Ram, and that she can't find a better teacher than Shiva. Refer to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 108; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 109—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 110.]

[Why was Lord Shiva dismayed by Parvati, and why did he not approve of her expressing her doubts about Lord Ram when she asked him to tell her the story of the Lord as she did in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 108 along with Chaupai nos. 5-8 that precede it, and Chaupai line no. 1 that follow it? We read the answer in this Doha:-]

‘[Oh Parvati!] What you have said about Lord Ram (while asking me to tell you the Lord's sacred story) is insinuating, unwarranted, depraved, and wantonly deprecating in nature (for it shows you in extremely poor light).

Such evil, ignominious and blasphemous words (that question the authenticity, divinity, holiness and truth about Lord Ram, who the Vedas unequivocally assert is a manifestation of the Supreme Being and an embodiment of pure cosmic Consciousness) are spoken and heard only by those who are vile and pervert by their inherent nature, who have no pangs of conscience when speaking such unwanted words, for they are lowly and morally corrupt, are under the influence of the devil<sup>1</sup> representing delusions and ignorance, are pervert, sinful and full of deceit, are opposed to Lord Hari (i.e. Lord God) as they are non-believers, agnostics and heretics, and are so dumb and ill-witted that they can't differentiate between the truth and falsehood.<sup>2</sup> (Doha no. 114)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>How the Devil influences one's wisdom is hinted to in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 115; and Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 35.

<sup>2</sup>“Listen my dear Parvati”, quoth Lord Shiva with some dismay in his heart, “I understand that thine heart and soul are pure and immaculate, that thou hast no trace of ill-intention or skepticism when thou request me to tell thee the sacred story of Lord Ram, for it will not only benefit thee but would give me immense pleasure too, as well as would do good to the rest of the world. What pains me and surprises me is not that thou wish to hear the story of Lord Ram, but the reason which thee have put forward for hearing it—which unfortunately gives the impression that thou doubt the divinity, holiness and supremacy of Lord Ram as Lord God of this creation.

See, such words do not behoove thee as my wife, for thou hast been living with me for so long, and it immensely surprises me that this long association with me couldst have no effect on thee, and it couldn't remove thine delusions and ignorance that still cloud thy wisdom and intellect. Thou have thineself acknowledged that I meditate and contemplate on Lord Ram, and I use the Lord's holy name for doing Japa*. Do thou think I am a fool? Still, thou cast doubts on Lord Ram, and indirectly on my wisdom too for worshipping the Lord; how silly and foreboding a thought it is for thee to harbour in thine bosom, my dear Parvati, after being with me for so long! It's both disgusting and unbelievable for me that thee, my dear wife, wouldst have such lowly thoughts in thine heart at all. {*Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 108.}

Nevertheless, I shall go ahead and narrate the divine story of Lord Ram to thee as it would do good to one and all, and also because thee hast already said that thou hast a sincere wish to hear the Lord's story, and thou hast requested me to forgive thee and not get angry with thee for thine temerity bordering on transgression of modesty and politeness in asking such ridiculous and untenable question as thou hast asked regarding the authenticity and divinity of Lord Ram#. It is as ridiculous a question as asking someone in broad daylight if the sun has light in it! Anyhow, now listen attentively and with due reverence to what I am to narrate. {#Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 109.}

Lord Shiva outlines the characteristics of evil-minded and vile people who speak such nonsense about Lord Ram as hinted by Parvati, as a sort of warning to her not to repeat it again. Questioning the authenticity and divinity of the Lord, and uttering words that are unworthy for a sensible person to speak about Lord Ram, for such words are reprehensible for the conscience and mire the purity of the soul. {Refer to Doha no. 115 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that follow herein below.}

Later on, at the conclusion of his narration of Ram Charit Manas, Lord Shiva tells Parvati that he has told her the sacred story of Lord Ram as he found she has an earnest desire to hear it, and then he outlines the character of people who ought not to be taught or told this holy story, as well as those who are eligible for it. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 128 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede it.}

Earlier, poet Tulsidas, the saint who has authored the original written version of this divine story known as Ram Charit Manas in the vernacular that we are presently reading in English, has also outlined certain characters of people who are not entitled to hear or narrate it. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 38—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 39.}

[In the verse nos. 1-8 that follow, Lord Shiva outlines the characteristics of evil-minded and vile people who speak such nonsense about Lord Ram as hinted by Parvati, as a sort of warning to her not to repeat it again. Questioning the authenticity and divinity of Lord Ram, and uttering words that are unworthy for a sensible person to speak about the Lord are reprehensible for the conscience, and mire the purity of the soul.]

[Lord Shiva warned Parvati—] ‘Verily indeed, forsooth and without gainsay, those who are utter fools, ignorant and stupid, those who are so unfortunate that they are blind to the truth that is abundantly evident, those whose inner-self is smeared by a dark oily soot of worldly passions and desire for sense gratification, --- (1)

--- Those who are pervert, vile, pretentious, wicked and deceitful by nature, those who have never seen (i.e. never have had the chance to be in the) company of saintly people, even in their dreams<sup>1</sup> --- (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The importance of company of saints has been highlighted in Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 6-10 that precede Doha no. 3 (Tulsidas); (b) Kishkindha Kand, (ii) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 17 (Tulsidas); (c) Uttar Kand, (iii) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 37—to Doha no. 38 (Lord Ram to Bharat and other citizens of Ayodhya); (iv) Chaupai line nos. 5-7 that precede Doha no. 45 (Lord Ram to subjects of his kingdom); (v) Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 61 (Lord Shiva to Garud); and (vi) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 128 (Lord Shiva to Parvati).]

mukura malina aru nayana bihīnā. rāma rūpa dēkhahim̐ kimi dīnā. 4.

--- Those who are not aware of what is good and what is bad for them and their spiritual welfare, they are the ones who speak words that contradict the scriptures, and are blasphemous and sacrilegious in nature.

[To wit, only fools and depraved persons would cast aspersions on Lord Ram and doubt his divinity when all the Vedas and other scriptures unequivocally declare that the Lord is none but the Supreme Being himself in this form.] (3)

The mind and intellect of such pervert people are corrupted and tainted, and so, say, how can they see the truth of Lord Ram, for it is not possible to have a clear view of anything if one uses a scarred or tainted or stained glass through which to view it<sup>1</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>One employs one's intellect and wisdom to see, analyse and understand the truth of anything in this world. So therefore, if the instrument of the mind that is employed for this purpose is corrupt, how can one properly see, correctly analyse and rightly understand the truth of anything. It is like the case of seeing the outside world through a window with glass panes that are dirty or stained or unclear for some or the other reason for this fault of the glass would obstruct a clear and un-interrupted view of the outside world to the viewer. For instance, if the glass pane is stained red, everything seen through it would be seen in a way that is conditioned by this colour.

Hence, people with a tainted intellect and corrupted wisdom aren't able to either see or understand the truth of Lord Ram inspite of the scriptures firmly affirming the authenticity and divinity of Lord Ram as being a personification of the Supreme Being and an embodiment of cosmic Consciousness.

Lord Ram has himself endorsed a similar view in Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that precede Doha no. 44.]

जिन्ह केँ अगुन न सगुन बिबेका । जल्पहिं कल्पित बचन अनेका ॥ ५ ॥
हरिमाया बस जगत भ्रमाहीं । तिन्हहि कहत कछु अघटित नाहीं ॥ ६ ॥

jinha kēm aguna na saguna bibēkā. jalpahim̐ kalpita bacana anēkā. 5.
harimāyā basa jagata bhramāhīm̐. tinahi kahata kachu aghaṭita nāhīm̐. 6.

Those who have no idea what is 'Saguna' and what is 'Nirguna' form of the Supreme Being<sup>1</sup>—such people talk all sorts of imaginary things about the Lord that amount to rubbish and ignominy. (5)

Such people are caught in the whirlpool of delusions, for they keep on wondering endlessly in this world under the influence of Lord's Maya (i.e. the powerful force of creation that causes one to have delusions, and thereby get trapped in its ever-turning wheel)<sup>2</sup>.* (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The word 'Sagnuna' means the form of the Lord that has visible attributes and characters. This form of the Lord God is the Lord's manifested form, such as the form of Lord Ram who appeared to be like any other human being, and since he had a physical body he also exhibited characteristics common to the gross human body.

On the other hand is the 'Nirguna' form of the Supreme Being. It is the form that has no discernible attributes, a form that is infinite, invisible, sublime, subtle and all-pervading. This form is called Brahm, the cosmic Consciousness itself.

But basically, there is no difference between these two forms; they are like the two sides of a coin, for they together complete the true picture of Lord Ram. To wit, from the perspective of the mortal world where ordinary creatures live, the Supreme Being lived in the form of Lord Ram, and from the perspective of the higher plane of existence he is nothing but cosmic Consciousness itself.

In this context of Saguna vis-à-vis Nirguna, Lord Shiva has himself removed all doubts in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 116—to Doha no. 118.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 16 that precedes Doha no. 110; and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 3-13 that precede Doha no. 111 where we read that sage Kaagbhusund had preferred to hear about the Saguna form of Lord Ram as it is easy to relate to, and easy to comprehend by the mind.

<sup>2</sup>Maya is a very powerful force in creation. Only true devotees of the Lord are free from its influences and tentacles. A person who is caught by Maya finds it difficult for himself to free from its clutches; only the grace of Lord Ram and devotion for him can deliver a person from it. Refer to: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 44—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 45.

Lord Ram has explained the concept of Maya elaborately to Laxman, his younger brother, in Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 14—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 17.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 117; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 70—to Doha no. 73 where sage Kaagbhusund narrates how a creature gets trapped in the wheel of delusions called Maya, and what are the various components of Maya.

*Sage Kaagbhusund says that those people who are under the grip of Maya are the ones who cast doubts and aspersions on Lord Ram, and they are the ones who are befuddled by and confused about the concept of Saguna and Nirguna. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 72; and (ii) Doha no. 73 along with Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede it.]

jinha kṛta mahāmōha mada pānā. tinha kara kahā kari'a nahim kānā. 8.

One should be warned to take care not to pay heed to the words spoken by those who are hallucinating and delirious under the influence of high fever as they utter incoherent words that amount to nothing but nonsense, and so do also those who are possessed by evil spirits, are mad, are deluded, and are under the influence of intoxicating drink.

Truly, a wise person in his right senses would not lend his ears to nonsensical words spoken by such people<sup>1</sup>. (7-8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A person suffering from high fever or is under the influence of an evil spirit would talk incoherently and blubber like a mad man in great agony. Any sensible person would simply neglect him. Likewise, those who cast aspersions on Lord Ram, who doubt the Lord's divinity, holiness and supremacy, are not to be paid attention to.

Kaagbhusund has categorically said a similar thing in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 73-a along with Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede it.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 28 that precedes Doha no. 121—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 122 where sage Kaagbhusund enumerates the various negative factors that torment the inner self of a creature and cause immense heart-burn to him, and how one can overcome them all by the grace of Lord Ram. To wit, if one falls prey to the temptations of listening to the garbage pouring out of the vent like mouth of evil people who question the very existence of Lord God, then only the Lord himself can save them and their unfortunate soul!

A similar idea as in the above paragraph has been reiterated by Kaagbhusund in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 70—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 73 also where he emphasizes how a man under worldly delusions gets caught in a trap of miseries and grief, and how he misinterprets even simplest of things that are evidently clear and obvious to others.]

सुनु गिरिराज कुमारी भ्रम तम रबि कर बचन मम ॥ ११५ ॥

sunu girirāja kumāri bhrama tama rabi kara bacana mama. 115.

Oh Daughter of the King of Mountains (gīrirāja kumāri)! Consider what I have said to you and pay heed to my advice, and abandon all doubts and confusions regarding Lord Ram that you may have in your heart. Instead, be devoted to Lord Ram, worship him, and pay your obeisance to the Lord's holy feet.

Listen, my wise and enlightened words would be like the rays of the sun that would remove the darkness of doubts and delusions that cloud your inner-self.

[To wit, my discourse would enlighten you and eliminate all sorts of confusions about Lord Ram that have caused you so much bewilderment.]<sup>1</sup> (Sortha no. 115)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>And indeed it was so, because we read that when Lord Shiva had concluded his discourse and told Parvati the whole story of Lord Ram, which we too are about to read, she was fully satisfied, and all her doubts and confusions were eliminated. She developed profound devotion for Lord Ram, and was convinced about the divinity and holiness of the Lord. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 129 along with Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede it.}

Lord Shiva's advice to Parvati is similar to what sage Vasistha has observed while talking with king Janak at Chitrakoot. The sage told the king that if a person has true knowledge, or 'Gyan', about anything, then his wisdom itself would act like the rays of the sun that makes the lotus flower bloom and open its petals. Verily indeed, how can delusions and its attendant problems trouble a person who has affection for Lord Ram, wondered the sage. {Apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 277.}

What Lord Shiva intends to tell Parvati here is that if she carefully listens to his narration of Lord Ram's sacred story known as 'Ram Charit Manas', she is sure to find peace of mind and feel blessed. Nay, not only that, but she would also develop an abiding devotion for Lord Ram and become his ardent worshipper. This is the reason why Lord Shiva included the discourse between the saintly crow Kaagbhusund and Garud in his own narrative before finally winding it up. {Apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, from Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 58—to Doha no. 125.}

Shiva winds up his discourse by telling Parvati that a person who has affection for Lord Ram, who sincerely worships Lord Ram and has undiluted devotion for him—verily indeed, such a person is most fortunate and blessed in all possible ways; he is wise, erudite and well versed in the essence of the scriptures. {Apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, from Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 127.}

Therefore, Lord Shiva advised Parvati, she ought not to have any misgivings regarding Lord Ram.]

aguna arūpa alakha aja jōī. bhagata prēma basa saguna sō hōī. 2.

The Supreme Being who has no discernible qualities and attributes, who is formless and invisible, who has no birth as he is infinite and eternal, and is sublime and subtle, and whose essential form is cosmic Consciousness (i.e. a form that is known as Nirguna)—the same Lord God, out of affection for his devotees who too have affection for the Lord, as well as to oblige them, assumes a physical form that is visible, a form that has many attributes and characteristics common to all living beings who have a gross physical body that takes a birth, grows into adulthood, becomes old and finally die in this mortal world (i.e. a form that is called Saguna)<sup>3</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>What is 'Saguna' and 'Nirguna' forms of the Supreme Being? This question is answered immediately in verse no. 2 herein above. Essentially and etymologically, the word 'Saguna' means one having any kind of 'Guna', or quality and attribute, and 'Nirguna' means one that has no Guna.

Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 108—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 109.

<sup>3</sup>Kaagbhusund has reiterated the same thing in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 72-a in very explicit terms.

In this context, we can cite Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 185. In these verses Lord Shiva advises mother earth, gods and sages who were searching the Supreme Being and wondering where to find him, that the Lord is accessible here and now if one has affection and devotion for him.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1, 3-7 that precede Doha no. 23; (b) Aranya Kand, (ii) Chaupai line nos. 12-13 that precede Doha no. 13; (c) Lanka Kand, (iii) Chanda line nos. 12-14 that precede Doha no. 113; and (d) Uttar Kand, (iv) Chaupai line nos. 2-11 that precede Doha no. 111.

It will be noted here that great sages and ascetics prefer the Saguna form of Lord Ram as compared to the Lord's Nirguna form, for the simple reason that it is much easier to relate to and meditate upon the Saguna form of the Lord as compared to the Nirguna form, as the latter form is not only very difficult to comprehend, but it is also too abstract and intractable to be made easily accessible to everyone.]

jō guna rahita saguna sō'i kaisēm. jalu hima upala bilaga nahim jaisēm. 3.
jāsu nāma bhrama timira pataṅgā. tēhi kimi kahi'a bimōha prasaṅgā. 4.

Verily indeed, the fact that an entity that is without attributes (Nirguna) can also exist simultaneously as an entity with attributes (as Saguna) is proved by taking the example of element called 'water' being inherently present in a ball of ice or a hail-stone<sup>1</sup>. (3)

The Lord (i.e. Lord Ram) whose divine, holy and sacred Name is as powerful as the sun in its potential powers to eliminate darkness symbolising all sorts of spiritual delusions and dilemmas<sup>2</sup>, say, how can that Lord ever have anything to do with Moha (delusions and dilemmas), how can he be influenced by Moha, how can Moha affect him<sup>3</sup>? (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>If we analyse ice, snow or hail we would discover that 'water' is their essential ingredient, though of course in an invisible form, as ice, snow and hail all have a 'solid' form as opposed to the form of 'water' we are usually acquainted with in our day-to-day lives, i.e. as a 'liquid' which we drink and wash ourselves with, and which flows in rivers.

But a wise man will say that "ice, snow and hail are but different forms of the same element known as water as are the liquid we drink and wash with, and that which flows in the river".

The element called 'water', at the molecular level, is not visible to the eye, and neither has it any fixed physical shape or size, but this element is inherently present in all things made of water, of whatever shape they may be and contours they may have, such as ice, snow, hail, liquid, vapour, steam, mist, moisture, cloud etc., i.e. shapes having different attributes and nomenclature. But all of them are essentially ‘water’ and nothing else.

Likewise, everything in creation, from the subtlest to the grossest, is a manifestation of the same Brahm, whose other name is the cosmic Consciousness. This cosmic Consciousness is called the ‘Parmatma’ or the Supreme Atma or the Supreme Being at the macrocosmic level of creation, and as the Atma of the individual creature, the living being, at the microcosmic level. So, obviously there is no fundamental difference between the two.

राम सच्चिदानंद दिनेसा । नहिं तहँ मोह निसा लवलेसा ॥ ५ ॥

सहज प्रकासरूप भगवाना । नहिं तहँ पुनि बिग्यान बिहाना ॥ ६ ॥

rāma saccidānanda dinēsā. nahim̐ taham̐ mōha nisā lavalēsā. 5.
sahaja prakāsarūpa bhagavānā. nahim̐ taham̐ puni bigyāna bihānā. 6.

Lord Ram is an embodiment of the virtues of Truth, Consciousness and Bliss combined into one divine entity (saccidānanda) that is as brilliant and self-illuminated as the Sun (dinēsā)<sup>1</sup>.

This being the case, there is no question of darkness symbolizing the negative trait of Moha (worldly attachments, passions or desires arising out of delusions and ignorance of the Truth) ever having to do anything with Lord Ram<sup>2</sup>. (5)

Lord Ram is inherently and eternally enlightened and self-illuminated (like the celestial sun), so there is no question of any light of a new day (representing new knowledge) dawning on his horizon (to make him majestic, well-known, divine, holy and supreme in this creation)<sup>3</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 50 where Lord Shiva has said the same thing in relation to Lord Ram while paying his respects to the Lord.

Other references that describe Lord Ram as “saccidānanda” are the following: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 50 (Sati wonders why Lord Shiva has used this honour for Lord Ram); (b) Uttar Kand, (ii) Doha no. 47 (Lord Shiva); (iii) Doha no. 52-a (Parvati); (iv) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 72 (sage Kaagbhusund); (v) Doha no. 68-b (Kaagbhusund); (vi) Doha no. 77 (Kaagbhusund).

The celestial sun is a self-illuminated body; it does not require anything else to make it shine. Rather, the rest of the world shines in the light of the sun.

Similarly, Lord Ram is an embodiment ‘Bliss’, pure ‘Consciousness’ and ‘Truth’ which are self-illuminated in the sense that there is no entity or element in creation that is superior to them, and these three elements combined are the characteristic virtue of the Supreme Being which makes the Lord superior to all 'beings' or entities in creation.

Further, according to the metaphysical philosophy of the Upanishads, it is the 'Consciousness' that is the only Truth in creation, and a person who understands this universal fact and realizes that his own 'self' is also the same cosmic consciousness that drives the world and injects life into this creation, becomes blissful because no grief and worldly taints can ever affect such a wise, self-realised and enlightened person; he becomes an anchor for the rest of the society. His erudition, sagacity, knowledge, calmness, holiness, piety and divinity are virtually infectious and are like the rays of the sun, for they benefit the rest of the world, as anyone who comes in contact with such persons is sure to derive immense peace, happiness and glory by this association.

To wit, the grand virtues of Consciousness, Bliss and Truth, which are so characteristic of Lord Ram, would also have their positive and reinvigorating effect on all those who come in contact with the Lord, just like the case of the light of the sun that illuminates the whole world over which the sun shines.

<sup>2</sup>Wherever there is sun's light, there is no darkness of the night; the two can never exist simultaneously. Similarly, 'Moha', representing darkness, can have no existence in the presence of Lord Ram who is like the sun that automatically removes darkness.

<sup>3</sup>Taking the example of the sun and the earth, it is easy to understand what is being said here. The 'sun' has no night and day, as it is eternally self-illuminated, and therefore always lighted. On the other hand, the 'earth' has a night, after which the light of a new day dawns on its eastern horizon as the sun rises, because it has no light of its own but shines in the light of the sun.

Likewise, Lord Ram needs no light to illuminate him; he does not need anyone to bear witness for him, to certify his greatness and majesty, to praise him, glorify him and sing laurels in his honour to enable the Lord to be declared divine and holy and supreme in this creation, for these virtues belong to him by default.]

राम ब्रह्म व्यापक जग जाना । परमानंद परेस पुराना ॥ ८ ॥

haraṣa biṣāda gyāna agyānā. jīva dharma ahamiti abhimānā. 7.
rāma brahma byāpaka jaga jānā. paramānanda parēsa purānā. 8.

There are certain characteristics that are common to all living beings who are born as mortals in this world—such as having the feeling of joy and grief (and getting affected by them), of being either wise, intelligent and skilled, or being stupid, dull and ignorant to a greater or lesser degree, and of having some kind of ego, arrogance, pride and a sense of self-righteousness in them. (7)

In sharp contrast to such mortal beings, it is well established and well known that Lord Ram is Brahm (the Supreme Being) himself personified, and therefore the Lord exhibits certain characters that are exclusive to Brahm alone, such as him being all-pervading and omnipresent in this creation, him being an embodiment of supreme bliss, beatitude and felicity, him being the Supreme Authority and the Lord God of creation, and one who is worshipped, extolled and honoured by the ancient scriptures.

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Shiva enlightens Parvati about the reality of Lord Ram, and advises her not to be misled by the latter's form as a human prince of Ayodhya. She will be well advised to understand that often what is seen is not the real truth like the case of water in a desert mirage, and that the real truth is often not visible like the case of the presence of the water element in a piece of ice or a bank of clouds in the sky.

This observation of Lord Shiva is aimed to answer Parvati's basic cause of confusion: that if Lord Ram was an ordinary human being, as the case apparently appears to be going by the Lord's deeds that mimic that of an ordinary man, then why did Lord Shiva bow his head reverentially before him as if Lord Ram was a revered deity worshipped by him; but on the other hand, if Lord Ram was indeed the Supreme Being who is supposed to be all-knowing and all-powerful, then why did he not know who had taken away his wife Sita, why did he grieve for her and wandered in the wilds searching for her like an ordinary man whose wife had been lost, and why did he have to wage a bloody war against her abductor, the demon king Ravana, with the help of an army of monkeys and bears to kill him and free her, because he could have done it easily by merely wishing to do so. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 48—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 52; (ii) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 108—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 109.}

What Lord Shiva has told Parvati in these verses finds a resonance in what the saintly crow Kaagbhusund told Garud in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 3-8 that precede Doha no. 78, and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 3-6 that precede Doha no. 111. In these verses, sage Kaagbhusund has highlighted the difference between a mortal creature and the immortal Brahm represented by Lord Ram, yet emphasizing that if one were to analyse things deeply and understand the truth, one would conclude that there is no basic or elementary difference between the two, because while Brahm, the Supreme Being, represents cosmic Consciousness at the macrocosmic level of existence, the creature, the living being, represents the same Consciousness at the microcosmic level of creation.

In this context, refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 32 which says “wise and enlightened sages, who are well-versed in the essence of Brahm, practice equanimity, and they see no basic difference between any two entities in this creation as everything is a manifestation of one single entity known as Brahm representing cosmic Consciousness.” The following Doha no. 116 endorses this view.]

puruṣa prasid'dha prakāsa nidhi pragaṭa parāvara nātha.

raghukulamani mama svāmi sō'i kahi sivam' nāya'u mātha. 116.

Lord Shiva finally bowed his head reverentially once again before Lord Ram and said, ‘Verily indeed, forsooth and without gainsay, the Lord (Ram) who is famed and honoured as the ancient Purush (the cosmic Male who is the Supreme Being and Father of creation, the Lord who has been lauded and applauded by using this term in the famous ‘Purush Sukta’, a hymn dedicated to Lord Vishnu in the Vedas), the Lord who is a fount of light as he is self-illuminated like the sun<sup>1</sup>, the Lord who has revealed himself in all forms that the creation has taken, both the animate world as well as the inanimate world (and he is all-pervading in it)<sup>2</sup>, and who is the Supreme Lord and Authority in this creation—it is the same Supreme Lord who took birth as a jewel (i.e. the most illustrious and exalted member) in the family of king Raghu<sup>3</sup> whom I worship and adore as my Lord<sup>4</sup>.’# (Doha no. 116)

<sup>3</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 188 where we read that the family of king Dasrath, the worldly father of Lord Ram, was an ancient family that was honoured even by the Vedas, ancient scriptures. And, in Doha nos. 191 and 192 we read that the Lord of creation took birth in this king’s household as Lord Ram.

<sup>4</sup>Lord Shiva addresses Paravati’s cause of confusion here by saying that Lord Ram whose sight had made him feel thrilled and tears of affection welling up in his eyes earlier*, an event that led to Sati being so much vexed and mystified that it led to her being abandoned by her husband Shiva, was none but the Supreme Being honoured by the Purans and Vedas, and was the same Lord whose eclectic virtues have been outlined in this Doha as well as in the verses preceding it. {*Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 50}

So therefore now, she must set aside all doubts and confusions vis-à-vis Lord Ram, and pay attention and listen reverentially to the divine story of Lord Ram which he, i.e. Lord Shiva, was about to tell her.

#A similar theme is explained by sage Kaagbhusund to Garud elaborately in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 72—to Doha no. 73.]

चौ०. निज भ्रम नहिं समुझहिं अग्यानी । प्रभु पर मोह धरहिं जड़ प्राणी ॥ १ ॥

jathā gagana ghana paṭala nihārī. jhāmpē’u bhānu kahahim kubicārī. 2.

Those who are fool and lack wisdom (as well as are haughty, arrogant, and too proud of themselves and their false sense of knowledge) will not accept their own error of judgment and lack of correct understanding about Lord Ram, as a result of which they cast all sorts of ignorance-based aspersions on the Lord, on his divinity and holiness, attributing worldly characters and qualities on the Lord who is without any attributes<sup>1</sup>. (1)

It is just like the case of a stupid person saying that the sun has lost its shine if a bank of dark clouds in the sky obstructs the light of the sun<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The following verses of Ram Charit Manas also reflect the same idea: (i) Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 115 (words of Lord Shiva); and (ii) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2, 7-9 that precede Doha no. 73 (words of Kaagbhusund).

<sup>2</sup>A similar idea of a stupid man not being able to see the truth behind any event and making erroneous and absurd conclusions about it is found in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that precede Doha no. 73.

The sun has not lost its splendour even a wee whit, but it is the cloud that obstructs its light from reaching the earth. But a fool would not understand this obvious thing and say instead that the sun has lost its shine.

Similarly, fools and ignorant people say Lord Ram is not the Supreme Being but an ordinary man, because when they hear the Lord's story they learn that the Lord acted and behaved like an ordinary man. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 93.

These people do not have deep understanding of anything; they can't see the subtle truth that is hidden behind a veil of external appearances that are misleading, and their intellect is of such a low grade that they can't peer behind the curtain to analyse the events and put them in the correct perspective, nor are able to do some research work to find out the cause of any event.

To wit, people of low intelligence are unable to understand that it was the Supreme Being himself who had manifested as Lord Ram in order to fulfill certain obligations that constrained him to become a human being. They don't realise that there were some compelling situations that had obliged the Supreme Being to assume a human form for a while, and that once the Lord became a human being, he acted his role to perfection, for one ought to remember that the Supreme Being is 'supreme and perfect' in all respects, and this includes acting out his role as a human being in a perfect way, without any shortcoming in the act, like a skilled actor is expected to do while he is acting on stage. Verily, a skilled actor is one who assumes the personality he is expected to portray on stage, and as long as he is on the stage and acting out his assigned role, he would forget who he actually is in real life, becoming a changed man while carrying out his assigned role.]

citava jō lōcana aṅguli lā'ēm̃. pragaṭa jugala sasi tēhi kē bhā'ēm̃. 3.
umā rāma biṣa'ika asa mōhā. nabha tama dhūma dhūri jimi sōhā. 4.

If one holds a finger very close to one's eye and sees the moon, the latter would appear to be cleaved into two halves<sup>1</sup>. (3)

[Lord Shiva said—] Oh Uma! Attributing worldly taints and assigning falsehoods to Lord Ram and casting so many aspersions on him are like attributing the sky, which is actually free from any impurity, with factors that question its purity, such as it having darkness, smoke or dust<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>But obviously this is not the case as it is simply a case of optical illusion, because the disc of the moon is one single whole, and not sliced into two halves as it erroneously appears to be. Likewise, if one is deluded and not aware of the truth, if one lacks proper wisdom, proper intellect and a proper sense of judgment, one would fail to interpret things and events correctly, they would appear distorted to him, and as a consequence he is unable to arrive at a right conclusion.

This example of a person believing that the moon is cleaved into two parts, and not realizing that this distorted view of the moon is no fault of the moon but is due to his own fault of looking at it with his fingers held close to the eye, is used here to explain how a deluded and ignorant person would attribute so many worldly faults to Lord Ram without realizing that it his own folly, his own stupidity, his own lack of proper judgment and understanding that has created this distorted view of the Lord, making the person question the divinity and holiness of Lord Ram, and harbouring doubts about the Lord's authenticity.

To wit, the true nature and identity of Lord Ram as the Supreme Being is not understood by a person if he looks at the Lord with a pre-conceived notion and distorted vision, with his mind corrupted, and its instrument called the intellect, which analyses things for the person and guides the mind, being tuned only to think negatively and perceive the negative side of everything.

Instead, it would be better for a person to analyse and understanding things judiciously and with the correct perspective, for then alone all falsehoods and ill-conceived notions about Lord Ram would be eliminated.

<sup>2</sup>The sky is pristine pure and free from any sort of corruption that can be said to be its inherent or natural character. But many external factors impinge on the sky's natural cleanliness and purity, thereby polluting it and giving a distorted view of it to the viewer.

For example, the sky has no light of its own, and neither is it dark; it is colourless. It is the light of the sun which makes it look blue or other shades of colour during the day, and the absence of sunlight makes the sky look dark in the night.

Similarly, if there is smoke and dust in the sky one would say that the sky is smoky or dusty, or that there is a smog in the sky which makes visibility poor, but this is obviously an erroneous statement as it gives a false description of the sky, for it imposes some attributes on the sky which it does not actually possess.

To wit, the sky is neither 'dark', nor 'smoky' or 'dusty' or has any smog in it; it is pristine clean and without any specific attributes that would characterize it. This fact is witnessed by astronauts who go out into space, for then they can witness for themselves that what is called the 'sky' is nothing but endless emptiness, it is nothing but a vast and endless element consisting of nothingness, a sort of vacuum with no gravity, where everything in physical creation floats.

So to say, for example, that the sky is bright during the day and dark in the night, or that it is foggy or smoggy or dusty on a particular day, is a wrong description of the true character of the sky. The wise man would say instead that the sky has no colour, it has no light and therefore no darkness, and that it is pristine clean, although others would see it dark in the night, bright in the day, dusty during a dust-storm, and smoggy due to atmospheric pollution.

These two analogies of verse nos. 3 and 4 are employed here to stress one simple fact that it would be erroneous to say that Lord Ram was a human being just because he acted and behaved like a human being, because such conclusion about the Lord is not based on facts, but it is an error of understanding and faulty judgment. This is already said in Chaupai line no. 1 herein above.

In this context, refer to: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Ayodhya Kand, Sortha no. 126—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 127; (b) Uttar Kand, Doha no. 72.]

biṣaya karana sura jīva samētā. sakala ēka tēm ēka sacētā. 5.
saba kara parama prakāsaka jōī. rāma anādi avadhapati sōī. 6.

The objects of the senses, the sense organs themselves, the deities that preside over these sense organs and govern them, and the Jiva (the living being)—these four aspects of the world are like links in a chain, each related to and depending on the other to have any meaningful existence and remain active<sup>1</sup>. (5)

But there is a Supreme Authority above all of them that governs and illuminates them all (just like the celestial sun that illuminates everything else below). This Supreme Authority is called Consciousness that illuminates all life in this creation<sup>2</sup>, and it is this Supreme Consciousness that has manifested itself in the form of Lord Ram, the King of Ayodhya<sup>3</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The Jiva, the living being, has two aspects—one is its gross body, and the other is its subtle body. The gross body has various sense organs with which the Jiva perceives the world and its objects, and interacts with them. The subtle body of the Jiva consists of its Atma, the consciousness that resides in the gross body and governs it from within. If there is no consciousness, the gross body is dead.

To understand the phenomenon of the world and how the Jiva is related to it, and then who controls the entire setup, we have to start from the bottom and move upwards like one would ascend a pyramid. The material world consists of basically five types of objects that are directly related to their respective sense organs in the gross body of the Jiva.

For example, the sense organ known as the ‘eye’ is related to the function of seeing that makes the Jiva aware of the existence of the physical world and the charm of its attractive objects; this lures the Jiva towards the world. The organ of the ‘ear’ enables the Jiva to hear about the charms of the world and its attractive objects, further enhancing his attachment and attraction for the world. The organ of the ‘nose’ then helps the Jiva to smell the enticing fragrance of the objects of the world, which is the Jiva’s first close encounter with the physical objects at a personal level. The organ of the ‘tongue’ enables the Jiva to test the objects of the world by tasting their sweetness, an experience that reinforces the Jiva’s attachment with the charms of the objects of the world. And finally, the organ of the 'skin' makes him actually touch and feel the excitement and titillation of arousal that the object, which had already managed to attract him by its charming view, smell and taste, can give him. So now the Jiva gets attached with the objects of the world.

In this cosmic play, the five sense organs of perception (eye, ear, nose, tongue and skin) and five of action (hand, leg, mouth, excretory and genital) work in tandem to relate the Jiva to the material world and its objects, each sense organ responding to its corresponding sense objects in the world. But this relationship is at the level of the gross body of the Jiva and the gross material world.

What makes the gross body of the Jiva alive; what motivates it to do or not do anything; what factor is that which injects actual life into the otherwise inane and lifeless gross body of the Jiva? This unseen and subtle factor is known as 'pure consciousness' that resides in the gross body of the Jiva and drives it from within. It's like the case of an engine that drives a car; the body of the car is visible and recognized as the identity of the car, with its particular model, a specific colour etc., but the engine is hidden within the car and is invisible. The car is worthless and immobile without the engine, and the engine has no use if there is no car. In this analogy, the Jiva is the car, the Jiva's gross body and its organs are the many components of the car, and the consciousness is the engine that drives the car.

Any given thing in this world has its value and importance only because the Jiva thinks it to be useful, and the Jiva becomes aware of the thing and its usefulness only via the medium of organs of perception. Once attracted to it, the Jiva endeavours to access it, acquire it, use it, and dispose of it.

Now, each sense organ (of perception and action) has its own deity, i.e. a force that controls it and enables it to perform its designated function. According to the Upanishads, there are certain vital winds in the creature's body that control its various functions. These vital winds are called the different Prans, or life forces present inside the gross body of a creature, and since these Prans control the functioning of the sense organs, they are called the symbolic deities of the sense organs upon which they exercise their control or influence.

These 'Prans' are representatives of the 'consciousness' present in the body of a living being; they are the driving forces that makes the Jiva 'alive'.

The Atharva Veda's Par Brahm Upanishad, verse no. 2 explicitly asserts that Pran is a synonym for 'consciousness', and therefore for the Atma which is also the pure consciousness residing in the gross body of the living being. Since the cosmic aspect of the 'consciousness' is known as Brahm, Pran is also synonym for Brahm.

The Atharva Veda's Gopal Uttar Tapini Upanishad, verse nos. 47/1, 3, 5, 7, 9 assert that the various vital winds are revelations of Brahm.

According to Subalo-panishad, Canto 9, verse no. 1-14 of the Shukla Yajur Veda tradition, there are fourteen vital winds called Prans present in the body. It lists their functions as follows:

(i) Pran—this controls eyes and the faculty of sight (verse 1); (ii) Apaana—this controls ears and the faculty of hearing (verse 2); (iii) Vyan—this controls nose and the faculty of smell (verse 3); (iv) Udaan—this controls the tongue and the faculty of taste (verse 4); (v) Samaan—this controls the skin and the faculty of touch (verse 5); (vi) Vairambh—this controls speech (verse 6); (vii) Mukhya—this controls the hands (verse 7); (viii) Antarayaam—this controls the legs (verse 8); (ix) Prabhanjan—this controls the anus (verse 9); (x) Kurma—this controls the genitals (verse 10); (xi) Shyen—this controls the Mana or the thoughts and emotions (verse 11); (xii) Krishna—this controls the discrimination, intellect and wisdom (verse 12); (xiii)

Shwet—this controls Ahankar or the notion of ego, pride, arrogance, vanity etc. (verse 13); (xiv) Naag—this controls the ‘Chitta’ or the faculty of concentration, memory, sub-conscious, reasoning (verse 14).

The Purans however have assigned different names to the deities who control the different sense organs, both of perception and action.

(A) Deities of the organs of perception of the gross body of a creature are the following:

(i) ‘Disha’—(the God that rules over the directions). This is the deity of the organ of hearing, the ear, and it controls perception of sound.

(ii) ‘Pawan’—(the Wind God). This is the deity of the organ of touch and feeling, the skin, and it controls perception of feeling anything when it is touched.

(iii) ‘Surya’—(the Sun God). This is the deity of the organ of seeing, the eye, and it controls perception of sight.

(iv) ‘Varun’—(the Water God). This is the deity of the organ of taste, the tongue, and it controls perception of taste.

(v) ‘Ashwini Kumar’—(the God of medicinal herbs). This is the deity of the organ of smell, the nose, and it controls perception of smell.

(B) The Deities of the organs of action of the gross body of a creature are the following:

(i) ‘Agni’—(the Fire God). This is the deity of the organ of speaking and eating, the mouth, and it controls the ability to speak and eat.

(ii) ‘Indra’—(the King of Gods). This is the deity of the organ that accepts or holds anything, the hand, and it controls the ability to accept and hold anything.

(iii) ‘Upendra’—(a form of Lord Vishnu; the grosser form of the second of the Trinity Gods). This is the deity of the organ of walking and physical movement, the leg, and it controls mobility, the ability to move and go anywhere.

(iv) ‘Yama or Mitra’—(the Wind God). This is the deity of the organ of excretion, the rectum and bladder, and it controls the ability to pass stool and urine, the waste product of the body.

(v) ‘Prajapati’—(the God of Creation). This is the deity of the organ of procreation, the genitals, and it controls the ability to reproduce.

(C) The Deities that control the subtle body of a creature are the following:

(i) ‘Chandrama’—(the Moon God). This is the deity of the Mana, the heart and its emotions, and it controls emotions and sentiments of a creature.

(ii) ‘Brahma’—(the Patriarch of creation; the God who created the Vedas, the primary scriptures; the first of the Trinity Gods). This is the deity of Buddhi, the subtle organ called the mind, and it controls the intellect and the ability to think and analyse, the virtues of wisdom and erudition.

(iii) ‘Vishnu, or Achut’—(Lord Vishnu, the subtler form of the second God of the Trinity). This is the deity of ‘Chitta’, the sub-conscious mind.

(iv) ‘Ahankar’—(Rudra, the angry form of Lord Shiva, the third God of the Trinity). This is the deity that controls ego and pride. Since these create ‘anger’, it is said that the deity that controls Ahankar is Rudra, the angry form of Shiva.

<sup>2</sup>These above mentioned deities that govern the functioning of the different components or organs of the body of a Jiva are themselves controlled by a superior Authority known as the Atma of the Jiva. This Atma is pure consciousness; and as the name itself suggests, it is the only vital force present inside the body of a Jiva that injects 'life' and 'consciousness' into it, making the otherwise lifeless and inane body alive and active.

The Atma and the living being called the Jiva are microcosmic manifestations of the pure Consciousness that is called the Parmatma and the Supreme Being respectively at the macrocosmic level of creation.

The creation works as a result of the combined effort of all its components working in coordination with each other while performing their assigned duties independently too. If one component fails, the system would grind to a halt. The overall Authority that controls the whole setup of existence known as the 'creation' or the 'universe' is the Supreme Being, who in turn is a personified form of cosmic Consciousness. In the context of our reading of the Ramayana, Lord Ram is the Supreme Being referred to here, and therefore he is a personified form of cosmic Consciousness itself.

When the macrocosmic, all-pervading and subtle form of Lord Ram reveals its self in this mortal, gross world he becomes a 'Jiva', the living being, which in effect is a microcosmic form of the same cosmic Divinity.

It is like the case of an Emperor under whom there are many Kings and Knights, and each appoints his own ministers and magistrates, so that as a whole, the vast dominion of the Emperor can run smoothly. These magistrates, ministers, knights and kings derive their power and authority from the Emperor; they all serve him. Likewise, all the deities named herein above are under the overall supervision and control of Lord Ram, the Supreme Being.

Further, the Emperor would normally remain neutral and detached from the day-to-day administration of his extended empire, but in cases of emergencies when he finds that things are going out of control, he would intervene personally to set things right. This is the case with Lord Ram too. He is the Supreme Authority of this creation, and the many deities referred herein above are appointed by him to look after the functioning of the creation, both at the macrocosmic level as well as at the microcosmic level. Should anything go awry, and should the equilibrium of peace and harmony are right working get disturbed in this world, the Lord steps out of his Heavenly Abode like an Emperor coming out of his Palace, and personally take charge of the process of restoring the equilibrium and bringing things back in order. This phenomenon is interpreted as an "Avataar" or incarnation of the Supreme Being. Once the job is done, the Emperor goes back inside his palace; likewise, once the objective of assuming a human form is achieved, Lord Ram goes back to his heavenly abode to resume his original form known as Lord Vishnu, the Supreme Being.

jagata prakāśya prakāśaka rāmū. māyādhīsa gyāna guna dhāmū. 7.
jāsu satyatā tēṁ jaṛa māyā. bhāsa satya iva mōha sahāyā. 8.

This gross, mortal, material world is illuminated (i.e. it is in existence) by the light shone by Lord Ram (in the form of consciousness)<sup>1</sup>.

Indeed, forsooth and without gainsay, Lord Ram is the Lord of Maya (mysteries of creation; delusions), an embodiment gnosis and a personified form of knowledge, and a treasury of all virtues and wisdom. (7)

It is a truth that the material world that is primarily lifeless and inane, a world and its objects that are of no importance worth the name, assumes life and becomes valuable and important due to the Lord's Maya (delusion creating powers which is a great mystery of creation)<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, Lord Ram, the Supreme Being, keeps the world alive by injecting consciousness into it. This 'consciousness' is like the celestial sun whose light and energy keeps the world illuminated and alive. Just as all life on the planet earth would vanish in the absence of sun and its light, everything in creation would vanish if there was no consciousness in it. A dead body sees, hears, feels, tastes and smells nothing, nor would it have any attraction or repulsion for anything. It is the 'Consciousness' that makes the world alive and exhibit these characters. And who governs 'Consciousness'? It is Lord Ram as the Supreme Being who has exclusive authority over it.

<sup>2</sup>As seen above, the gross world has no life of its own; it is the 'Consciousness' that injects life in it. It is a strange mystery of creation that what is essentially lifeless and worthless appears to be alive and valuable, and why this strange phenomenon takes place is explained with the help of Maya of the Lord. 'Maya' is the delusion-creating powers of Lord Ram, and it is this powerful tool that gives the impression of life and value to things that in reality have just the opposite character.

It is like a puppeteer making a wooden and lifeless puppet dance and perform so many tricks that give the impression that the puppet actually has a life of its own, which in reality it doesn't.

Just like the case of sunlight creating a false impression of the inner side of an oyster shell being covered with a film of silver (because it shines with a silvery glaze), and of water being present on dry hot sand in a desert (because of an optical illusion called the mirage), both of which phenomena being mysteries of Nature and an unavoidable physical fact of creation, so is also the case with illusions created by the Lord's Maya which is an integral part of creation, and therefore can't be delineated and separated from it. [To wit, no one can avoid Maya absolutely; the trick is to be aware of its presence and powers, and be wary of it.] (Doha no. 117)

[Note—This Doha is an extension of Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes it, for it explains the meaning of that Chaupai with these two examples of the shell giving an impression of being coated with silver, and of water being present in a desert.

Everyone knows and understands that the two examples given in this Doha are illusions caused by some or the other principle of physics, yet no one can do away with them altogether; no one can prevent the shell from shining like silver or water appearing in a mirage formed in hot desert. Such appearances are an integral part of physical world and can't be avoided. A fool would fall in this trap and believe that the shell has silver and there is water in a distance in a hot desert; so this fool would scrape the shell to take out the silver, and run after water in a desert mirage. A wise man, on the other hand, would know that there is no such thing in reality, and so he will pay no attention to it.

Similarly, ignorant people fall in the trap laid by Maya, thinking that the world is real, and its myriad charms are real too. A wise and enlightened man would see through the trick and keep himself aloof.

jāsu krpām'asa bhrama miṭi jā'ī. girijā sō'i krpāla raghurā'ī. 3.

In this way (i.e. by being deluded and being ignorant of the reality behind existence in this gross material world) the creatures who live in this physical world of matter remain miserable and perpetually unhappy, inspite of the fact that they and the world are dependent on Lord Hari (the Supreme Being representing cosmic Consciousness) for survival<sup>1</sup>. (1)

[This verse explains the meaning and import of verse no. 1.] If someone is asleep and dreams that his head has been cut off, he will be agitated and restless, and this grief and torment of having one's head chopped off would not cease till the person wakes up<sup>2</sup>. (2)

And it is the grace of Lord Ram, the manifested form of the Supreme Being and a personified form of Consciousness, that such delusions about the gross mortal world can be eliminated<sup>3</sup>. (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The basic idea here in simple terms is this: The primary force that injects and governs life in this creation is called 'cosmic Consciousness', and it is this 'consciousness' which makes the world alive, both the inanimate as well as the animate, both at the gross level of the sense objects of the material world, and at the subtle level of the senses of perception of a living being. If there was no 'consciousness' the body of the living being would be lifeless, and anything that is devoid of life perceives nothing, and therefore the world would lose all meaning and relevance for the creature.

This 'Consciousness' is represented by Lord Hari. To wit, the Supreme Being is an embodiment, a personified form, of cosmic Consciousness. Therefore, everything that has life depends directly or indirectly on Lord Hari.

Two previous examples of silver appearing in the shell and water in the desert mirage clearly show that both these phenomena depends on the sunlight, because without the sun's light neither would the inner surface of the shell shine to give the impression of a silver film, nor would one see water in the desert. Though everyone who has even rudimentary knowledge of science would understand that both these sights are illusions and not realities, yet they appear to be so true that everyone is misled by them.

So is the case with this world: every wise person who has studied the scriptures knows that this world is false and illusionary, it is a creation of the mind, yet everyone believes it to be true, and this erroneous belief makes a creature get affected by the characters and features of this world, making him either sorrowful or joyful according to how he interacts with the world and how he treats the objects of the senses in this world. If he remains detached and neutral, he is happy and peaceful; if he allows himself to be influenced by them, he is perpetually restless and unhappy.

<sup>2</sup>To wit, as long as the person continues to dream in his sleep that his head has been cut off by his enemy, he would remain agitated and restless. But as soon as he wakes up from his dream, this false agitation would immediately vanish. So therefore, the only way and the only remedy for overcoming the grief and torment associated with having one's head chopped off in a dream is to wake up from it.

Similarly, the only way to get rid of worldly miseries and torments is to wake up from delusions and overcome ignorance about the world.

<sup>3</sup>Sage Kaagbhusund has advised Garud an identical thing in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 70—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 72; (ii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 78—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 79.

He (i.e. the cosmic form of Lord Ram as the Supreme Being) whose end or beginning no one can find or understand (because he is eternal and infinite), and whose glories and virtues have been narrated by the Vedas (the scriptures; the repository of all knowledge) according to their understanding (and yet they could not fully do so because of their limitation of understanding the Lord in entirety). (4)

He walks without having physical legs, hears without having physical ears, and does so many things without having a physical hand. [This refers to the pure consciousness that has no physical form of its own, but it walks, hears and does so many deeds through the medium of the body of the creature in which it lives as the latter's Atma.] (5)

He enjoys all sorts of tastes even without having a physical mouth of his own. He has no tongue of his own, but still is the greatest of orators in the world. [The idea of verse no. 5 above is extended here too. To wit, this consciousness has no physical mouth of its own, but it eats and drinks through the mouth of the creature. Similarly, though it has no tongue of its own, yet it is the greatest speaker by default in the guise of a wise person who is a great orator.] (6)

[Note—*Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Doha no. 14—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 15 where Mandodari, the wife of Ravana, has described the cosmic form of Lord Ram.]

asi saba bhām̐ti alaukika karanī. mahimā jāsu jā'i nahim baranī. 8.

He feels and touches without having a physical body; he sees without having a physical eye; he smells everything without having a physical nose. (7)

Verily indeed, forsooth and without gainsay, the mysteries of the Lord (i.e. Lord Ram in his primary form as Brahm, the personified form of cosmic Consciousness) are so strange, mystical and absolutely beyond comprehension that it is not possible to describe them. [And any attempt to do so only appears to be an exercise that would only scratch the surface of an divine entity that is infinite and defies understanding.]<sup>1</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The grand and mystical powers and abilities of Lord Ram mentioned in verse nos. 5-8 herein above clearly and unambiguously indicate that he is none but the Supreme Being known as 'Brahm' himself in a personified form, because only the latter has these supernatural abilities.

Brahm is a cosmic form of the supreme Consciousness that is the basis of all that exists in this creation. It is the subtlest form of life; its presence in the cosmos is indicated by the vibrations that it produces in ether, vibrations that generate a sound form known as OM. The sound of ‘OM’ in the cosmos is the first manifestation of Consciousness, and therefore it is regarded as being synonymous with Brahm. All other forms evolve from this basic seed, which gradually expands and develops into a complex structure which took the form of this universe, both in its invisible form which is subtle, as well as its visible component that is gross.

Since the whole creation is a revelation of the cosmic Consciousness representing life in its primary and basic form, therefore all indicators of life, viz. seeing, talking, feeling, smelling, hearing etc., are actually manifestations of the same cosmic Consciousness operating at the microcosmic level of an individual creature through that individual’s gross physical body. By corollary therefore, what we know about Lord Ram doing this and that is actually a knowledge of the supreme cosmic Consciousness operating through the medium of the physical body of Lord Ram.

The difference between Lord Ram and other creatures who have a physical body is the level of self-realisation and enlightenment that they have, the depth of their understanding about the truth of their ‘self’, for whereas Lord Ram was an embodiment of the stellar virtues which made his Atma, his pure and true ‘self’, exalted and elevated and above the grossness of the surrounding world where he lived, making his ‘self’ equivalent to Brahm, for he was an embodiment of the virtues of Brahm, marking him out from the rest of the world, but other creatures are not so fortunate. This is also why Lord Ram is compared to the lotus flower—because this flower remains clean and pure inspite of the pollutions in the water of the pond where it grows.

Such are the Lord’s magical and mystical deeds that they defy comprehension and logic as they seem very strange, outlandish and superhuman to an un-initiated person who does not know the Truth of the Lord. To wit, Lord Ram’s primary form is the cosmic Consciousness that is at the core of all life in this creation, and therefore all visible activities indicative of life, such as to walk, hear, see, taste and feel anything in this world, are deemed to be done by Lord Ram in his primary form as cosmic Consciousness which is the almighty, omnipotent, all-pervading, omnipresent and immanent driving force of all forms of life in this creation, from the subtlest to the grossest, albeit in an invisible, unpretentious and quiet form. So therefore, by understanding this basic principle a wise man can arrive at the unknown and the invisible cosmic Consciousness by starting from what is known and visible in this conscious world; he can attain the supreme Brahm easily by starting with Lord Ram, the visible form of Brahm known to him, and gradually realize the Lord’s greatness, divinity and cosmic authority by understanding the Truth about him.

Refer also to one of Tulsidas’ other classic books on Lord Ram, known as ‘Vairagya Sandipani’, where in verse no. 3 magical powers of Lord Ram are mentioned, powers that are clear indications of the Lord’s primary cosmic form as the supreme Consciousness known as ‘Brahm’, the Supreme Being who “hears without ears, sees without eyes, tastes without tongue, smells without nose, and feels without a skin”.]

[Elaborating on the divinity, holiness and glory of Lord Ram, Lord Shiva further told Parvati—] 'When I behold a creature dying in Kashi (which is ancient name of the present-day holy city of Varanasi in Northern India, situated on the banks of river Ganges, and regarded as the terrestrial abode of Lord Shiva), it is on the strength of his (Lord Ram's) holy name that I (Shiva) provide solace, peace and deliverance to the soul of the dying individual<sup>1</sup>. (1)

It is the same Lord Raghubir (Lord Ram) who is the supreme Lord of the entire world, both the animate as well as the inanimate world.

Verily indeed, the Lord resides in the inner-self of everyone in this creation (as his Atma, which is pure consciousness and the true identity of all individuals). The Lord knows the inner thoughts and emotions of everyone as he resides in the heart of all living beings, and is all-knowing, omniscient and omnipresent<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 19; (ii) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 46; and (iii) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 108.

It is believed that Lord Shiva utters the holy name of Lord Ram, i.e. "RAAM", in the ears of the dying person in Kashi, as a result of which the soul of the deceased attains deliverance, and the individual achieves emancipation and salvation.

Kashi or Varanasi is believed to be the terrestrial abode of Lord Shiva. According to the Ram Uttar-Tapini Upanishad, Canto 4, (especially verse no. 4) it is said that Lord Shiva utters the holy name of Lord Ram, known as the 'Tarak Mantra' (i.e. a divine formula that provides emancipation and salvation to the soul of a person so that he or she attains final liberation and deliverance from the cycle of birth and death in this world), in the ears of a dying person on the banks of river Ganges in Kashi, thereby ensuring that the soul of this person finds its ultimate liberation and deliverance.

Gowami Tulsidas has praised the spiritual importance of Kashi as the place where Mukti (liberation and deliverance) of the creature is possible. Reference: (i) Dohawali, Doha no. 237; (ii) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 119; and (iii) Vinai Patrika, verse no. 22.

In the epic ‘Ram Charit Manas’ of Goswami Tulsidas, Lord Shiva has himself said that he provides freedom from all sorts of sorrows, tolements and miseries to those who die at ‘Kashi’ relying on the strength of the divine name of Lord Ram which empowers him to do this, and which itself is the holy formula that enables a creature attain its final liberation, deliverance, emancipation and salvation. Shiva asserts that Lord Ram is the Supreme Being (“Parmatma”) who is the Lord of the entire creation (“Charaachar Swami”), and is also the deity whom Shiva worships as his own Lord God. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precedes Doha no. 119.

Kashi is called ‘Avimukta Kshetra—a place which provides liberation and deliverance to the soul.

The reason why Kashi (Varanasi) is called the ‘Avimukta Kshetra’ has been elaborately explained in the Ram Uttar Tapini Upanishad, Canto 1 and Canto 4, verse nos. 1-16 (i.e. in the full Canto); and in Bhasma Jabal Upanishad, Canto 2, paragraph no. 11.

The symbolic location and the spiritual significance of Kashi (Varanasi) has been elaborately described in the Atharva Veda’s Bhasma Jabal Upanishad, Canto 2, paragraph nos. 4, 9, 11, 16-19, 22.

In the Bhasma Jabal Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition, Canto 2, paragraph no. 11, Lord Shiva has himself told sage Jabal Bhusund that Kashi (Varanasi) is the Abhimukta Kshetra where those who reside get Mukti (liberation and deliverance). To quote—

“Canto 2, paragraph no. 11 = [This paragraph describes the glories of the terrestrial abode of Lord Shiva known as Kashi.]

For those desirous of Mukti (liberation and deliverance), residing in the pilgrim city of Kashi (the terrestrial abode of Lord Shiva) is equivalent to doing Tapa<sup>1</sup> (penances, austerities and other holy deeds requiring commitment, sufferance, hardships and steadfastness). It is known as the Avimukta Kshetra<sup>2</sup>. I provide liberation, deliverance, emancipation and salvation to all those who live there.

Hence, those desiring such spiritual benefits should not abandon Kashi. There is no better place for spiritual welfare other than Kashi known as Avimukta Kshetra.

Kashi has four important places at four corners. Inside this periphery is the central area, known as the ‘Anthaa Griha’. Inside this central area there are five important places. Amongst them, the shrine of Lord Shiva is the best and most holy.

To the east of this shrine is the symbolic abode of ‘Aishwarya’ (fame, majesty, glory, greatness, divine faculties, super-human powers, opulence, wealth, fortunes, grandeur etc.)

To the south of this shrine is the symbolic abode of ‘Vichaalan’ (factors that induce confusions, doubts, restlessness, agitation, flux, delusions, illusions, passions, attractions, attachments etc.).

To the west of this shrine is the symbolic abode of ‘Vairagya’ (renunciation, detachment, dispassion, neutrality, non-involvement etc.).

To the north of this shrine is the symbolic abode of ‘Gyan’ (truthful knowledge, enlightenment, realisation, erudition, wisdom etc.).

My (Shiva's) symbol or image known as 'Shiva Lingam' is established in this shrine. It has mystical qualities and eclectic virtues that reflect my glories, divinity and holiness. These qualities and virtues are as follows—

It is Anant (has no beginning or end, is infinite); it is Nirlipta (is not attached or attracted to anything or anyone); it is Avyaya (eternal, unchanging and imperishable; not to get diminished or degraded); it is Anaadi-Anant (has no beginning or end; is eternal and infinite); it is Ashesha (it leaves no remainder or residue; this is because it does not end, and is eternal and infinite); it worthy of knowing and researching by the medium of the scriptures such as the Vedas and the Upanishads (Vedanta); is indescribable and incomprehensible; is immune to being degraded, denigrated or demeaned; is much sought after by my devotees and fulfills their desires; and is Advitya (non-dual, unique and one of its only kind).

Besides this, it is the Aadhar or support, foundation and basis of all that exists; is self-supporting and does not need for its self any foundation to rest upon; it is esoteric and mystical in as much as what it appears on the surface is not its true form (it appears to be a stone image, but actually it represents me who am invisible and ethereal); and is always honoured and worshipped by the various Gods such as Brahma, Vishnu, Indra etc.

This symbol of mine is an image of illumination and light. That is why it is known as 'Jyotirlingam'—the Lingam or symbol of Shiva that resembles a male phallus, is self-illuminated and effuses a glow of divinity and holiness.

One should worship, pay obeisance to and honour me as well as my symbol known as this Jyotirlingam. [11]"

The Ram Uttar Tapini Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition, in its Canto 1, describes what the Avimukta Kshetra is. To quote—"OM salutations! Brishaspati (the moral preceptor or the Guru of Gods) asked sage Yagyawalkya—'Oh Brahmin! Which is the holy site that dwarfs Kurukshetra in its holiness, divinity and sanctity? Which is the place chosen even by the Gods to worship their seniors? Which is the place much sought after by the creatures seeking spiritual deliverance, emancipation and salvation?'

Yagyawalkya replied—'Certainly, this place—which is known as 'Kashi' (also known as the city of Varanasi in the north of India)—is called the 'Avimukta Tirtha'.

It is the holy site which is the first and foremost place for doing noble, religious and righteous deeds—i.e. it is the 'Kurukshetra' for spiritual aspirants desirous of Mukti, or spiritual liberation and deliverance. [The word 'Kurukshetra' has two parts—'Kuru' means to 'do', and 'Kshetra' means an area or realm. Hence, the Kurushetra is the area or place where one must do deeds in order to obtain one's desired objectives or fulfill one's dreams. In the spiritual field, this doing of deeds in order to realise one's objectives is to do auspicious and righteous deeds so that Mukti, or liberation and deliverance, is obtained from the endless cycle of birth and death in which the creature is trapped from time immemorial and countless generations of previous births. It is not that doing of good deeds elsewhere would not bear sweet fruits, but only that here the results are quicker and easier to beget as the spiritual soil, so to say, is more fertile at this place, and harnessing of positive energy of the super Consciousness is more easy and readily possible here.]

It is the place of worship selected even by the Gods to honour the Supreme Being. It is the location where the creature can attain oneness with the Parmatma (the supreme transcendental Soul, or the Lord God of creation) more easily and with the least effort. Hence, one should treat this place called 'Kashi' as the real Kurukshetra as compared to other religious or pilgrim site he goes visiting in search of Mukti.

It is in this place where Lord Shiva (Rudra) preaches the dying creature about the 'Tarak Brahm'. This nectar-like advice makes the creature immortal, helps in his final liberation from all worldly fetters arising out of ignorance and delusions, and helps in his deliverance from this mundane world. It is this advice of Lord Shiva about the Tarak Brahm that gives the dying creature a once in a life-time opportunity and the final chance to obtain emancipation and salvation.

Hence, one should attempt to take up a residence in Kashi and have faith in its ability to provide Mukti. One should never abandon it. This is the truth'. Sage Yagyawalkya thus explained the importance and significance of Kashi and the Tarak Brahm to Brishaspati (1)."

सादर सुमिरन जे नर करहीं । भव बारिधि गोपद इव तरहीं ॥ ४ ॥

bibasahum' jāsu nāma nara kahahīm. janama anēka racita agha dahahīm. 3.
sādara sumirana jē nara karahīm. bhava bāridhi gōpada iva tarahīm. 4.

Even if one utters the holy name of Lord Ram unwillingly, under any pretext whatsoever (i.e. even without having any intention to pray to the Lord or worship him), yet the name is so beneficial and inherently powerful that it leaves its impression on the fate of the individual in as much as it would eliminate the sins of that person which he has been accumulating for many generations<sup>1</sup>. (3)

If one remembers the holy name of Lord Ram with due reverence and faith, one is assured of getting across this vast ocean-like world of transmigration as easily as one would step over a small puddle of water made on soft ground by the pressure of a cow's hooves<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Ram's name has a mystical power to automatically purify the inner-self of a creature. The creature may utter the Lord's holy name willingly and with reverence, or he may do it unwillingly due to some reason other than showing respect to the Lord—yet in both the cases the name of Lord Ram shows its beneficial effects by purifying the inner-self of the creature and neutralizing the cumulative effects of sins committed by him over a long period of time.

It's like the case of a person dipping in a river: whether it is done voluntarily for the purpose of taking a bath, or someone pushing a person into the river against his wishes, but in both the cases the effect is the same, i.e. the person who enters the river would get wet. Similarly, Lord Ram's holy name would show its beneficial effects whether it is uttered with reverence for spiritual purposes, or just done routinely in a secular way, such as calling a person who might have 'Ram' as his own name.

<sup>2</sup>When a cow walks over soft ground, a shallow depression is formed in the soil in which water collects. It is barely a few inches in diameter, and one would easily step across it in a routine manner, without even noticing its presence. Similarly, by invoking the mystical powers of Lord Ram's holy name, a person can easily find liberation and deliverance for his soul; he can attain emancipation and salvation without the least effort.

To wit, the spiritual objective of attaining deliverance, emancipation and salvation from this world of transmigration, that would otherwise require strenuous efforts involving a variety of religious practices, is very conveniently and easily obtained by a devotee with the help of Lord Ram's holy name.

In this context, refer to Tulsidas' 'Kavitawali Ramayan', Uttar Kand, verse no. 76.

The glory of Lord Ram's holy name has been narrated elsewhere too in Ram Charit Manas. Refer: (a) Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 19—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 28; (b) Ayodhya Kand, (ii) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 194.]

[Said Lord Shiva—] 'Oh Bhavani (one of the names of Parvati; meaning the consort of Lord Bhava, i.e. Shiva)! Lord Ram is indeed the Parmatma, the Supreme Being. To have doubts about that Lord, as you said you had<sup>1</sup>, is something totally uncalled for and unwarranted, and it discredits your speech and is disgraceful for you even to think in this way. (5)

By inviting such ridiculous doubts to find a foothold in one's heart about something that is so obviously true, all good virtues that a person possesses, such as wisdom, renunciation, and many other excellent qualities of the spirit that he may have, become tainted and corrupted, bidding him good bye, and letting him feel completely muddled, bewildered, confused and deluded<sup>2</sup>. (6)

<sup>2</sup>Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 51; (b) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 59.

To wit, a wise person must not unnecessarily raise doubts with respect to things that are well-established, as such doubting does not help him in the least. On the contrary, such unwarranted doubts are disgraceful for him, showing him in very poor light. So therefore, only those who are blockheads and completely befuddled would doubt the authenticity and divinity of Lord Ram.]

सुनि सिव के भ्रम भंजन बचना । मिटि गै सब कुतरक कै रचना ॥ ७ ॥

sunī siva kē bhrama bhañjana bacanā. miṭi gai saba kutaraka kai racanā. 7.
 bha'i raghupati pada prīti pratīti. dārūna asambhāvanā bīti. 8.

Hearing the enlightening words of Lord Shiva that were capable of eliminating unwarranted confusions and doubts, all delusions and misgivings arising out of incredulity and misconception of the reality of Lord Ram, that had unfortunately sprung up in the mind of Parvati, vanished. (7)

With the dawn of true knowledge and enlightenment, she developed profound devotion and affection for the holy feet of Lord Ram<sup>1</sup>, and this set aside all chances of her getting trapped by some unprecedented and unforeseen misfortune that would have been detrimental to her own welfare<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Once Parvati was convinced about the divinity and holiness of Lord Ram, that Lord Ram was none but the Supreme Being himself in this form, profound devotion and affection for the Lord sprouted in her heart in a natural way. There is a specific verse in Ram Charit Manas which addresses this particular point, that when one becomes aware of the truth of anything, one develops true respect for it. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 89.

<sup>2</sup>This refers to the tragical events of her previous life in which Parvati was known as Sati. Sati had serious doubts about the divinity and mystical powers of Lord Ram when she saw him grieving for the loss of his wife Sita, and frantically searching for in the forest, because she reasoned that if Lord Ram was the Supreme Being as her husband Lord Shiva believed him to be, then how come he does not know where Sita is, and why is he wailing and lamenting at her loss like an ordinary man who is passionately in love with his wife, for the Supreme Being is expected to be above such worldly behaviour. This caused immense uneasiness and a sense of severe skepticism in her, for besides doubting Lord Ram's authenticity, she even began to question her husband Lord Shiva's own wisdom and erudition. She thought that Shiva was deluded and under some grave misunderstanding vis-à-vis Lord Ram, which in fact was not the case.

These doubts and bewilderments caused a lot of heart-burn to her, resulting in her losing her own wisdom and sense of propriety inasmuch as her attitude towards her husband, Lord Shiva, became defiant and irreverent. She became stubborn and refused to accept any advice that Lord Shiva gave her. The consequences were disastrous; first, Lord Shiva broke off all relations with her, and second, she died by jumping into the fire of the religious sacrifice her father was doing. {This entire episode has already been narrated in our reading of Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 48—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 64.}

Parvati had not forgotten those bitter memories; she herself admits it in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 107.

So, what this verse implies is that unlike on the previous occasion, this time round Parvati readily accepted Lord Shiva's advice to her regarding the divinity and holiness of Lord Ram, which was that the Lord was none but the Supreme Being himself in this form.

Certain things stand out prominently in the episode related to Parvati. First, one must respect the wisdom and advice of those who are wise, enlightened and knowledgeable regarding something, as Lord Shiva was concerning the truth of Lord Ram, and never defy or ridicule them, as Sati had done.

Second, it is always advisable not to suppress doubts about anything in one's heart as this is like a secret disease that gnaws and nibbles at the man from within, thereby robbing his peace of mind, making him restless, which in turn makes him lose wisdom and mental bearing, forcing him to behave irrationally and inadvertently harbour misgivings about everything, left, right and center. Instead, it is always good to approach a wise teacher to clarify matters, and have faith in the teacher's advice. Sati suppressed her doubts about Lord Ram, that led her to doubt Lord Shiva himself, which led her to behave disrespectfully towards him and become defiant, which in its wake had serious consequences for her in the form of Lord Shiva divorcing her, and she committing suicide by jumping into the fire to kill herself in disgust.]

bōlīṁ girijā bacana bara manahūṁ prēma rasa sāni. 119.

Girija (literally 'the daughter of the king of mountains; here referring to Parvati) repeatedly grasped the lotus-like holy feet of the Lord (i.e. Lord Shiva) to pay her respects to him, and joining her palms as a token of humble prayer, she spoke words that were extremely sweet and polite, as if they were infused with virtues of reverence and affection for the Lord. (Doha no. 119)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This gesture of Parvati proves that she is full of gratitude towards Lord Shiva and feels obliged to him for, one, being ready to remove her lingering doubts about Lord Ram, and two, not getting angry at her for once again raising the same query that had led to so much problem in her previous life.

There are other instances in Ram Charit Manas where the same sort of gesture for showing reverence has been mentioned. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Kishkindha Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 5-7 that precede Doha no. 2 (Hanuman); (ii) Chaupai line nos. 13-15 that precede Doha no. 7 (Sugriv); (b) Sundar Kand, (iii) Chaupai line nos 3-4 that precede Doha no. 49 (Vibhishan); (c) Uttar Kand, Doha no. 124-b along with Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that follow it (where Garud has expressed his sincere gratitude to sage Kaagbhusund in the same way as Parvati is doing now).

Earlier, Parvati had herself shown respect to her mother, the queen of the mountains, by falling at her feet repeatedly before her departure with Lord Shiva after her marriage with him—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 102.]

tumha kṛpāla sabu sansa'u harē'ū. rāma svarūpa jāni mōhi parē'ū. 2.

[Expressing her profound thanks to Lord Shiva, Parvati said—] ‘By hearing your soothing and pleasant words which were as comforting as the rays of moonlight, my ignorance and delusions (mōha), which were tormenting me like the unbearable heat of the autumnal sun<sup>1</sup>, have been eliminated. (1)

Oh merciful Lord (kṛpāla)! You have dispelled all my doubts and confusions<sup>2</sup>. Verily, I have now realised the truthful nature of Lord Ram<sup>3</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The sun’s heat during autumn is scorching. This is used here to indicate the level of unease Parvati’s delusions had been causing her. What the sun’s heat does to the physical body on the outside, the inner-self of a person is afflicted in a similar way when the person’s mind and heart are made to suffer due to some grave issue that bothers the person day and night, constantly nagging at him, and robbing him of his peace and happiness.

Parvati has herself admitted that she is highly upset by the issue which she wants resolved, so that all her confusions and doubts about Lord Ram are removed and she can find internal peace: refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 110.

<sup>3</sup>And what is that ‘truthful form of Lord Ram’ which Parvati wished to know and has now become aware of? She had herself asked Lord Shiva to remove her doubts and confusions about Lord Ram’s truthful form that have bewildered her so much as specifically mentioned in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 107.

Then, to help her out of her mental torment, Lord Shiva had outlined the divine form and holiness of Lord Ram as narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 116—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 119.

This advice of Lord Shiva helped Parvati to calm down and get internal peace, especially because the Lord had agreed to her request to tell her in detail all things related to Lord Ram’s worldly deeds, and simultaneously explain to her the reasons behind why the Lord acted in the way he did, thereby bridging the gap between what was visible and what was invisible, because the knowledge of factors playing behind the curtain were very crucial to understanding why Lord Ram’s story appeared to be like the story of an ordinary human being. Lord Ram’s worldly behaviour was the primary reason for Parvati’s perplexities because she could not reconcile between the two extreme forms of the Lord—one as the Supreme Being who was almighty and all-knowing, and the other as a human being grieving for his lost wife (Sita) and frantically searching for her in the wilds. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 50—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 51; (ii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 108—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 109.]

Oh Lord! By your kindness and grace, all my delusions and its attendant gloom, that had been the cause of so much internal agitation in me, have vanished, as a result of which, and by the blessings of your holy feet, I have attained peace and happiness. (3)

Although I admit that I am dull and ignorant lady by nature, one who is not too knowledgeable about profound spiritual matters and principles of metaphysics and theology, yet treating me as your devoted and loyal servant (āpani kiṅkari jānī) --- (4),

--- And if thou art pleased with me and my sincerity, I earnestly request you to please tell me (or answer the question) what I had wanted to know in the very beginning (of our meeting)<sup>1</sup>. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>And, what was it that Parvati wished to know when she first approached Lord Shiva, to which she now refers? She repeats the query once again in verse nos. 6-7 herein below. Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1 and 8 that precede Doha no. 108—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 109; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 110—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 111.

An important point to note here is this: Parvati had wished to hear the entire story of Lord Ram, and not just the truth of who he was. The answer which Lord Shiva had given to her heretofore was limited to expounding upon the divinity and holiness of Lord Ram as a personified form of the Supreme Being, but this summary of Lord Ram's greatness did not address the primary wish of Parvati, which was to hear the entire story of Lord Ram. As a consequence, she was not fully satisfied.

If this is the case, that she wasn't fully contented, then why did she say she was satisfied with what Lord Shiva had told her regarding Lord Ram as narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 119 along with Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede it, and Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that follow it?

Well, the obvious answer is that she did not want to annoy Shiva further by appearing to be stubborn and impertinent; she did not wish to give the wrong signal that she was inattentive to what he was saying, that she did not believe him—because that would have invited Lord Shiva's wrath, and she had already tasted the bitter fruit of this mischance happening as it actually did in her previous birth as Sati when her defiance led to the Lord abandoning or divorcing her, and her dying by jumping in the fire of a fire sacrifice to end her life. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 57; (ii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 64.]

 umā bacana suni parama binītā. rāmakathā para prīti punītā. 8.

[And what was that which Parvati specifically wished to know about Lord Ram? She says herself—] ‘Lord Ram (as you have affirmed, and I am convinced too) is none else but Brahm (the Supreme Being; the cosmic Lord of the whole creation) himself personified; he is indeed a personified form of cosmic Consciousness that is eternal, infinite and universal, as well as enlightenment itself; he is free from all attributes pertaining to this world, and he remains detached from everything in this creation (although he is all-pervading, all-encompassing, omnipresent and ubiquitous); and he lives in every thing and every being as their integral part (because the entire creation, both its animate form as well as inanimate form are a revelation of Brahm)<sup>1</sup>. (6)

This being the case, then what is the reason the Lord had to assume the form of a human being (which is the primary reason of my being confounded about him)<sup>2</sup>. Oh Lord Brishketu (the Lord who has an emblem of a bull on his flag; Lord Shiva)! Please explain this thing to me so that I can understand it (i.e. tell this secret reason to me in a simple language so that I can follow it, for I have already told you I am dumb and not too well versed in matters related to scriptures<sup>3</sup>).’ (7)

Lord Shiva was very pleased when he heard such polite words of Uma (i.e. Parvati), and observed that she had a purity of devotion when she requested him to tell her the divine story of Lord Ram<sup>4</sup>. (8) nature as she wanted to hear it in detail to remove any traces of doubts that might still linger secretly in her heart somewhere. Lord Shiva was glad that she has come out clean this time, instead of concealing things from him and telling lies to hide her impertinence as she did the last time. Verily indeed, forsooth and without gainsay, I reaffirm once again that Lord Ram's glories, his holy name, his divine stories and his many manifestations are countless, endless, and beyond description<sup>1</sup>.

Yet, oh Uma, I shall narrate them to you according to my understanding and the limited reach of my intellect. Listen to it attentively and with due reverence. (Sortha no. 120-d)

[Lord Shiva now would start the actual narration of the divine story of Lord Ram. To begin with, in the following verses that follow, he would first outline the reasons why the Supreme Being had to come down to this mortal world as a human being who was named 'Lord Ram'. So, answering Parvati's question asked in the previous verses, Lord Shiva told her—]

'Oh Girija, listen! The mystical deeds of Lord Hari (i.e. Lord Vishnu, the cosmic form of Brahm, the Supreme Being) and narratives related to them are very charming and pleasing to hear. They are numerous, vast in the sense that one can neither find when they commenced and when they ended as one seamlessly coalesces into another, and they have been sung (or narrated) in ancient scriptures too. (1)

It is not possible to specify one reason or the other for the Lord's manifestation; it is not feasible to say that there was one particular reason, or one reason which was more important than the other, why the Supreme Lord, who has a cosmic all-pervading presence, and is invisible as he has no physical form, would assume a physical form and reveal himself in this mortal world. (2)

Oh wise lady, listen (sunahi sayānī)! It is my considered opinion that Lord Ram is beyond the grasp of the intellect, mind and speech; he is beyond the purview of any of the faculties of the mind and its ability to express what it understands about anything. (3)

In spite of this, I shall tell you what great and enlightened saints, sages and seers as well as the many scriptures have said about the Lord in accordance with their own understanding, though such understanding is limited and varies from one individual or scripture to another<sup>1</sup>. (4)

Besides drawing on the narratives of these illustrious individuals and scriptures (as mentioned herein above), I shall also rely on my own understanding and experiences about Lord Ram in order to narrate to you the few reasons why the Supreme Being revealed himself as Lord Ram<sup>2</sup>. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Doha no. 12 along with Chaupai line nos. 10-12 that precede it, and Chaupai line no. 1 that follow it; (ii) Doha no. 139 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that follow it; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 140.

This explains why there is so much variation in the different versions of the story of the Ramayana. Though the outline remains primarily the same, yet the details vary from one narrative to another, leading to confusions and doubts about its authenticity and reliability. It is like the case of different teachers of any subject explaining it to their students in their own unique style, which would invariably vary from teacher to teacher.

Let us not forget that the story which we are presently reading, the story of Lord Ram called 'Ram Charit Manas', was first conceived in the Mana (mind and heart) of Lord Shiva—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 30; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 11 that precedes Doha no. 35.

Lord Shiva had revealed this story to (i) Parvati; and (ii) Kaagbhusund's guru*. {Refer: *Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 11 that precedes Doha no. 113.}

To wit, our narrative comes directly from Lord Shiva, and it is more reliable because Lord Shiva was the one who had first conceived it and narrated it.]

taba taba prabhu dhari bibidha sarīrā. harahim kṛpānidhi sajjana pīrā. 8.

[In these set of verses, Lord Shiva outlines the main reason why the Supreme Being was obliged to reveal himself in various forms, called incarnations, manifestations or revelations of the Lord. Presently, one such incarnation was that of Lord Ram.]

Whenever Dharma (i.e. the glorious, positive virtues of auspiciousness, righteousness, probity, propriety, ethics, and nobility of conduct and thought, and the high moral values they stand for in order to maintain law-and-order in creation) suffers in this creation due to the dominance of unscrupulous evil elements symbolized by the haughty and arrogant Demons, who do everything that is diametrically opposite to what Dharma stands for, and begin to tyrannize the world intolerably, as a result of which everyone suffers, from the humblest of creatures such as the cows as well as the followers of Dharma such as the Brahmins, to the most powerful ones such as the Gods as well as Mother Earth who can't stand against the ruthless onslaught and the might of the cruel Demons—on all such occasions the most merciful, compassionate and gracious Supreme Lord of this creation assumes different forms to manifest himself in this mortal world to remove the cause of sufferings of those who are on the right path, and to provide them with succour, solace and deliverance from the horrors created by their tormentors, the Demons, by eliminating the latter, thereby restoring peace and order in the world.

To wit, whenever goodness and positive forces in the world that are collectively represented by Dharma were in the decline due to the dominance of negative and evil forces symbolized by the Demons, whenever Dharma was being trounced and trampled underfoot the domineering Demons—on all such occasions the Supreme Lord of the world was obliged to intervene to restore balance and bring about peace and harmony in his creation by eliminating those elements that were disturbing peace and playing havoc with law and order in the world<sup>1</sup>. (6-8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chanda line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 13 where the Vedas have themselves reiterated this fact.

And how terrible were the demons? We shall read about them and their reign of terror in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 179—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 184.]

The Supreme Being intervenes personally on all such occasions (as outlined in the forgoing verses) to eliminate the demons who represent repressive, regressive and negative forces in creation, and restore the authority of the gods, who represent good virtues and righteousness, as well as the sanctity of the Vedas (scriptures) that had taken a severe beating during the ascendancy of the evil forces.

The above is the primary reason for Lord Ram's birth; it helps to establish the glories of the Lord in this world, and spread it far and wide. (Doha no. 121)

janama ēka du'i kaha'um' bakhānī. sāvadhāna sunu sumati bhavānī. 3.

The other reason why the merciful Supreme Lord assumes a form is to give an occasion to his devotees to remember his divine manifestations, and sing or narrate stories associated with them, so that they can derive bliss and joy while alive, and at the end of their lives they can cross this vast ocean-like world of transmigration to attain deliverance for themselves, and emancipation and salvation to their souls<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Verily indeed, the occasions when the Supreme Lord was obliged to come down personally in the form of Lord Ram to take charge of restoring peace and order in this mortal world by eliminating the trouble makers known as the Demons, were many; in each one full cycle of creation and destruction of this world there happened to be some event which compelled the Lord to manifest himself as Lord Ram. And since the cycle of creation and destruction goes on moving endlessly, the causes and reasons and the processes whereby Lord Ram had manifested himself in this mortal gross world varied from one age to another, and each is more wondrous and strange than the others preceding or following it. (2)

Oh Bhavani! You are wise, so listen attentively to one or two instances of the Lord's birth in this world that I am going to narrate to you now<sup>2</sup>. (3)

There were two favourite door-keepers who acted as guards of Lord Hari's (i.e. Lord Vishnu's) palace (abode) in the heaven (which is known as Vaikuntha), and everyone knows that their names were Jai and Vijai. (4)

These two brothers had to become evil demons due to a curse by a Brahmin (i.e. sages Sankaadi)<sup>1</sup>. (5)

They became famous as the two demons known as Hiranyakashipu (kanakakasipu)<sup>2</sup> and Hiranyaaksha (hāṭaka lōcana)<sup>3</sup> who had successfully vanquished the pride and haughtiness of Indra, the king of gods<sup>4</sup>. (6)

Note—<sup>1</sup>Jai and Vijai were the two sentries guarding the gates of Vaikuntha where Lord Vishnu lives. Once it so happened that the four mind-born sons of Brahma, the creator, i.e. Sanak, Sanaatan, Sanandan and Sanatkumar, collectively known as ‘Sankaadi’, had gone to Vaikuntha to have a divine viewing of Lord Vishnu. They had crossed six gates, but when they were about to cross the seventh and the last door their path was obstructed by the two gate-keepers of Lord Vishnu named Jai and Vijai who blocked the way by keeping their sticks across it. It was then these sages had cursed them that they would turn into demons for the next three births, and in each birth they would become enemies of the Lord, and each time get killed at his hands. Finally they will get deliverance from the curse upon being killed the third time. It is out of this curse that the two sentries Jai and Vijai became Hiranyakashipu and Hiranyaaksha in the first birth, Ravana and Kumbhakarna in the second birth, and finally Shishupaal and Dantavakra in the third birth. This story is narrated in Srimad Bhagwad Mahapurana, Skandha 3, Chapter nos. 15-16.

Hiranyakashipu and Hiranyaaksha were slayed by Lord Vishnu in his incarnations as Narsingh (half man and half lion) and Varaaha (Boar) respectively. Ravana and Kumbhakarna were slayed in the Lord’s incarnation as Sri Ram. And Shishupaal and Dantavakra were killed by Lord Krishna who was also an incarnation of Vishnu. This story is narrated in brief in Surdas’ Ram-Charitawali, verse no. 1.

Let us now read what Surdas’ Ram Charitawali, verse no. 1 has to say on this subject:-

hari-hari, hari-hari sumirana karau. hari-caranārabinda ura dharau..

“Verse 1. One should constantly, consistently and persistently remember Sri Hari (Vishnu), and enshrine Sri Hari’s divine and holy feet in one’s heart.

The Lord had two gatekeepers named Jai and Vijai. They became demons due to the curse of Brahmins (sages Sankadi etc.). Out of them, one (Jai in the form of the demon Hiranyaksha) was killed by the Lord in his manifestations as the legendary Boar, and the second one (Vijai in the form of the demon Hiranyakashipu) was killed when the Lord assumed the form of the half-lion half-man called Narsingh. Both these demons once again took birth as Ravana and Kumbhakarna respectively. The Lord incarnated himself as Sri Ram in the household of king Dashrath of Ayodhya for their deliverance.

Surdas says he repeats the (divine, glorious, holy) story of Lord Sri Ram’s incarnation (i.e. manifestation of Lord Vishnu, the supreme Lord of creation, as a human being in the form of Sri Ram) which sage Shukdeo had narrated to king Parikshit in Srimad Bhagwat (1).”

<sup>2</sup>Demon Hiranyakashipu: He was the father of Prahalad, a child who was one of the greatest devotees of Lord Vishnu. It was save Prahalad from the torments of his demon father who was bent on killing him that Lord Vishnu had revealed himself as ‘half-lion and half-man’, known as Lord Narsingh or Narsingh.

The story in brief is as follows:-

Lord Nrisingh or Narsingh is the half lion and half man incarnation of Lord Vishnu to slay the demon Hiranyakashipu who had been tormenting Prahalad, his son, because the latter worshipped and had devotion for Lord Vishnu whom the demon loathed. After having killed the demon, Nrisingh started roaming in the forests, striking terror in the hearts of all the creatures. It was then that Shiva, the universal Lord who has been honoured with the epithet of 'Mahadev' as he is the greatest and supreme God, had assumed the form of Sharav, the killer, and liberated Vishnu from the body of Nrisingh. [Refer Sharav Upanishad of Atharva Veda, verse no. 8.] Thus liberated, Vishnu had thanked him a lot (refer Sharav Upanishad of Atharva Veda, verse no. 19) and went to his divine abode called Vaikunth. So this ferocious form of Shiva known as Sharav was also called 'Rudra', the angry and ferocious form of the Lord. One can imagine the fight that might have raged between Nrisingh and Rudra, and obviously Rudra must have been more ferocious than Nrisingh in order to subdue the latter.

This 'half lion and half man' form of the Lord is a visible image that has a cosmic counterpart as the 'half man and half female' manifestation of the Lord that is known as 'Ardha-Narishwar'. This cosmic form of Brahm as Ardha-Narishwar has two components—the right half is depicted in iconography as being a male representing Shiva, the great God, the other half is female representing his divine Shakti known as Parvati or Uma. This Shakti represents the dynamic energy of Shiva. When this applies to Brahm, the male aspect refers to the Supreme Being himself while the female aspect applies to Maya which is the dynamic power that Brahm employed to initiate this magical creation. This depiction is basically envisioned to drive home the point that Brahm and Shakti are inseparable in the context of the creation of the world. This elementary method of reproduction is known as 'asexual reproduction' and is depicted by many asexual plants and animals even today. For instance, the one-celled amoeba reproduces itself by cleavage. On the other hand, if we were to regard Brahm in its purest form as the cosmic Consciousness, then Brahm would not need the other half of the Maya, and would only be one and universal entity which has no definite and describable form and shape, it has no characteristic features, attributes and qualities. This form of the sublime and most subtle Brahm is known as either the Hiranyagarbha or the Viraat Purush depending upon the level of subtlety and grossness which is assigned to it, the former being more subtle than the latter.

The 'lion' part is a metaphor for the grand qualities of unmatched authority, stupendous strength, physical prowess and complete and unchallenged sway over the entire domain of creation just like a lion has over the forest and its inhabitant wild animals. This term is symbolic of the inherent stupendous might of the supreme Brahm as the unquestioned and powerful Lord of this forest-like world inhabited by myriad varieties of living beings, called the Jivas, just like a dense forest infested by wild animals. Similarly, the 'man' part symbolizes the fact that Brahm is the most highly placed Lord much like a human being who represents the highest level in the ladder of evolution.

In other words, even as the lion is the unquestioned lord of the wilds and the man is of all the living beings, the supreme transcendental Brahm is the unquestioned Lord of all that exists with all its variations in this creation, whether in its primary form represented by the wild and primitive animals of the jungle or in its more evolved and developed form represented by the man, with all the other stages of creation included in between these two.

Lord Nrisingh is the fourth incarnation of the Supreme Being who had taken various forms to ward off and overcome evil forces in creation when they become ascendant and overcame the good and the righteous. The Lord did this to maintain order in the creation which is like his offspring.

So when one of his great devotees known as Prahalaad was being extremely tormented by his own father, the demon Hiranyakashipu, the Lord appeared as Nrisingh—or as a half lion and half man form—from the pillar to which the innocent lad was tied by the demon to prove to him the omnipresence and all-pervading form of the Supreme Being. Nrisingh is a personification of the grand virtues of dynamism, power, energy, valour and strength, and hence is worshipped by warriors and rulers in general. The Mantra of this Lord is believed to be very powerful and effective against enemies and opponents.

Tulsidas has narrated this incident in his book “Kavitawali”, Uttar Kand, verse no. 128 which says—

“The demon Hiranyakashipu drew his sword to kill Prahalaad (his son), but though the former had no mercy in his heart, the latter did not run away seeing his father who resembled the terrible God of death in a personified form. And when he challenged Prahalaad saying, ‘Tell me where your Ram is?’ The son replied, ‘Everywhere!’ At this, the father asked him, ‘Is he present in this stone pillar as well?’ Prahalaad replied, ‘Yes, sure!’

Hearing his earnest conviction and urgent call, Lord Narsingh manifested immediately, destroyed Prahalaad’s enemy (his father), and became ferociously angry. Then, it was only after Prahalaad prayed to him that he calmed down.

Tulsidas says—‘This resulted in increased devotion and love of the people towards the Lord, and it is since then that the people started worshipping stones (idols).’ ”

Iconographically, there are many forms of Nrisingh. Some of them are as follows—as seated (Aasin), as standing (Sthaanak), as boon-giver (Vardaayak), as ferocious and angry (Ugra), as striding (Yaanak), in the company of Laxmi, the Goddess of wealth and the divine consort of Vishnu (Laxmi-Nrisingh), as seated in Yoga or doing meditation like Shiva (Yoga-Nrisingh), as a resident of a mountain (Girija), etc.

His images depict him in either the two-hand form or in a four-hand form. In the latter case, the two back hands hold a conch and discus like the case of Vishnu. The two front hands are shown as killing the demon Hiranyakashipu by forcing the latter on his lap, tearing his abdomen, and yanking his entrails out by his sharp nails.

An entire Puran called Narsingh Puran is likewise dedicated to this Godhead. This Puran glorifies Nrisingh as an incarnation of Vishnu, and is regarded as being synonymous with Narayan, one of the names of Lord Vishnu who is none but the Supreme Being called Brahm. Since Lord Vishnu himself is a macrocosmic, all-inclusive and invisible form of the supreme transcendental Brahm, therefore Nrisingh is a de-facto visible form of the otherwise invisible Brahm.

Similarly, an entire Upanishad known as the Nrisingh Tapini Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition is dedicated to this deity. It also lists the various divine Mantras dedicated to Lord Nrisingh. It is the 7th Upanishad of this Veda.

The Shuk Rahasya Upanishad of Krishna Yajur Veda, verse no. 27, while describing the process of invoking one of the components ‘Asi’ (‘is’) of the Maha Vakya (the great saying of the Vedas) ‘Tattwamasi’ (‘that essence is you’) says that the Shakti (dynamic energy) of this individual component ‘Asi’ is Nrisingh.

The Skanda Upanishad of Krishna Yajur Veda, verse no. 13 praises Lord Nrisingh as an incarnation of the Trinity Gods consisting of Brahma the creator, Vishnu the sustainer, nourisher and protector, and Shiva the concluder of creation. His divine and glorious virtues are similar to Brahm. Earlier in this Upanishad it has already been established that these three Gods of the Trinity are Brahm personified, as well as the fact that the creature's Atma or pure 'self' which is Consciousness personified, are also Brahm personified. Hence, by worshipping Nrisingh one is offering prayers to Brahm and honouring the grand virtues of creation exemplified by the latter. He is also offering worship to the 'consciousness' that represents Brahm in the physical body of Lord Nrisingh.

<sup>3</sup>Demon Hiranyaaksha: He was slayed by Lord Vishnu in his incarnation as the Boar. It is the third incarnation of Vishnu in which he killed the demon Hiranyaksha and lifted the earth from the flood water where it had vanished. According to some versions, this demon had hidden the earth in the bowls of the ocean. This extrication and resurrection of the earth is a symbolic way of saying that the Lord saves the creation from being submerged in the vast ocean of sins and evil. An Upanishad preached by Lord Varaaha appears in the Krishna Yajur Veda tradition as its 30th Upanishad. The female aspect of Varaaha is known as Goddess Vaaraahi.

<sup>4</sup>Indra, the king of gods, was very proud of his strength and invincibility. These two demons had defeated the gods, and consequentially vanquished this pride of Indra. Even Indra had himself acknowledged to Lord Ram that 'he had a false sense of pride that there is no one like him in strength'—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chanda line no. 11 that precedes Doha no. 113.]

These two demons were invincible in battle and famed for their strength and valour. The Lord (i.e. Lord Hari or Lord Vishnu) had slayed one of them (i.e. the demon Hiranyaaksha) by assuming the form of a Great Boar (barāha bapu)<sup>1</sup>. (7)

In his form as Lord Narsingh (narahari), he had slayed the other demon (i.e. demon Hiranyakashipu) and freed Prahalad from his torments. This good deed and glory of the Lord spread all over the world and is widely known<sup>2</sup>. (8)

These two demons (i.e. Hiranyaaksha and Hiranyakashipu) became the famed demons Ravana and Kumbhakaran respectively. They were exceptionally strong, brave, courageous and valiant, and the whole world knows that they had vanquished even the supposedly almighty gods. (Doha no. 122) ēka bāra tinha kē hita lāgī. dharē'u sarīra bhagata anurāgī. 2.

The two brothers (Jai and Vijai) could not find deliverance even after being slayed by Lord Hari himself because of the Brahmin's curse which said that they will be born as demons for three consecutive births<sup>1</sup>. (1)

It was for their sake and welfare, i.e. to give them deliverance and overcome the curse of the Brahmin, that the Lord had to manifest himself as a human being (i.e. as Lord Ram). This is because the Lord loves his devotees very much and goes out of his way to help them<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The three incarnations of Lord Vishnu to help Jai and Vijai overcome the Brahmin's curse that mandated them to become demons three times were as Lord Varaaha, Lord Narsingh, and Lord Ram.

There is a little bit of confusion here—because Jai and Vijai had become demons Hiranyaaksha and Hiranyakashipu in their first births, and Lord Vishnu assumed the form of a Boar and Narsingh to slay them. In their next birth, i.e. the second, they became Ravana and Kumbhakaran who were slayed by Lord Ram. Then, what about the 'third birth' which they were bound to take as mandated by Sankaadi's curse?

Well, the answer is that their third birth was during Lord Krishna's time, as Shishupaal and Dantavakra; they were killed by Lord Krishna. This story is narrated in Srimad Bhagwad Mahapurāṇ, Skandha 3, Chapter nos. 15-16.

Since Parvati wished to know about Lord Ram, Lord Shiva focused his narration accordingly.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Hari, i.e. the Supreme Being, loves his devotees, in this case Jai and Vijai as well as Prahalad, so much that he does not mind his own conveniences and reputation if it helped them. Becoming a Boar and a Half-Man and Half-Lion is not something praiseworthy and willingly desired by anyone, let alone the Supreme Being who could have killed the demons by his mere wish. The Lord could have even nullified the curse of sages Sankaadi in order to protect his favourite door-keepers Jai and Vijai, because the Lord was almighty and possessed overriding authority in this creation, but he didn't do it because he had to keep in mind the respect due to sages Sankaadi, who were Brahmins, and let their curse become true.

In this context, refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-6 that precede Doha no. 13 which reiterate the same idea—that the Lord assumes a form for the sake of his devotees.]

In this manifestation of Lord Ram (which refers to Jai and Vijai becoming Ravana and Kumbhakaran), it was sage Kashyap and his wife Aditi (the mother of gods)<sup>1</sup> who had become king Dasrath and queen Kaushalya respectively, the famous parents of Lord Ram.

[To wit, in the era when Lord Vishnu became Lord Ram to deliver Jai and Vijai who had become Ravana and Kumbhakaran respectively, sage Kashyap and his wife Aditi became king Dasrath and queen Kaushalya respectively, the Lord's parents. It is because Kashyap and Aditi had done severe Tapa (penance) with a desire to have Lord Vishnu as their son, and the Lord obliged them in the form of Lord Ram.] (3)

In this way, Lord Hari (or Lord Vishnu, the Supreme Being) had revealed himself in one of the Kalps (one cycle of creation)<sup>2</sup> to do many deeds in this mortal world that were glorious and auspicious. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Sage Kashyap has been mentioned in the Rig Veda (9/114/2) as well as in Valmiki Ramayan (Baal Kand, cantos 70 and 75), Mahabharat (Adiparva, 63), Vishnu Puran (1/15 and 1/21), and Bhaagvata (4/1).

Kashyap was the grandson of the creator Brahma, and the son of sage Marichi, one of the mental-born sons of the creator Brahma. His mother was Kalaa who was the daughter of sage Kardama and his wife Devahuti.

Kashyap had married the thirteen daughters of Prajapati Daksha. Their names and progenies are listed in Vishnu Puran, Chapter 1, Canto 15, verse nos. 124-142, and Canto 21, verse nos. 4-28.

The names of his wives are Aditi, Diti, Danu, Arishta, Sursaa, Khasaa, Surbhi, Vintaa, Taamraa, Krodhvashtaa, Eeraa, Kadru and Muni.

Hence, Kashyap became the father of the entire living world that eventually populated the earth, the heavens and the subterranean worlds. He was the father of the Gods (Devas) through his wife Aditi, the Asuras (demons) through his wife Diti, the Daityas and Daanavas (cruel ogres, giants) from his wife Danu, the Birds from his wife Tamraa's six daughters, Siddhas (mystics and demi-gods having magical powers), Gandharvas (celestial musicians) through his wife Arishta, Yakshas (a semi-god who guards the treasury of Kuber, the treasurer of Gods) through his wife Khashaa, the Nagas (literally the serpents representing the reptiles, but meaning all the animals or those humans who worshipped such creatures) from his wife Kadru, the Dragons who could fly from his wife Sursaa, the Pishaachs (blood drinking vampires; evil spirits which eat excreta; the devil, the fiend, the Satan) from his wife Krodhvashaa, the Apsaras (celestial damsels) from his wife Muni—in short, the whole living world. In other words, the entire living species on earth can trace its lineage to sage Kashyap.

He is one of the four sages (the others being Marichi, Atri and Bhrigu) who had elaborately described the Vakhaanas Aagam followed by some Vaishnav sects (followers of Vishnu worship).

Vaalkhilyas once helped sage Kashyap perform his fire sacrifice successfully, but became tired. When Indra, the king of Gods, saw them weary, he laughed at them, thereby incurring their wrath who cursed him that he would be punished for his impertinence and arrogance by Garud, the legendary vehicle of Lord Vishnu.

Sage Kashyap and his eldest and senior wife Aditi did severe penance to have Lord Vishnu as their son, and this resulted in their being re-born as king Dasrath and his queen Kaushlaya in the Treta Yug when Lord Vishnu incarnated as Lord Ram to become their son.

The same couple became Vasudev and Devaki to whom Lord Vishnu was born as Lord Krishna in the Dwapar Yug.

Sage Kashyap wrote the ‘Kashyap Sanhita’, a treatise on the usual topics of Dharma—such as daily duties, offering of oblations and rituals to Spirits, ceremonial impurities, repentance for sins etc.

Another book titled ‘Kashyap Smriti’ is the law book on Dharma, and lists the duties of a householder, expiation for polluting public places like temples, wells and ponds, rules for mourning for dead ones, purification rites etc.

<sup>2</sup>A very interesting point is to be noted here with reference to Kashyap and Aditi. We shall read in due course that Lord Vishnu refers to them and the Tapa they did while assuring the Gods that he will come down to earth as Lord Ram in order to eliminate the demons led by Ravana. The Lord says that he had already promised Kashyap and Aditi that he would become their sons in due course of time, and this holy couple would soon become King Dasrath and queen Kaushalya of Ayodhya, so that the Lord would then reveal himself as their son known as Lord Ram. This fact is explicitly narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 186 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that follow it.

The rest of the story which unfolds by-and-by is based on this promise of Lord Vishnu to the gods and mother earth. So we can conclude that the story which Lord Shiva narrates to Parvati, and which we shall be reading in our book called ‘Ram Charit Manas’ presently, pertains to the birth of Lord Ram in the era when Kashyap and Aditi became Dasrath and Kaushalya respectively.]

parama satī asurādhīpa nārī. tēhiṁ bala tāhi na jitahiṁ purārī. 4.

In one other Kalpa (era; one cycle of creation and destruction) it so happened that the Lord observed that the gods were made miserable as all of them lost battles with the ferocious demon named Jalandhar<sup>1</sup>. (5)

Lord Shiva himself waged a fierce battle with this demon, and inspite of his best efforts he could not slay the mighty and powerful demon. (6)

The reason for the demon's invincibility was the chastity and loyalty of his wife, and it was this reason why Lord Tripurari (i.e. Lord Shiva) could not vanquish him. (7)

According to a legend, there was a cruel demon named Jalandhar who had a chaste wife named Brinda (pronounced as 'Brindaa'), who was a daughter of the demon Kaalnemi. Lord Shiva had tried his best to kill the demon but failed due to the spiritual powers gained by his wife Brinda by the virtue of vows of exemplary chastity and loyalty that she had towards her husband, the demon Jalandhar. To wit, it was Brinda's spiritual powers that protected the demon Jalandhar from death, because if he died then Brinda would have become a widow, which was not possible due to her stringent adherence to her religious vows that acted as an umbrella against her being a widow.

Since there was no other way to kill this cruel demon except to violate the vows of chastity and loyalty of Brinda towards her husband, the demon Jalandhar, and since it was obligatory for Lord Vishnu to take care of peace and welfare of the rest of the world, and to maintain law and order in creation for which he was duty-bound as its protector and sustainer, the Lord had no choice but to devise a device to somehow deflect Brinda from her vows so that the cruel demon Jalandhar could be slayed. Therefore, Lord Vishnu had disguised himself as the demon to violate the honourable lady's chastity, and she was inadvertently made to commit a sin which resulted in the withdrawal of the protective shield against widowhood that she had hitherto enjoyed. This enabled Lord Shiva to kill the demon Jalandhar.

But when Brinda realized that she had been deceived by Vishnu, she vehemently cursed the Lord to become a stone. Vishnu accepted the curse with respect because he knew that Brinda was immaculate and was not at fault, but it was necessary to violate her vows so that her cruel demon husband could be killed for the larger good of this creation. So instead of counter-cursing or showing his wrath, Vishnu blessed her and said that even in his form as a stone he would still have the greatest of respect for her and keep her over his head as a token of her good intentions and strictness with which she had followed her vows. Vishnu thus became a stone known as 'Shaligraam', and Brinda became the 'Tulsi plant' (the holy Basil plant) whose leaves are always placed on the top of the Shaligraam to worship Lord Vishnu in this form. Lord Vishnu had blessed her with the boon that in the form of 'Tulsi' she would be absolutely necessary to sanctify all food offered to the Lord, that no worship of Lord Vishnu would be complete without the inclusion of Tulsi leaves, and he would wear her on top of his Shaligram-form.

This episode is briefly mentioned in Tulsidas' Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 123 along with Chaupai line nos. 5-7 that precede it.

The story related to the birth of Jalandhar briefly is as follows: It is believed that he was born in the ocean as a result of the spout of fire that was caused by Lord Shiva's anger falling into the ocean and immediately transforming itself into a fierce demon called Jalandhar. So, as soon as he was born, he started crying exceptionally loudly, which terrified the gods. When Brahma, the creator, asked the Ocean (i.e. the deity of the ocean, the Varun God) who this child was, the latter said that it was his child, and gave it to Brahma to take care. As soon as Brahma took the child Jalandhar in his arms, the latter pulled so hard at the former's chin that the old Brahma's beard almost got torn off and tears of pain welled up in his eyes. So Brahma named the child as 'Jalandhar'—i.e. one who was born in the water and crying loudly, and also one who caused tears (water) to come out (of the eye).

When he grew up, Jalandhar got hold over Amravati, the capital of Indra, the king of gods. All the gods were unable to defeat him in battle, but later on Lord Shiva managed to kill the demon with the help of Lord Vishnu who employed a stratagem to get him killed as described herein above.]

The Lord (Vishnu) employed a stratagem to deflect her (Brinda, the wife of demon Jalandhar) from her vows (which had protected Jalandhar from death as Brinda could not become a widow because of the protective shield her vows granted her), thereby managing to carry out his duty towards the gods by helping them to accomplish their objective (which was to get rid of the demon).

When she (Brinda) came to know the truth, she had become very angry and had cursed Lord Vishnu<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 123)

The merciful Lord who does strange things and plays maverick tricks proved her (Brinda's) curse true (by becoming a stone known as Shaaligram)<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Meanwhile, the demon Jalandhar became Ravana in his next birth, and Lord Ram slayed his physical body to grant his soul deliverance, thereby helping the demon attain emancipation and salvation in the form of eternal peace and beatitude for himself, which is the highest attainment for any living being<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This episode has already been narrated in detail as a note appended to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 123 herein above.]

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Let us not forget that it was sage Yagyawalkya who was narrating the story to sage Bharadwaj when the latter wished to hear it, and Yagyawalkya relied on the conversation of Lord Shiva and Parvati for his own narration. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 45—to Doha no. 47.

<sup>2</sup>To wit, each manifestation of Lord Ram had some or the other unique feature typical to it, and though the outline remained similar yet details varied from one manifestation in one given era to another manifestation in another given era.

So therefore, learned poets, bards and minstrels narrated the divine story of Lord Ram in different ways, laying emphasis on different episodes while relating the story of the Lord’s life and deeds in accordance with their liking and preferences. This is why variations occur in the different versions of the story of the Ramayana.

In this context, refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 140.]

Parvati (Girija, the daughter of the king of mountains) was astonished when she heard this. She expressed surprise when she said: ‘Oh Lord, sage Narad is a great devotee of Lord Vishnu, and is also very wise and enlightened.’ (6)

So it confounds me to learn that the sage would curse his Lord. Pray tell me, what was the reason why Narad cursed Lord Vishnu; what mistake or misdeed had the Lord done to invite the sage’s wrath? (7)

Oh Lord Purari (Shiva)! Please tell me in detail this particular episode, for I am greatly astonished that a sage of Narad’s stature would be overcome with delusions so much that he would curse his own Lord whom he adored so much!’ (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Sage Narad: The celestial sage Narad is said to be a manifestation of the Supreme Being’s Mana (mind and its thoughts, intentions, hopes, desires and wishes, as well as the heart and its emotions and sentiments). The Supreme Being implements his wishes and expresses his intentions and wishes by making Narad his spokesperson. Purans list uncountable instances when Narad has approached people—both the good and righteous as well as the demonic and unrighteous ones—to tell them the path best suited to them, and the wise ones treated this advice as the Lord’s wish while the unwise ones still benefited from it because Narad’s intention was always to turn a living being away from his sinful ways and lead him towards the good.

Since he is a personified Mana, he is as fickle, unstable and transient as the Mana—never staying at one place for more than a fleeting moment, always roaming here and there in the entire creation, having nothing to stop his path as he could go anywhere he wished. And the remarkable thing is that he was never unwelcome anywhere—even the demons welcomed him with the same respect as did the Gods.

It is believed that he is born in each Kalpa to carry out the wishes of the Supreme Being. [1 Kalpa is equivalent to 4.32 billion human years.] He was a Gandharva (a semi-God who is a celestial musician) named Upbarhan in the previous Kalpa. He was physically very charming and an expert musician. Once he showed his amorous intentions towards Urvashi, a celestial dancer, in the presence of Brahma the creator where he was supposed to show exemplary restraint, and this overt show of lust resulted in his being cursed by Brahma that he would become fallen and take birth in the mortal world as a Shudra (a low caste). So, he was born from a maid servant of low caste working as a devoted servant of a learned Brahmin. Under the constant companion of this great Brahmin, Narad developed noble and auspicious virtues in him even though he was a mere child of five years. He was very modest, devoted, pious, noble hearted and diligent.

Since he had the Lord’s genes in him, his inclinations were more inclined towards the Spirit than the worldly charms of material sense objects which he detested from childhood. As luck would have it, once some wondering mendicants came to spend the four-month period of the rainy season in the hermitage of this Brahmin. Narad served them with great devotion. Impressed by his service and having some inner vision of his high spiritual stature and the spark of divinity that was lying hidden in him waiting for an opportune moment to leap up and shine through, they blessed him, taught him meditation and contemplation, besides initiating the child into the path of the Lord.

Thus, the dormant fire of renunciation and spiritual awareness was immediately ignited in Narad's little heart and he wished to take to Sanyas (a renunciate's life marked by constant wandering as a mendicant in search of the supreme bliss and Truth), but he did not wish to hurt his mother's emotions. But the Lord had other plans for him, and soon his wish was fulfilled when his loving mother died of snake bite while milking a cow. Instead of grieving at such a loss in human terms, the child Narad felt happy as if the last fetter was broken and he was liberated from worldly obligations.

He immediately headed north towards the mighty Himalaya Mountains to do severe Tapa (penance and austerity) to attain access to the Supreme Being. The little one walked on and on, and finally he was so tired and exhausted that when he saw a cool lake he drank water, ate fruits that he found there, and sat under the shadow of a tree and became lost in meditation. Lord Vishnu revealed himself in his four-arm form in his heart, but Narad was so thrilled and excited with this divine vision that he wished to see the Lord in practical terms with his physical eyes rather than the subtle eyes while he was in deep meditation. But as soon as he opened the eyes, the Lord vanished. Most sorry and overwhelmed with this loss, the child began to cry bitterly. Then a cosmic formless reverberating voice said—'Oh son! Your penance is accepted, and I do love you. Though I bless you with an eternal life and that your memory of me would never be erased, but you would not be able to see me with physical eyes in this world. So go back to the world and carry out my divine mandate for me. Become my messenger and go preach the path of my devotion and holy name to this world so that other unfortunate creatures also can get liberation and deliverance from the fetters in which they have bound themselves with no one to show them an easy and practical way out of their predicaments. Go and preach my message to such people in every corner of the earth; go and preach my devotion and let them have faith in my holy name. Your salvation would come naturally and automatically to you as an unasked reward.'

Narad turned back with this divine mandate of the Lord to be carried out just like the great Apostles of Lord Jesus Christ had went, on the Lord's instructions, to spread his message to the people on this earth. Henceforth, he wandered in the entire creation like a mendicant, with an Indian lute upon which he sang the Lord's glories and his divine name, spreading the divine message of the Lord's mercy, compassion, benevolence and love everywhere, attempting to turn everyone towards the Lord and away from this sinful and mortal world so that each individual creature could get his spiritual liberation and deliverance. Such are the ways of great and holy saints that instead of being selfish to seek his own liberation and deliverance from the Lord as the grant of a boon and letting the rest of the world go to hell, Narad chose to sacrifice his own life, liberation and deliverance at the altar of larger good of creation and to fulfill the wish of the Lord. Of course there is another twist to this tale—the Lord does not select everyone to carry on his own divine agenda, and a soul who the Lord designates for this purpose is indeed the most favoured and lucky one—because the Emperor chooses only those upon whom he has utmost confidence to carry out his personal task. It is just like Jesus choosing his disciples and ordaining them the task of spreading his glorious Gospel of love and salvation.

Therefore, Narad, the apostle of the Supreme Being, is the most loved disciple of the Lord, and it is evidenced by the fact that he is the only saint who has unrestricted access to the abode of the Trinity Gods (Lord Vishnu the sustainer and protector of creation, Brahma the creator and Shiva the concluder of this creation) besides every nook and corner of creation without hindrance and even without seeking any previous permission and appointment from anyone, be it a God or a Demon or anybody else. Narad's visit was always for the host's long term good, so he was always welcome and revered.

When the time came and the age of the physical body ended, he left the mortal coil like a serpent leaves its cuticle and went to heaven to sing the Lord's holy and divine name in the presence of Brahma, the old patriarch of creation. At the end of the Kalpa, at the time of Doomsday, he merged and became one with Brahma, the creator.

When the new cycle of creation came into being, he was born again from the Mana (mind) of Brahma the creator after the Sankadi sages were born. That is why, in the present Kalpa, Narad is called the 'Manas Putra' of Brahma, i.e. the son born out of Brahma's mental powers or his wishes. With this heritage and gene running in his blood, it is natural that he is highly respected and regarded as one of the greatest devotees of Lord Vishnu who is the Supreme Being personified. It is from the navel of Lord Vishnu that Brahma, the creator of the visible world, was born atop a divine Lotus that emerged from it while he was reclining on the bed made of the coiled body of the legendary serpent named Seshnath who floated on the surface of the celestial ocean of milk called Kshirsagar.

Narad preached renunciation of this material world and an extreme sense of faith in and complete devotion for Lord Hari (Narayan, Vishnu, the Supreme Being). But this was against the process of creation, because if everyone followed the path preached by Narad and renounced the material world then the process of propagation of the world and its inhabitant creatures along with its development would come to a naught. So, when Narad preached renunciation and detachment from this material world of sense objects that was mortal, transient and never a giver of peace and happiness to the ten thousand mental sons who were created by Daksha Prajapti (the first male from whom the rest of the human race was born and who was assigned the task by Brahma to propagate creation) in order to propagate this human race, Narad obviously annoyed him. These sons were preached by Narad and they all became mendicants, renouncing their attachment with this life and all charms of the material world along with the desire to enjoy it, gratify their sense organs and remain entangled in affairs of this world. Daksha Prajapti was exasperated and he created another set of ten thousand sons. But when Narad again played spoil-sport, Daksha cursed him that Narad would have to remain on the move always and he would not be able to stay at one place for more than two 'Gharis'. [1 Ghari = 24 minutes. In practice the term means a very short period of time; a fleeting moment as small as batting an eyelid.] As a result of this curse, Narad became an ever-wandering mendicant. But this suited the divine mandate of the Lord—for now Narad was forced to keep on the move and reach newer corners of the worldly and celestial realm to preach the Lord's message amongst the mortal creatures on earth and the Gods and Spirits in the heaven.

It is believed that Narad is immortal and is symbolic of the stupendous powers of a man's mind. The mind is ever-wandering like Narad, and the subtle message in the entire lore is that one should tame this restless mind and train it to turn away from this mortal engrossing material world and instead turn towards the Lord for finding permanent liberation and deliverance from this world. A wise mind would teach (preach) the aspirant about the futility of pursuing this artificial world, and instead seek ways of finding the Truth that gives eternity and brings to an end the endless litany of miseries and horrors, perplexities and confusions, restlessness and agitations that are invariably associated with un-truth, delusions and ignorance.

Narad was the most erudite and scholarly devotee of the Lord. No other sage or saint could match him in his scholarly acumen and profundity of wisdom (ref. Chandogya Upanishad, Canto 7, section 1, verse no. 2). Narad is also credited with the composition of the great Sutra (formula or key) called 'Narad Bhakti Sutra' which defines the eclectic principles and characteristics of the spiritual practice called Bhakti which is to have a profound and exemplary degree of devotion for and surrender to the Supreme Being. Narad himself epitomizes Bhakti at its most refined and developed form.

In Atharva Veda's Narad Parivrajak Upanishad, sage Narad has taught an assembly of sages the grand philosophy as well as the eclectic tenets of Sanyas, the life of total renunciation, detachment and dispassion, leading to one's spiritual liberation and deliverance.

The Atharva Veda's Hayagriva Upanishad has been revealed to sage Narad by Brahma the creator when the sage approached the latter with his quest for Brahm-Vidya, the knowledge of Brahm.

In Garud Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition, the creator Brahma has taught Narad the esoteric knowledge known as the 'Garud Vidya' which describes the secret Mantras pertaining to Garud, the divine mount of Lord Vishnu, as well as the Mantras which can help to counter the evil effects of all types of poisons arising from snake bites.

It was sage Narad who had told Valmiki the story of the Lord Ram which the latter penned down in the form of the epic Ramayan by sage Valmiki.

In Tulsidas' epic Ram Charit Manas, Lord Ram had explained to Narad why the Lord had not allowed him to marry in great detail. In essence the Lord told him that once he had taken the vows of renunciation and detachment to lead a life of a wandering hermit or friar, it would have been very wrong to marry. At the same time, the Lord has outlined the characteristic virtues of saints in the same discourse. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 43—to Chanda line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 46.

Sage Narad was the greatest exponent of the spiritual practice of "Bhakti", the path of devotion and love that leads to God-realisation. He is famous as the sage who had expounded on the eclectic spiritual philosophy of Bhakti in his book of aphorisms on this theme, called "Narad Bhakti Sutra". It is believed that the principles of devotion and love for the Lord God that he has enunciated in this book were originally conceived by Lord Shiva, and Narad had been ordained by the Lord to spread this good message far and wide as the sage used to roam around in every corner of this creation.

Narad was a selfless saint, and therefore he was respected by all wherever he went. Even the demons praised him and welcomed him because they knew that he would always give them such advice as would be good for them. Everyone knew that Narad always taught of ways that would provide liberation and deliverance to the soul of all the creatures, and that his company will always do some good for even the greatest of sinners.

Although sage Narad was a great renunciate, an ascetic, a self-realised soul, and an ardent devotee of Lord Vishnu, yet he was not immune to the overpowering effects of the Lord's mighty Maya (delusion creating powers) which spares none. Once it so happened that he did severe Tapa (penances and austerities) and even Kaamdeo, the god of passion and worldly attachments, could not sway him. This unfortunately made Narad proud of his spiritual prowess, but it did not go well with Lord Vishnu as the Lord does not want his devotee to be proud of anything. So therefore, Lord Vishnu decided to teach Narad a lesson. It so happened that once Narad went visiting a great kingdom whose king asked him to see his daughter and tell something about her fate and future. She was none but Maya personified, sent by Lord Vishnu to test Narad's self-control over his senses. However, at first glance at this pretty damsel, Narad was so enchanted by her stunning beauty that he decided to 'marry her', something un-imaginable for a sage of Narad's stature to even think of. Thinking that his dear Lord Vishnu would help him in fulfillment of his wishes, Narad prayed to the Lord on this account. The Lord simply said: 'Oh Narad, I will do what it good for you.'

When, in due course of time, and as designed by Lord Vishnu to prevent sage Narad from falling into the trap of Maya and going astray from his chosen spiritual path of renunciation, it so happened that the girl's father organized a grand ceremony to select a husband for her, where Narad went and sat down haughtily in the front seat, confident that by Lord Vishnu's blessings the young lady would chose him and put the victory garland around his neck. But Lord Vishnu had made him look like a 'monkey', making Narad a clown and a butt of ridicule in the assembly. Meanwhile, Lord Vishnu had too gone to attend the ceremony, and the girl put the garland around the Lord's neck. Narad was absolutely furious, and he left in a huff. On the way to the abode of Vishnu to take him to task, he found that Lord Vishnu and that desired damsel were too going to heaven by the same path. This sight added oil to Narad's anger, and he cursed Lord Vishnu to become a human being and suffer the agony of separation from a lady he would love as a human, just like the Lord had prevented Narad from having the company of the lady he loved and wished to marry. To honour Narad's words, Lord Vishnu came down to the mortal world as a human prince known as Lord Ram, and he had to suffer the profound grief of separation from his beloved wife Sita when she was kidnapped by Ravana, the demon king of Lanka, and later on when she was sent in exile by Lord Ram himself due to some false scandal doing the rounds in Ayodhya, his kingdom.

Meanwhile, Narad realized his folly and asked the merciful and compassionate Lord Vishnu to forgive him. The Lord obviously obliged him. Then Narad went to remote mountains to do Tapa to repent for his mistake. This story is narrated in Tulsidas' epic 'Ram Charit Manas', Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 124—to Doha no. 140.

Later on, when sage Narad met Lord Ram when he was alone in the forest and asked the Lord why he had not allowed him to marry, the Lord explained to him the reasons, which briefly meant that he loves his devotees and does not want them to harbour any kind of negative traits, such as pride and ego, as well as worldly desires and passions, which had cast their dark shadow on Narad during the time of the incident; so it was obligatory for the Lord to protect Narad's integrity and vows of Sanyas, which compelled the Lord to intervene and prevent Narad from falling in the trap of Maya by first becoming proud of his spiritual prowess, and then have a desire to get married. This is explicitly narrated in 'Ram Charit Manas', Aranya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 41—to Doha no. 46.]

Lord Shiva smiled and said: 'No one is either too wise or too dumb to do anything on his own. The irrefutable fact is whatever Lord Raghupati (i.e. Lord Ram) wishes happens at that moment.<sup>1</sup>' (Doha no. 124-a) [Note—<sup>1</sup>This is one of the greatest tenets of Lord Shiva, and he had affirmed it earlier too as is evident in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 52; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 56.

In this context of the tenet of Lord Ram's wish being supreme, refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Uttar Kand, (i) Doha no. 122 (sage Kaagbhusund tells Garud); (b) Aranya Kand, (ii) Doha no. 15 (Lord Ram tells Laxman).]

[Sage Yagyawalkya said to sage Bharadwaj—] 'Oh Bharadwaj! I shall now narrate the divine, sacred and holy story of Lord Ram. Listen to it attentively and a lot of reverence and faith.'

Tulsidas (who penned the Book "Ram Charit Manas" which contains this conversation between Yagyawalkya and Bharadwaj) makes this observation: One should abandon pride and all kinds of arrogance and ego<sup>1</sup> to listen this story of Lord Ram which has the mystical potential to rupture all delusions and torments associated with this gross mortal world of transmigration (birth and death). (Sortha no. 124-b)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When one is proud and egoist, he would feel ashamed to acknowledge that his knowledge is limited, that there is much more to hear and learn. A proud person would boast not only of his superior wisdom and knowledge but would also think that no one has more devotion for the Lord God than he has, or that no one is more diligent in leading an auspicious and holy way of life than he does. This will lead to his downfall and spiritual degradation. Tulsidas asserts that one should never have a false sense of pride and ego if one really wants to attain spiritual elevation leading to bliss and attaining the goal of receiving blessings from Lord Ram.

There are sterling instances in the story of Ram Charit Manas where we learn what happens if one listens to the divine story of Lord Ram with due attention, faith and reverence, and what happens if it is the opposite.

Garud had listened to the story fulfilling all the requirements—i.e. he listened to it attentively, with due devotion and belief, and the reward was that all his delusions that produced mental agitations and confusions were dispelled. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 68—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 69.

On the other hand, we have the instance of Parvati, the consort of Lord Shiva, who listened to the same story alongside her husband at the hermitage of sage Agastya but unfortunately her mind was occupied somewhere else, and the result was that whatever mental peace she had was also lost, and she became overwhelmed with delusions that caused immense mental restlessness to her. The consequences were so grave that she lost faith even in her own husband's words of advice for her which ultimately forced Lord Shiva to abandon her for her impertinence and irreverence. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 48—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 57.

Lord Shiva has clearly hinted to Parvati about this fact—that the story which he had told her earlier but which could not remove her spiritual delusions was the same story which filled Garud with immense spiritual joy and a feeling of blessedness when all his doubts and confusions were removed. This will be evident when we read Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 68 in conjunction with Shiva's next observation in Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 68—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 69.]

There was a beautiful cave somewhere in the snow-covered mountains of the Himalayas, and near it flowed the river Ganges. (1)

It was a very pleasant place for pursuing spiritual practices, and it appealed to the Mana (mind and heart) of sage Narad. [To wit, Narad decided that it was the right place to meditate and pursue spiritual practices because of its serene and peaceful environment, its natural beauty, and also because the holy river Ganges flowed nearby.]<sup>1</sup> (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The story of Narad's delusions as will be narrated now is almost similar to the one narrated in Shiva Puran, Rudra Sanhita 2, Chapters 2-20.

It was usual that great sages, seers, hermits and ascetics chose a place that was charming and endowed with natural beauty, with a great river flowing in the vicinity, and having an environment of peace, solitude and serenity that was conducive for pursuing spiritual practices. They established their hermitages in such places, or simply lived alone to meditate and do Tapa (austerity and penances).

We have several examples in this connection. For instance, one is that of sage Bharadwaj—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 44.

The next is the hermitage of sage Valmiki—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 124 along with Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede it.

Lord Ram himself chose to abide for some time in Chitrakoot during his sojourn in the forest because of its natural beauty—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 132—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 133.

When Lord Ram stayed in Panchavati, he chose the place because it was on the banks of river Godavari, and was surrounded by mountains, lakes and forests that were the natural habitat of wild life—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 14.]

nirakhi saila sari bipina bibhāgā. bhaya'u ramāpati pada anurāgā. 3.
sumirata harihi śrāpa gati bādhi. sahaja bimala mana lāgi samādhi. 4.

Sage Narad wondered around the area for sometime and was mightily fascinated with the charm of its environs consisting of mountains, rivers and verdant forests. This charming environment ignited a renewed sense of affection for the holy feet of Lord Ramapati (i.e. Lord Vishnu) in the heart of the sage.

[To wit, the charming sight titillated the emotions of sage Narad so much that as a devotee of Lord Vishnu he remembered his dear Lord, and developed a renewed surge of affection for the holy feet of the Lord.] (3)

No sooner did Narad remembered Lord Vishnu with affection and devotion, than all remnants of whatever sins and their attendant curses<sup>1</sup> that may have dogged the sage and had robbed his peace of mind were neutralized, and he was calmed down to such an extent that he sat in a state of blissful trance called Samadhi. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>What was the curse from which Narad suffered? According to Bhagwat Mahapurāṇ, Canto 6, Chapter 5, sage Narad had advised Daksha Prajapati's sons to pursue the path of renunciation and detachment to become a monk, instead of remaining involved in worldly affairs if they wished eternal peace and emancipation. This angered Daksha Prajapati who cursed Narad that he would never be able to stay at one place for long, and will always be on the move like a wondering monk.

According to another story, one of the daughters of Kaal (the god of death) was called Durbhagaa. She was not accepted by anyone as his wife for the simple reason that her father was the god of death. Once, during her wonderings, she saw Narad, and though she knew that he was a sage who had taken a vow to remain unmarried, she approached him with the proposal of wedlock, which obviously Narad declined. This angered her and she cursed him that he will always be on the move like a wondering friar.

So, this was the first occasion when Narad could find peace and stay calmly at one place for sometime to concentrate and meditate, because for the rest of his life he could not find any place to rest as he was always moving from one place to another.]

sahita sahāya jāhu mama hētū. calē'u haraṣi hiyaṁ jalacarakētū. 6.

Observing this state of sage Narad where he was immersed in transcendental meditation, the king of gods called Indra (who was extremely selfish and always jealous of sages who were meditating because he feared they would acquire some sort of greater powers than he possessed himself) got alarmed<sup>1</sup>.

He summoned Kamdeo (cupid; the god of passion and lust) and asked him to go and face Narad (in order to distract him from his Samadhi, which is a transcendental state of meditation). (5)

Indra requested Kamdeo: 'For my sake, please take along all your helpers and go to prevent Narad from completing his spiritual practice<sup>2</sup>'.

Receiving these instructions, Kamdeo, who has a fish as an emblem on his flag or standard (jalacarakētū), cheerfully departed on his mission. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Indra has been depicted in the Purans as a very selfish and greedy king of gods. Whenever any great sage did Tapa (penances and austerities) in order to gain some spiritual powers, Indra got alarmed as he feared that may be the sage was eyeing his throne as the king of gods. This proves how stupid Indra was, because a great sage would not stoop so low as to yearn for some great kingdom and enjoyment of the senses that accompany such acquisitions. But greed for power and pleasures is such a evil force that every time Indra would do something to throw a spanner and disrupt the spiritual practices of such sages. He would either depute Kamdeo or one of the courtesans, known as Apsaras, of his court to disturb the sage.

The next two Chaupai nos. 7-8 and Doha no. 125 that follow herein below would endorse this view about Indra.

<sup>2</sup>We have already read about another episode where Kamdeo was sent by Indra and other gods to disturb the meditation of Lord Shiva. This story is narrated in detail in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 82—to Doha no. 87. In this incident Lord Shiva had burnt Kamdeo to ashes. Hence it is logical to conclude that the present episode of Kamdeo being sent to disturb Narad occurred sometimes prior to Lord Shiva's episode.]

jē kāmī lōlupa jaga māhīm. kuṭila kākā iva sabahi dērāhīm. 8.

Indra (whose other name was "sunāsīra") was greatly tormented in his Mana (mind and heart) that the celestial sage Narad wished to live in his kingdom<sup>1</sup>. (7)

Verily indeed and forsooth, those who are lustful, rapacious, greedy and selfish are always suspicious and afraid of other people like an evil crow<sup>2</sup>, thinking that others would somehow usurp their possessions, depriving them of their privileges and pleasures. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Indra was alarmed that if Narad got an opportunity to stay in his capital city of Amravati, he would go around preaching spiritualism and its virtues of renunciation, dispassion and detachment from all sorts of sensual pleasures and enjoyment of sense objects of the world, which would be gravely detrimental to Indra's interests as he was accustomed to wallowing in them. So inspite of sending Kamdeo to disturb sage Narad's Samadhi, Indra was on his tenterhooks, as he was not certain if Kamdeo would succeed.

<sup>2</sup>A crow is used as an example of a wicked creature that is accustomed to stealing food, and is always afraid that it will be caught in the act and beaten severely. To wit, those who are greedy for power and worldly things are always scared that someone would deprive them of their possessions, without realizing that perhaps no one is bothered either about them or their belongings. This attitude robs them of peace of mind, and it makes them suspicious of one and all around them.]

sūkha hāṛa lai bhāga saṭha svāna nirakhi mṛgarāja.

chīni lē'i jani jāna jaṛa timi surapatihi na lāja. 125.

Just like the case of a stupid dog who has snatched a dry bone left over by a lion after feeding on its prey is always scared that the lion would detect it and kill the dog, so was Indra shameless in his fear that Narad would snatch his kingdom<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 125)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The lion is not bothered about the dry piece of bone, but the dog thinks that the lion would catch hold of him and kill him. Likewise, sage Narad had such an exalted stature and was so highly evolved in spiritualism that the charm of worldly pleasures would never attract him in the least, but the lustful Indra thought otherwise as he was shameless and pervert to the extreme. In his eagerness to prevent Narad from completing his spiritual practice, Indra had become so upset that he did not even think that if Narad actually got angry at him he would curse Indra to doom.

This example of Indra shows that when a person becomes too jealous and rapacious, he forgets what is good and what is not good for him and others, and would often commit grave mistakes in his zeal to meet his selfish ends that he invites eternal ignominy and profound scorn for himself.

There is another instance in Ram Charit Manas where Indra has been deprecated in severe terms—refer: Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 302.

Indeed it is such an irony that Indra, who is not an ordinary god but a 'king' of gods, is treated with such disdain as to be compared with a 'crow' and a 'dog'. Why? The answer is found here in these verses themselves, where the character of Indra have been cited as one who is exceptionally greedy, passionate, lustful and rapacious, and who is ever fearful that someone was eying his throne and wishes to usurp his kingdom and authority (refer: Chaupai line no. 8 herein above).

This is a warning for all of us—that no matter how high a position we may occupy in this world and how mighty and resourceful we may be, but if our character is despicable and contemptible, than we are are condemned to be no better than a ‘crow’ and a ‘dog’.]

When Madan (Kamdeo cupid) went to that place where Narad was meditating and had achieved a transcendental state of stillness of the senses, a trance-like state called Samadhi, he (Kamdeo) used his magical powers to create an artificial environment reminiscent of the spring season<sup>1</sup>. (1)

[So, what happened?] A most fascinating scenario unfolded as if by magic: the whole area was covered by green trees in their prime, laden with vibrant flowers of different colours, and fruits that were fully ripened. Cuckoos sang in merry abundance in their sweet tones, and bees hummed a sweet melody that captivated the senses. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Kamdeo was adept in this trick. He had pulled out all plugs of restraint, and had employed all the tricks up his sleeve while trying to disturb the meditation of Lord Shiva too, for he had created an artificial environment reminiscent of the spring and the rainy seasons in full bloom, when the earth is covered with greenery, and trees, flowers, fruits, birds and wildlife are a plenty, an atmosphere that would be conducive to sensual arousal even in the most dispassionate creature. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-8 and Chanda line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 85.

The enticement powers of the beauty of Nature, as well as that of Kamdeo who stokes passions, have been described in Ram Charit Manas elsewhere also. For instance, refer to: (a) Aranya Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 37—to Doha no. 38; (ii) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 39—to Doha no. 40; and (b) Kishkindha Kand, (iii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 13—to Doha no. 17; (c) Uttar Kand, Doha no. 23 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede it.

Refer specifically to: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Aranya Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 38; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1-4, 7-9 that precede Doha no. 40; and (b) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 23.]

A pleasant breeze that had the three characters<sup>1</sup> which incite the fire of passions and stoke longings began to blow. (3)

Celestial damsels (known as Apsaras) such as Rambha<sup>2</sup>, who were in the prime of their youth and skilled in the art of inducement and stoking passions --- (4),

--- Were singing enticingly with melodious tunes, and dancing in merry abandon employing provocative gestures while playing with balls which they tossed around with their hands, and jumped and skipped energetically (in an attempt to draw attention of Narad towards their youthful form and frolicking around temptingly). (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The three types of breeze referred to here are the following: a breeze with a sweet fragrance, and a breeze which is soft and cool.

<sup>2</sup>These Apsaras were the attendants whom Kamdeo took along with him anywhere he went in order to disturb the meditation and contemplation of sages and hermits. These ladies would act most lustfully and promiscuously like prostitutes in order to arouse sensual longing and passions in those who they intended to distract and become fallen. Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 61.]

देखि सहाय मदन हरषाना । कीन्हैसि पुनि प्रपंच बिधि नाना ॥ ६ ॥

 sīma ki cāṁpi saka'i kō'u tāsū. baṛa rakhavāra ramāpati jāsū. 8.

When Kamdeo watched his attendants (i.e. the Apsaras) carrying out their assigned duties skillfully, he felt very glad (that he would succeed in his designs). Besides them, he himself devised a series of devices to accomplish his goal (to distract Narad and prevent him from successfully completing his meditation)<sup>1</sup>. (6)

Meanwhile, all the tricks and stratagems of Kamdeo failed to have any effect on sage Narad, which resulted in Kamdeo getting terrified of the consequences of his mischief boomeranging on himself<sup>2</sup>. (7)

Verily indeed, forsooth and without gainsay, he who has Lord Vishnu (known as 'Ramapati') as his protector and benefactor, say who in this creation can ever violate his vows and defame him by causing any sort of harm to his reputation?

[To wit, since sage Narad was a great devotee of Lord Vishnu, and presently was meditating on the Lord's divine form, how was it ever possible for the stupid

Kamdeo to disturb Narad in his spiritual practice? Though it was unthinkable, yet the dumb-witted Kamdeo played fool with Narad, but as was expected he could not disturb the Samadhi of Narad.]<sup>3</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>What role did Kamdeo himself played here? Well, he conjured up the fascinating scene resembling spring all around Narad in order to aid the provocative dances and singing of his lady attendants who were leaving no stones unturned to move Narad and fall in their trap.

<sup>2</sup>Why was Kamdeo terrified? Well he was sore affright that as soon as Narad realized that Kamdeo was trying to defile his meditation, there were fair chances that the sage would become furious at him and curse him, and Kamdeo was no stranger to Narad's spiritual powers, which, if invoked, would prove devastating for him. This fear of Kamdeo came true in an episode at a later day when Lord Shiva became exceptionally annoyed at him and burnt him to ashes when Kamdeo tried to disturb the meditation of the Lord. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-6 that precede Doha no. 87.}

<sup>3</sup>There is a universal message here: All devotees of Lord God are sure of the Lord's protective umbrella over their heads. No harm can ever come to them; and anyone thinking of harming them and playing fool with them is doing so at his own peril.

Lord Ram has himself promised this protection to his devotees in Ram Charit Manas, (a) Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-10 that precede Doha no. 46 (to sage Narad); (b) Sundar Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 43 (in connection with Vibhishan); and (c) Uttar Kand, Doha and Sortha nos. 87 a and b, along with Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede them (to sage Kaagbhusund).]

When Kamdeo failed in his attempts to disrupt sage Narad's meditation, and fearing a backlash from the sage, he thought it wise to take the initiative and beg forgiveness by going to Narad and clasping his feet as a gesture of submission with a plea for mercy.

So, he went and fell at the sage's feet and clasped them while saying words of humility, and pleading for forgiveness. (Doha no. 126)

There was no anger or scorn in the Mana (heart and mind) of sage Narad (as he was renowned for his compassionate and calm nature). Hence, the sage assuaged Kamdeo and made him feel comfortable by speaking politely to him<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Thence, Kamdeo gratefully bowed his head at the feet of the sage, and took leave of him and went his way along with all his attendants. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>An important observation can be made here: The main objective of Kamdeo was to break the Samadhi, or the trance-like state, that Narad had attained while meditating on Lord Vishnu, and apparently he succeeded in it because we read that Narad and Kamdeo had a pleasant exchange of words. But this breaking of the Samadhi was a natural culmination of it when Narad realized that Kamdeo had come to offer his obeisance to him and was clasping his feet in reverence, and it is surely different from what Kamdeo had intended to actually do—which was to forcibly entice Narad to become lustful and get attracted to one of the Apsaras by breaking his religious vows of chastity and abstinence, known as Brahmcharaya, which Narad always followed. If that had happened, Narad would have fallen, but as it turned out Narad succeeded in upholding his stature as a great sage.]

Meanwhile, Kamdeo went to the court of Indra, the king of gods, and narrated the entire episode, highlighting the sage's resilience and courteous nature, as well as all that he had himself done. (3)

Everyone present there were astonished (at Narad's virtue of immense self-restraint and devotion for Lord Vishnu that had stood him in good stead in the face of passionate onslaught by Kamdeo), and all of them profoundly praised the sage and bowed at the holy feet of Lord Hari (to honour the Lord for granting protection to his devotees such as Narad)<sup>1</sup>. (4)

Why was it surprising to resist Kamdeo? Well, Kamdeo represented the mighty forces of passion, lust and sensual pleasures in this creation, forces which are formidable and irresistible. In this context, refer to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 84—to Sortha no. 85 which explicitly endorse this view.

The courtiers of Indra, i.e. the gods, were therefore in immense awe of Narad as they felt it was an exceptional achievement for the sage to withstand the enticements proffered by Kamdeo, and hold his ground and vows without falling prey to them. And then the gods also realized that this singular achievement of Narad was due to Lord Hari's grace upon him, and not due to any personal abilities of the sage.

This latter fact would be proved true too soon, as we shall presently read how the same Narad, who had stoutly resisted Kamdeo's provocations, would fell prey to passions and wish to marry a beautiful damsel.

But, why would that happen? The reason is that Narad became proud when he heard himself being praised by the gods, especially Lord Shiva, forgetting that he could maintain his vows solely because of the grace of his Lord Vishnu, and not because of his own abilities. So, the Lord wished to teach Narad a lesson, and made him fall in a trap similar to one from which Narad managed to escape and which made him so proud of his abilities. For let us remember: The Lord never wishes that any taint should tarnish the character of his true devotee. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-6 that precede Doha no. 129 herein below.

Later on we shall learn that when Narad came to know why Lord Vishnu had done what the Lord did in order to bring Narad back on track and prevent him from committing the same error again, the sage had expressed his joy and thankfulness to the Lord. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 43—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 45.]

Meanwhile, sage Narad went to meet Lord Shiva<sup>1</sup>; he was very proud that he had successfully vanquished Kamdeo. (5)

Narad boasted to Lord Shiva how he had managed to resist the attack of Kamdeo (māra carita), at which Lord Shiva, who considered Narad as very dear to him and was therefore worried for his welfare, advised him as follows: --- (6)

[Lord Shiva told Narad—] 'Oh Sage! I repeatedly pray to you as a request from me that the way you have narrated this episode to me, --- (7)

--- You will not do the same thing before Lord Hari ever, mind you. Even if the topic crops up during any conversation, try to deflect it and desist from elaborating it in any way whatsoever.<sup>2</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Shiva is a senior God of the Trinity, and he does not attend the court of Indra where other gods are in attendance. Narad felt that since all other gods were already aware of his stupendous achievement as is clear from verse no. 4 herein above, so he thought that it will be better to skip them and instead go and visit Lord Shiva, for the latter might not be aware of Narad's success in defeating Kamdeo.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Shiva knew Lord Vishnu's nature, that the latter would never like his devotee to become boastful and proud. The way Narad behaved before Lord Shiva, it was clear to him that Narad has been overcome with pride and haughtiness, something that Lord Vishnu would certainly not tolerate. That is why Lord Shiva warned Narad to desist from raising this topic or be tempted to discuss it before Lord Vishnu.

In this context, refer to: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 62 where Lord Shiva makes a similar observation regarding Garud, and says that perhaps the latter had been proud sometimes in the past, and therefore Lord Ram wishes to rectify this error in him.]

Though Lord Shiva had given a sincere advice to Narad, keeping in mind the latter's good, yet, due to the fiat of fate, Narad did not like it.

[Sage Yagyawalkya told Bharadwaj—] 'Oh Bharadwaj! Listen to this strange development that shows how the wish of Lord Hari is so powerful that it prevails over everything else.'<sup>1</sup> (Doha no. 127)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Shiva had earlier made a similar observation when Sati would not listen to his advice not to question the authenticity and divinity of Lord Ram. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-6 that precede Doha no. 56.

Once again, Lord Shiva reiterates the same view when Parvati expressed astonishment when the Lord told her that Narad had once cursed Lord Vishnu. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 124-a herein above.

The next verse no. 1 that follows herein below too says the same thing.]

चौ०. राम कीन्ह चाहिं सोइ होई । करै अन्यथा अस नहिं कोई ॥ १ ॥

संभु बचन मुनि मन नहिं भाए । तब बिरंचि के लोक सिधाए ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

sambhu bacana muni mana nahim bhā'ē. taba biranči kē lōka sidhā'ē. 2.

[Sage Yagyawalkya told sage Bharadwaj—] 'Verily indeed and in all sooth, whatever happens in this world is in accordance with the wish of Lord Ram (the Supreme Being and the Lord of the world), and it is not feasible for anyone to do otherwise. [To wit, whatever happens in this creation is what the Lord wants, and it is not possible for anyone to do anything otherwise.]'<sup>1</sup> (1)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A similar idea is expressed in a number of verses in Ram Charit Manas—apropos; (a) Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 52; (ii) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 56; (iii) Doha no. 124-b; (iv) Doha no. 174; (b) Ayodhya Kand, (v) Doha no. 171.

<sup>3</sup>Why was Narad sore and grumpy at Lord Shiva's advice? Well, first of all it should be noted that Lord Vishnu hadn't liked Narad developing a sense of pride at having vanquished Kamdeo. Narad had forgotten that it was the Lord's blessings and grace upon him that had enabled him to defeat Kamdeo, but instead he thought that he possessed great spiritual powers, and could command exemplary self-restraint on his senses and their inherent tendency for self-gratification that had enabled him to overcome the onslaught of passions unleashed by Kamdeo.

That Narad had become proud of his achievement is proved when he went to Lord Shiva and narrated the episode to him with a glint in his eyes, a proud smile on his face, and a voice that clearly betrayed his sense of haughtiness and self-importance that overcomes someone when he accomplishes an impossible task. It was when Lord Shiva observed this behaviour of Narad that did not behoove of a great sage, that he had warned the latter to refrain repeating the same mistake before Lord Vishnu, for Shiva was sure that this impertinent and haughty behaviour of the sage would certainly motivate Lord Vishnu to punish him in order to teach him a lesson, because Shiva knew that Lord Vishnu does not like any of his devotees to have even a spot of taint on his or her character.

So therefore, Lord Shiva advised sage Narad to observe restraint in this matter and not to advertise it before Lord Vishnu. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 127 herein above.

But instead of thanking Lord Shiva for preventing him from committing a grave mistake, Narad felt annoyed. Why so? It was because Narad thought that Shiva did not want him to get fame as a 'vanquisher of Kamdeo', and that he (Shiva) himself wished to be exclusively known as 'Kāmāri', i.e. 'a vanquisher of Kamdeo'—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 120-a.

So therefore, Narad became jealous of Shiva and disobeyed him, one other mistake he made, like what Sati had done by disobeying the Lord earlier. In both the cases, of Sati and Narad, the consequences of defying Lord Shiva were grave. Sati had to die by burning herself in the sacrificial fire pit*, and Narad would be turned into a monkey-faced clown to be ridiculed in a large assembly of suitors for a damsel#. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, *Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 63—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 64 (Sati); # Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 133—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 135 (Narad).}

<sup>4</sup>Narad was the son of Brahma. So here it means that after leaving Shiva, Narad headed home to the abode of his father Brahma, with a sour mood and sullen face. It is not clearly mentioned here whether or not he told Brahma anything about his adventure with Kamdeo. Perhaps he thought that it would be wrong and embarrassing to narrate such shameful incidents to his father, or because he was in such a bad mood that he clamped up and remained incommunicado for some times thereafter.

Probably his silence was because Lord Shiva's warning was fresh in his mind, and though he did not like it, yet he felt it would not be proper to completely neglect it. So he kept quiet before Brahma.]

ēka bāra karatala bara bīnā. gāvata hari guna gāna prabīnā. 3.
chīrasindhu gavanē munināthā. jaham̐ basa śrīnivāsa śrutimāthā. 4.

Once upon a time it so happened that Narad held his Indian lute in his hands, and while stringing it and singing Lord Vishnu's glories as was his wont, he went to the Kshir Sagar (the celestial ocean) where Lord Vishnu (Sri-Niwas)<sup>1</sup>, the Lord who is worshipped and revered by the Vedas, had his abode<sup>2</sup>. (3-4)

<sup>2</sup>Lord Vishnu reclines on the back of the coiled body of Seshnath, the celestial Serpent, as the latter floats on the surface of Kshir Sagar.

Why did Narad go to Lord Vishnu? Well, apparently it was quite natural for him to do so, for being a great devotee of Lord Vishnu, it was a practice of Narad to often pay a visit to the Lord.]

हरषि मिले उठि रमानिकेता । बैठे आसन रिषिहि समेता ॥ ५ ॥

बोले बिहसि चराचर राया । बहुते दिनन कीन्हि मुनि दाया ॥ ६ ॥

haraṣi milē uṭhi ramānikētā. baiṭhē āsana riṣihi samētā. 5.
bōlē bihasi carācara rāyā. bahutē dinana kīnhi muni dāyā. 6.

As soon as Lord Vishnu (known also as Rama-Niketa, the Lord near whom Rama, goddess Laxmi, resides) saw Narad arrive, he got up cheerfully to welcome the sage. Receiving him with due respect, Lord Vishnu sat down alongside the sage. (5)

The Lord of the whole world, both the animate and the inanimate world (carācara rāyā), smiled sweetly, and most courteously enquired from the sage: 'Oh Sage! It has been after a long time now that you have been kind enough to show grace on me by visiting me. [To wit, what is the reason you didn't come for so long a time?]<sup>1</sup> (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Remember: Lord Vishnu has great respect for his devotees, and he loves them more than anybody else. Besides this, Narad was a great sage, and his visit was always welcome by everyone in this world. This verse shows the great respect with which Lord Vishnu received sage Narad, though the Lord was no ordinary God, but the ‘Lord of the entire world, both the animate as well as the inanimate divisions of it’.

Well, Narad fell in this trap: when Lord Vishnu asked him why he was absent for a long time, the poor sage narrated his adventure with Kamdeo by way of explanation for his long absence, little realizing the trap he is falling into, as we shall presently read in the verses that follow herein below.]

काम चरित नारद सब भाषे । जद्यपि प्रथम बरजि सिवँ राखे ॥ ७ ॥

अति प्रचंड रघुपति कै माया । जेहि न मोह अस को जग जाया ॥ ८ ॥

kāma carita nārada saba bhāṣē. jadyapi prathama baraji sivam' rākhē. 7.
ati pracaṇḍa raghupati kai māyā. jēhi na mōha asa kō jaga jāyā. 8.

Narad narrated the entire episode related to Kamdeo by way of explaining his long absence, though Lord Shiva had expressly advised him not to do so before Lord Vishnu (even if the subject is raised indirectly during the course of some casual conversation related to any other matter)<sup>1</sup>. (7)

[Sage Yagyawalkya observed—] ‘Indeed, the formidable powers of Lord Ram’s (also known as Lord Raghupati) Maya (delusions) are astounding and stupendously powerful. Verily, who is born in this mortal world that he is immune to the influence of this Maya? [To wit, none can escape the overriding influence of Maha of the Lord.]<sup>2</sup>’ (8)

‘Maya’ has many formats, and they are enumerated in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, from Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 70—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 72. It ought to be noted here that sage Narad has been specifically cited in these verses as an example of a great sage who was trapped by Maya (apropos: Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 70).

What is the first thing that Maya does to trap the creature? It makes him doubtful and uncertain—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 51 (with relation to Sati).

In the context of Narad, the ‘power of Maya’ made him doubt Lord Shiva’s wisdom in prohibiting him from telling Lord Vishnu anything related to his conquest of Kamdeo.

The formidable powers of Maya have been enumerated in Tulsidas' book 'Kavitawali Ramayan', Uttar Kand, verse no. 117 too.]

दो०. रूख बदन करि बचन मृदु बोले श्रीभगवान ।
तुम्हरे सुमिरन तें मिटहिं मोह मार मद मान ॥ १२८ ॥

dōhā.

rūkha badana kari bacana mṛdu bōlē śrībhagavāna.
tumharē sumirana tēm miṭahiṁ mōha mārā mada māna. 128.

Sage Narad's narrative about Kamdeo was heard with a dry and impassive mood by Lord Vishnu, who replied, 'Oh Sage! All delusions, arrogance, pride and haughtiness are overcome by merely remembering you. [And therefore, I am so amused and astonished that a great sage of thine stature, who can bestow these boons on others who invoke his grace, wouldst himself fall in the same trap!]' (Doha no. 128)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This praise by Lord Vishnu further stoked self-pride and a sense of superiority in Narad. He could not read signs of annoyance on Lord Vishnu's face, and failed to understand that the Lord has not liked the way he has boasted of his success in the adventure with Kamdeo.

So instead of treating these words of Lord Vishnu as being said in sarcasm, the poor fellow Narad thought that the Lord was praising him. This pumped him further, and his bodily gestures betrayed his pride before Lord Vishnu, who surely did not like anything at all.]

चौ०. सुनु मुनि मोह होइ मन ताकें । ग्यान बिराग हृदय नहिं जाकें ॥ १ ॥
ब्रह्मचरज ब्रत रत मतिधीरा । तुम्हहि कि करइ मनोभव पीरा ॥ २ ॥

sunu muni mōha hō'i mana tākēm. gyāna birāga hṛdaya nahīṁ jākēm. 1.
brahmacaraja brata rata matidhīrā. tumhahi ki kara'i manōbhava pīrā. 2.

[In these two verses, Lord Vishnu continues to tease Narad by superficially praising him in order to test whether any trace of negative virtues of pride, ego, haughtiness and superiority complex of being self-righteous has found a foothold in him, thereby corrupting the sage's inherent purity and holiness of his soul, which, if true, would be detrimental for the spiritual welfare of Narad, and would compel the Lord to intervene and take remedial actions to protect the future of his beloved devotee. With this noble view in mind, Lord Vishnu said to Narad—]

'Sage, listen. Delusions and attachments have their negative effect on the Mana (mind) of those who do not have 'Gyan' (awareness of the truth; gnosis; wisdom and enlightenment) and 'Vairagya' (sense of dispassion, detachment and renunciation) in their hearts. (1)

You, on the contrary, are steadfast in your vows of Brahmacharya (practicing abstinence and self-control over the senses) and have a stable mind. Say then, how can Kamdeo ever disturb your inner peace and stability; no, it's not possible for him!

[To wit, since you have such exemplary self-control over your mind and heart, since none of the worldly temptations are strong enough to ever distract you from following the spiritual path of renunciation and dispassion you have chosen for yourself, since you are stringent in following and upholding the path of devotion for me, and since you rely on me for protection and help, so obviously Kamdeo would never succeed in his evil designs against you.]<sup>1</sup> (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>As has been noted in the beginning of these verses, Lord Vishnu wished to ascertain if Narad's inner-self had retained its pious and holy nature, if Narad still had total reliance on the Lord for success in any endeavour; if he believed that his success in overcoming the provocative attack of Kamdeo was due to Lord Vishnu's grace and the protective shield the Lord throws around his devotees, or whether he thought that he had defeated Kamdeo out of his own personal abilities.

The fact is that Lord Vishnu loves his devotees so much that if the latter makes an error, then the Lord intervenes immediately to rectify it, lest it may become a big issue later on and prove detrimental for the spiritual welfare of the devotee. This has been made abundantly clear in Ram Charit Manas, (a) Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-10 that precede Doha no. 43; and (b) Uttar Kand, Doha no. 74 along with Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede it.

Lord Vishnu himself makes this declaration in verse nos. 5-6 herein below.

Now in the case of Narad, Lord Vishnu had guessed correctly that Narad was proud of his success over Kamdeo as would be clear in the next set of verses that follow herein below. Lord Vishnu did not like this to happen to Narad, because a true sage who is a devotee of the Lord, as well as enlightened and self-realised, oughtn't have the negative traits of pride, ego and haughtiness in him.]

 muni kara hita mama kautuka hōī. avasi upāya karabi mairi sōī. 6.

Narad became proud at this pretension of praise by Lord Vishnu. So he said haughtily, 'Oh Lord! Everything is your grace.'<sup>1</sup> (3)

The merciful Lord thought to himself: 'A great tree of pride and haughtiness has sprouted in the heart of the sage. (4)

I shall soon uproot and throw it away, for it is my vow that I shall do whatever is needed for the good and welfare of my devotees<sup>2</sup>. (5)

Surely I shall do something wondrous and playful that would be a source of amusement for me, and at the same time it would be for the good of the sage.<sup>3</sup> (6)

taba nārada hari pada sira nāī. calē hṛdayam' ahamiti adhikāī. 7.
śrīpati nija māyā taba prēri. sunahu kaṭhina karanī tēhi kēri. 8.

Then sage Narad bowed at the feet of Lord Hari and departed from there, with his heart puffed up more with an excess of pride and haughtiness<sup>1</sup>. (7)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Narad was already proud that he had defeated Kamdeo and was praised in the full court of Indra, the king of gods—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 127.

Meanwhile, Lord Shiva's warning acted as a dampener for his self-pride, as he had not liked it, and so he had become sullen and grumpy—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 127 along with Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede it.

So when Lord Vishnu himself praised him, Narad, being unaware of the Lord's real intentions, was pumped up with a renewed air of pride, ego and haughtiness.

What was the intention of this act? It was to show Narad how powerful a force Kamdeo, who represented passion and lust, was, and how easily he would trap the sage just a few hours after the latter thought he was so great and honourable as to have vanquished Kamdeo's might, and for which he got so much praise from Lord Vishnu.

The events that unfolded now onwards would prove to Narad that his boast of a successful feat of defeating the temptations of Kamdeo was not due to his own abilities of self-restraint, but it was due to the grace of Lord Vishnu, whose devotee he was, that had enabled the sage to successfully overcome the onslaught of Kamdeo.]

[Now we shall read what trick Maya played on Narad.] Somewhere on the path taken by Narad, Maya created an illusionary city of wonderful beauty that spread for an area of eight hundred square miles (nagara --- sata jōjana bistāra).

It was exceptionally fascinating, and surpassed the heavenly abode of Lord Vishnu in its beauty and charm. It was well planned and endowed with a wide array of wonderful architectural marvels. (Doha no. 129)

In this marvelous city of exceptional beauty there lived handsome citizens, the males resembled Kamdeo himself, and the females were like so many Ratis (wife of Kamdeo) in disguise. (1)

In that city dwelt a king named Seelnidhi. He was a rich and prosperous king with countless horses and elephants at his disposal along with large army. (2)

His majesty and grandeur were like those of seven kings of gods combined. He was a virtual embodiment of the virtues of physical fitness, energy and dynamism, strength and valour, as well as wisdom and skills pertaining to kingship (i.e. he was well versed in the art of politics, administration, law and justice, diplomacy, and warfare). (3)

He had a daughter whose beauty and charm were so extraordinary that she would not only attract the attention of the whole world but could even fascinate goddess Laxmi who was in awe of her charismatic personality. (4) kara'i svayambara sō nṛpabālā. ā'ē taham'aganita mahipālā. 6.

This damsel was in reality Lord Hari's Maya herself personified. The Maya is a treasury of all qualities that can fascinate the world beyond measure, and it could hold the entire world in its awe. This being the case, it is not possible to describe the beauty of this damsel in entirety. (5)

Meanwhile, the king, her father, wished to marry her, and for this purpose he had organized a grant marriage ceremony called 'Swayambar'<sup>1</sup> in which countless kings and princes of the realm had come to try their luck<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A Swayambar is a marriage ceremony wherein the bride is free to choose her groom. This method was adopted by the king to enable his daughter to pick her future husband.

Another variant of this ceremony is when the father declares a certain condition for her marriage, and anyone who fulfils this condition would marry the princess. Sita's marriage with Lord Ram was formalized by this latter method. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 9-10 that precede Doha no. 210; (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 240; (iii) Doha no. 249—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 250.}

<sup>2</sup>The princess was singularly beautiful, and this attracted all great suitors to the venue in the hope that one of them would be the lucky fellow.

A similar thing had happened in the case of Sita too, who too was renowned for her charm and beauty. Refer: Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 251 along with Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede it.]

When sage Narad passed by and saw this wonderful city, he was highly fascinated by its charm and came to visit it. He asked the citizens whom he met on the way the cause of such festivities and decorations that adorned the city with such fanfare. (7)

Having learnt about the reason for all the festivities (that a grand marriage ceremony was being organized by the king for his daughter), the sage came to the palace of the king, who warmly welcomed Narad (as he was a renowned sage) by worshipping him and giving him a seat to sit down. (8)

The king (realizing that he was fortunate to have a great sage as his guest) called his daughter, the princess, to show her to Narad.

He said to Narad: 'Oh Lord! Consider all her virtues and faults in your heart and tell them (to me).'<sup>1</sup> (Doha no. 130)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It was customary that when a great sage visited someone who had a daughter or son, the host would welcome the visiting sage, and after seeking his blessings would ask the sage to tell about qualities and the future of the daughter or the son.

So, whenever sage Narad, who had the mystical power to read into the past and future lives of all, happened to visit some great king who had a daughter, the king would use this opportunity to learn about her personal virtues and her future. It had happened so with the case of goddess Parvati's father Himwan, the king of the mountains: When Narad visited Himwan's household, the latter summoned Parvati and made her pay respect to the sage by bowing at his feet, and then he asked Narad to tell him about her qualities as well as prophesize about her future. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 66—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 68.]

lacchana tāsu bilōki bhulānē. hṛdayam'haraṣa nahīṁ pragaṭa bakhānē. 2.

When sage Narad saw the damsel, he was taken aback (and literally swept off his feet) by her phenomenal beauty and exceptional charm so much so that for once he forgot all about his vows of renunciation, dispassion and detachment from worldly temptations as well as sensual attractions (birati bisārī).

Narad was so much overcome with passion that he forgot to do what the king had requested him in the first place, viz. to examine her virtues and faults, and tell about them to her father. On the contrary, he felt a thrill spreading all over him and titillating his heart, but he managed to conceal it and said nothing overtly about it<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, the power of Maya is so great that Narad did not even feel embarrassed that her father was closely watching all his actions, and this way of looking lustfully at an unmarried lady in front of her father was highly objectionable as well as contemptible for a sage of his stature.

<sup>2</sup>To wit, Narad did his best to hide the personal attraction that he had developed towards this girl. Now, it was not only the damsel's physical beauty that had bewitched Narad, for he was also struck by her other virtues about which we shall read in the verses that follow herein below. This combination, of physical beauty and excellent subtle qualities that defined her future, was so lethal, so to say, that it completely paralysed Narad's wisdom and sense of propriety, as we shall discover soon.]

sēvahim sakala carācara tāhī. bara'i sīlanidhi kan'yā jāhī. 4.

Narad thought to himself: 'Anyone who marries this damsel would become immortal; he would be invincible in any battle for no one would be able to defeat him in the battle-field. (3)

Further, any person who marries the daughter of king Seelnidhi would be served by all in this creation, both the animate as well as the inanimate aspects of it.'<sup>1</sup> (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A ridiculous situation has arisen here. Narad was a highly respected and learned 'sage', one who had renounced the world and its temptations. So, his first fault was to get enchanted by the girl's physical beauty as we have read in the previous verses.

His next faults, or should we say slips, that led to his downfall are outlined here: How should he be concerned with being invincible in wars for sages don't fight wars, and why should he have a desire to become immortal, for it is expected from a wise and self-realised sage that he would know that no one is immortal in this world.

And third, he saw that her husband would be a great Lord who would be served by one and all in this creation, but did not realize that this is the sole right and authority of the Supreme Being. So, how foolish it was for Narad to not realize that her husband would be no one else but Supreme Being himself!

These things show how Maya had completely deluded and corrupted Narad's wisdom and intellect.]

लच्छन सब बिचारि उर राखे । कछुक बनाइ भूप सन भाषे ॥ ५ ॥
सुता सुलच्छन कहि नृप पाहीं । नारद चले सोच मन माहीं ॥ ६ ॥ lacchana saba bicāri ura rākhē. kachuka banā'i bhūpa sana bhāṣē. 5.

sutā sulacchana kahi nṛpa pāhīm. nārada calē sōca mana māhīm. 6.

He thought over the lass's virtues and kept them concealed in his heart, not saying anything about them in the open. On the contrary, he cooked up some false qualities about her and told the king about these imaginary virtues<sup>1</sup>. (5)

He told the king in a summary manner, 'Your daughter has good virtues', and departed from there while brooding over the matter in his Mana (heart and mind)<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This is the next fault that Narad committed—of telling a lie. It was something unpardonable for a great sage, so now he became a fit candidate to invite chastening by Lord Vishnu.

<sup>2</sup>Passion and lust are overwhelming forces in this world. Narad's boast of having vanquished Kamdeo, the god symbolizing passion and lust, fell flat right on his face. So, being overcome with desires, Narad brooded over the matter after leaving the king's palace, wondering what to do next so that he would realize his dreams of somehow marrying this pretty and well-endowed girl who had such exemplary and rare virtues to her credit.

A remarkable thing has happened here that nailed the last nail in Narad's doomed fate: For quite some time, Narad forgot about his devotion for Lord Vishnu and his wont to remember the Lord every moment of his life, for now his mind and heart were occupied by the thoughts of the enchanting princess, leaving no space for devotion and remembrance of Lord Vishnu. This left a gap for the Devil to step in and play his dirty tricks on the poor sage. We shall presently see in the verses that follow herein below what happened to Narad.]

japa tapa kachu na hō'i tēhi kālā. hē bidhi mila'i kavana bidhi bālā. 8.

Narad thought to himself: 'I shall go and do something to devise a means by which the virgin (kumārī) would marry me. (7)

Alas! Time is short, and it is not possible to do Japa (repetition of a holy Mantra) or Tapa (penance and austerity)<sup>1</sup> now at this moment. Oh Creator and Writer of destiny (bidhi)<sup>1</sup>! I wonder how I would get the hand of this damsel (in marriage)!<sup>1</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>We learn from the scriptures that when anyone wished to fulfill his desires, he would usually do Japa and Tapa to please some great God, who would then grant the desired wish as a boon to the person.

We have the example of king Manu and queen Satrupa doing it to worship Lord Vishnu as narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 142—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 145.

<sup>1</sup>Usually the creator Brahma would be worshipped, as was done by Ravana and his brothers who offered worship to the creator Brahma, who then appeared before them to grant their wishes as narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 177 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede it.

Narad remembered Brahma because the latter was his father. So Narad thought that it would be easier to approach Brahma to have his desires fulfilled because a father is more inclined to see his son happy than anyone else.]

[Narad contemplated thus—] 'The need of the hour is to have rare and exceptional personal charm and a handsome body that would have no match in this world, so that when the princess is asked to choose someone as her husband she would be so much attracted and bewitched by this charming prince that she would have no hesitation in putting the victory garland around his neck<sup>1</sup>.' (Doha no. 121)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In the Swayambar form of marriage which was organized for the wedding of the princess, the would-be bride is given a garland and asked to move around in the row of suitors to select that person whom she would like to be her future husband by putting the garland around his neck.]

[Determining that the need of the hour was to have a matchless personality and physical charm that would be powerful enough to bewitch the princess and tempt her to select that person as her would-be husband, Narad wracked his mind to find out how to go about it and acquire such a charming personality as needed so that his desire to get the hand of the damsel in marriage could be realized. Time was running out for him, so he finally decided to seek quick help from his beloved benefactor, Lord Vishnu, for he was sure that the Lord would not disappoint him.]

Sage Narad decided thus: ‘I shall request Lord Hari to give me that beauty which is needed now. But oh brother, the problem is that time is running out, and I will be late if I go to the Lord’s abode in the heaven (and I am not even certain if the Lord is there at present)<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Verily indeed, in all sooth and without gainsay, there is no one who is a better well-wisher and benefactor of mine than Lord Hari (Vishnu). I am absolutely sure that he would come to my help and provide succour to me now.<sup>2</sup>, (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Almost a similar sort of predicament was faced by mother earth and the gods when they decided to approach Lord Vishnu to request him to protect them from the tyranny of the demons—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 185.

<sup>2</sup>Well, this is one single point that goes to the credit of sage Narad: that at least and at last he did remember and realize that Lord Vishnu was his best friend, well-wisher and benefactor. It was good for Narad that he did so, for now it became obligatory for the Lord to take remedial steps and ensure that Narad does not fall in the trap of worldly temptations and passions symbolized by the desire for matrimony, for let us not forget that Narad was a sage who was committed to uphold the vows of celibacy, abstinence, renunciation, dispassion and detachment—all of which would have been tossed out of the window had he been allowed to marry.

And true to his famed reputation that he would go out of his way to protect the interest of his devotees, Lord Vishnu did just that: the Lord prevented Narad from marrying that princess. How? We shall now be reading this fascinating act in the verses that follow herein below.

Lord Vishnu himself promised to Narad that he would do what is in the best interest of the sage—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 132 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that follow it.

But Narad was so obsessed by passion and lust at the time, and his wisdom so much clouded by delusions, that he could not decipher what Lord Vishnu hinted at. When it finally so happened that Narad could not fulfill his desire to marry, he became so peeved and exasperated that he stooped so low as to curse his only benefactor, Lord Vishnu, as we shall see soon in Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 136—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 137 herein below.

What intrigued Narad and gnawed constantly at his mind was the question as to why Lord Vishnu prevented him from marrying. Later on, Lord Vishnu tells Narad the reason for doing so in the Lord’s manifestation as Lord Ram, when the sage went to the Lord to pay his obeisance to him and broached the subject. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 43—to Doha no. 44.]

prabhu bilōki muni nayana juṛānē. hō'ihi kāju hi'ēm̐ haraṣānē. 4.

Narad prayed to Lord Vishnu in various ways in an urgent manner, and the merciful Lord who does mysterious things revealed himself before the sage<sup>1</sup>. (3)

The sage felt that his eyes were blessed to have a divine view of the Lord when the latter appeared before him. At the same time, the sage was exhilarated in his heart because he felt that now his wishes would be fulfilled.<sup>2</sup> (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A similar thing had happened at the time mother earth and the gods had prayed to Lord Vishnu in order to request the Lord to protect them from the demons. At that time, Lord Shiva had advised them to pray to Lord Vishnu with devotion and sincerity, and the Lord would appear immediately before them, then and there. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 185 along with Chaupai line nos. 3-8 that precede it.

<sup>2</sup>Narad had pinned his hopes on Lord Vishnu. So when the Lord actually revealed himself before the sage, he thought it to be good sign, for he was sure that the Lord would not deny him his one single wish. This feeling of success excited him.]

nija māyā bala dēkhi bisālā. hiyam̐ ham̐si bōlē dīnadayālā. 8.

Narad could not contain his excitement and sense of urgency when he eagerly narrated to Lord Vishnu the whole episode, and pleaded with the Lord for his help in this matter.

Narad said: 'Oh Lord, please be kind and help me. (5)

Bestow upon me a charm and beauty that is like your own, for otherwise I will not be able to acquire her (i.e. the princess). (6)

Oh Lord! In whatever way my good and well-being is possible, please be gracious enough to do it urgently—because Lord, I am your servant!<sup>1</sup> (7)

Smiling himself in amusement<sup>2</sup> when he observed the overriding power and might of his Maya (i.e. the Lord's ability to create delusions in order to keep control over this creation), and the maverick tricks it can play, Lord Vishnu said to Narad --- (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer to Chaupai no. 2 earlier where Narad has said the same thing, and as we have noted in a note appended to that verse, at last this belief of Narad came to his rescue, for now it was left upon Lord Vishnu to decide what was and what was not good for the sage.

There is a message of immense importance for all of us here: that we must leave the final decision about our life and its fate, and whether something we desire is good or not for us, in the hands of our beloved Lord God, and give the Lord a free hand in this matter by not forcing our own wills upon him on the pretext that he ought to honour his commitment to fulfill our wishes. Remember: Our vision is short and we think of immediate goals, but our Lord God thinks of our long-term good, and is more concerned about our destiny than we can ever realize. This way, we will be the happiest person in this world—free from worries and at peace with ourselves.

I too am determined to do what is good for you.'

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It ought to be noted how Lord Vishnu addresses Narad: as a 'sage' as well as an 'ascetic'. Say, how can it be expected that such a person would marry? Narad should have been alert enough to take this hint through the veil that had clouded his wisdom, but he failed. Lord Vishnu has clearly signaled that it is not possible to let Narad fall in the trap of matrimony, especially when passions and lust has overtaken him. It will set a very bad precedent for other exalted sages, hermits and ascetics if Lord Vishnu allows Narad to have his way.

gavanē turata tahām̐ riṣirā'ī. jahām̐ svayambara bhūmi banā'ī. 4.

The sage behaved as if he was utterly stupid and dumb because he was under the influence of Maya, for he could not decipher the subtle hint that Lord Vishnu gave him, nor could he understand the gravity of the Lord's words<sup>1</sup>. (3)

Meanwhile, Narad thought that his wish would be fulfilled, and so he rushed immediately to the venue where the Swayambar was being organized<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Narad could not understand the gravity of the words of Lord Vishnu and what he hinted at by first addressing him as a sage and ascetic, and then citing the example of a patient whose doctor refuses to oblige him if the former wishes to eat or drink anything that is not good for his health. Refer: Doha no. 132 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that follow it herein above.

The reason for Narad's failure at realizing what the Lord meant is that he was under the influence of Maya himself.

निज निज आसन बैठे राजा । बहु बनाव करि सहित समाजा ॥ ५ ॥
मुनि मन हरष रूप अति मोरें । मोहि तजि आनहि बरिहि न भोरें ॥ ६ ॥ nija nija āsana baiṭhē rājā. bahu banāva kari sahita samājā. 5.

muni mana haraṣa rūpa ati mōrēm. mōhi taji ānahi barihi na bhōrēm. 6.

All the attending kings and princes had taken their allotted seats; all of them were accompanied by their respective royal paraphernalia, with their retinue of servants and courtiers, and other signs of majesty and grandeur. (5)

The sage, meanwhile, was very excited in his Mana (heart and mind) that he possesses exceptional beauty of form and a charming personality, so much so that he was sure that the princess would not marry anyone else except him. (6)

मुनि हित कारन कृपानिधाना । दीन्ह कुरूप न जाइ बखाना ॥ ७ ॥
सो चरित्र लखि काहुँ न पावा । नारद जानि सबहिं सिर नावा ॥ ८ ॥ muni hita kārana kṛpānidhānā. dīnha kurūpa na jā'i bakhānā. 7.

sō caritra lakhi kāhum'na pāvā. nārada jāni sabahim sira nāvā. 8.

The sage unfortunately did not realize that the merciful Lord (Vishnu) had made him look deformed and ugly beyond description in order to ensure the sage's welfare<sup>1</sup>. (7)

But all those who were present in the venue were not aware of what had transpired behind the curtain, and why Narad had got this deformed figure. So, when they saw him they recognized him as being the great sage known as Narad, and hence all of them bowed their heads before him in reverence. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>What was the sage's welfare that motivated Lord Vishnu to make a clown of him? There were two objectives of Lord Vishnu—one was obviously to prevent him from being selected by the damsel to become her husband and fall in the trap of matrimony that does not behoove of a enlightened sage and ascetic, and the other objective was to teach him a lesson for being proud and haughty of his abilities to vanquish Kamdeo. If Narad was allowed to marry and have his way, then he would be falling in a trap of worldly attachments and its attendant problems that would undermine his exalted stature and pull him down from the high moral pedestal on which he presently stood.

By making Narad look like a clown in full house teeming with great kings and princes of the realm, Lord Vishnu wished to send another important message for others—that any of them who would violate norms set by the Supreme Being for maintenance of law and order in the society, if they transgressed decorum and did incongruous things in the mistaken belief that they can have their way, then let them be pre-warned that sooner or later they will make a clown of themselves before others!]

Yet, there were two attendants of Lord Rudra (one of the forms of Lord Shiva) who were privy to the whole affair, and were aware of the secret behind Narad's ugly and deformed visage<sup>1</sup>.

These two attendants had assumed the form of Brahmins and were moving around in close proximity of Narad to enjoy the fun of it all. (Doha no. 133)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The attendants of Rudra are a sort of semi-gods, and being in a spirit form they could see things which human eyes missed. Hence, they were aware of why Narad had been transmewed into a clown. They assumed forms of Brahmins to avoid detection, and roamed around to watch the spectacle of Narad's humiliation, and how he would react to it.]

At the place where sage Narad haughtily went and took his seat at the venue of the Swayambar, exceedingly proud in the false belief that he has an exceptional charm and an astounding personality (which he erroneously believed would sweep the princess off her feet, and make her put the garland around his neck to make him her choice for marriage), --- (1)

--- The two attendants of Rudra too went and took their seats very close to him. No one in the assembly could recognize them because they were disguised as Brahmins. (2) munihi mōha mana hātha parā'ēm'. haṁsahim sambhu gana ati sacu pā'ēm'. 5.

These two fellows taunted Narad using sarcastic words: 'Indeed, Lord Hari has granted him (Narad) such charm and made him so handsome that --- (3)

--- As soon as the princess sees him, no doubt that she would marry him in the belief that he is none but Lord Hari in his form!<sup>1</sup> (4)

Verily indeed, it was so unfortunate that the great sage's hands were clasped by Moha (delusions, ignorance and infatuations) so much so that inspite of being ridiculed and openly taunted at, he could not realize that there was something amiss in the whole thing<sup>2</sup>.

Meanwhile, the two attendants of Rudra were having a good time of their lives, laughing, winking and sneering at the unfortunate sage. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>As we would recall, Narad had asked Lord Hari to bestow on him a beauty that was like his own—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 132 herein above.

We would also recall that these two attendants of Rudra had witnessed the meeting betwixt Lord Hari and Narad—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 133.

The two attendants clearly hint at it when they say that the damsel would choose Narad thinking him to be Lord Hari, and not because she liked him in his own right, in his original form as a sage known by the name of Narad, because it is a great scandal and out-rightly outrageous to ever think of marrying a sage committed to the vows of celibacy and renunciation. It would be absolutely ridiculous and scandalous.

Narad meanwhile was so obsessed by his thoughts of marrying the girl that he could not decipher the clear hint which the two Brahmins were giving him: that the damsel would not marry 'Narad', but she would marry 'Lord Hari'. Had Narad retained even his rudimentary wisdom and senses, he would have understood the joke and seen the hidden hint behind it. But as it happened, he was overcome with passions which blinded his wisdom and corrupted his thinking abilities.

<sup>2</sup>And we would also recall that Lord Hari had made Narad look very ugly, instead of making him appear handsome (apropos: in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 133), so we can easily see the background and the reason of the taunts by the two attendants. As to why Narad could not realize that something was seriously wrong, we have already explained it in the preceding note herein above.]

काहुँ न लखा सो चरित बिसेषा । सो सरूप नृपकन्याँ देखा ॥ ७ ॥

jadapi sunahim muni aṭapaṭi bānī. samujhi na para'i bud'dhi bhrama sānī. 6.
kāhum'na lakhā sō carita bisēṣā. sō sarūpa nṛpakan'yām'dēkhā. 7.
markaṭa badana bhayaṅkara dēhī. dēkhata hṛdayam'krōdha bhā tēhī. 8.

Although the sage heard all sorts of odd words laced with taunts, he could not understand their true meaning and intent, because his wisdom and intellect were shadowed by the dark cloud of delusions which prevented clarity of thought and judicious thinking, forestalling good judgment and initiation of remedial actions<sup>1</sup>. (6)

Meanwhile, no one present there paid much heed to these developments (for their attention was focused on other important issues).

By-and-by, when the princess eventually made her appearance at the site, she glanced around and saw that (outrageously ugly) form of Narad<sup>2</sup>. (7)

[What did she see?] She saw a body that resembled that of a huge monkey, most ugly and hideous, with an unseemly and fierce countenance<sup>2</sup>.

This sight instantly filled her with anger and contempt<sup>3</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Sage Narad sat nervously and in great anxiety, with his mind focused on one single objective of somehow impressing the princess so that she chooses him as her groom. The constant taunts and sarcastic remarks of the two attendants of Rudra, who were disguised as Brahmins, did make him highly irritated, but he managed to suppress his annoyance against these two insolent jokers for fear of creating a ruckus scene that may show him in poor light before the princess who may think that he is short-tempered and wrathful, and hence unfit to be her husband. So, the sage squirmed and shifted nervously in his seat, feeling fidgety and uneasy, but maintained his outwardly cool.

We shall eventually see that this suppressed anger of the sage, for being jeered at and treated so insolently by the two attendants of Rudra, would erupt violently a little later when the sage would curse them vehemently to become a demon. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 135 along with Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes it.}

<sup>2</sup>It was a ‘Swayambar’ where the bride was free to move around the assembled candidates to choose her future groom. It means that she is expected to be bold and avoid shyness. In this system, perhaps it was designed that the concerned lady was given some time to privately view the contestants from a safe distant to help her make up her mind to quite some extent. She could also consult her friends and close confidantes in a private setup. Once she had an overall picture in her mind, she would then be more certain about what to do and make her choice when she was finally given a chance to approach the suitors and view them from close quarters.

She was usually given two chances to move around amongst the candidates; she would put the garland around the neck of the winner in the final round.

So therefore, when the princess stood up and viewed the assembled candidates intently, obviously she also looked at Narad, and his ugly form infuriated her—how dare did this monkey-like person ever think of even coming to the venue of her marriage; was he trying to insult her, saying “look lady, how about marrying a monkey?” Woe to this impertinent and rude fellow for making such a crude joke on her!

<sup>2</sup>This is the form which Lord Hari (Vishnu) gave Narad in order to ensure that he is never chosen by the princess. We shall be reading soon that when Narad discovered the truth, he lost his patience and temper, and cursed Lord Vishnu that the form the Lord had given him to ridicule him in the world, this very form would come to the Lord’s help when he needs it most, and not those who have a charming personality.

In due course of time, Lord Vishnu honoured this curse of Narad in his manifestation as Lord Ram when monkeys and bears would help the Lord to recover Sita, his wife, and defeat the demons led by Ravana, who had abducted her, in the fierce war of Lanka. No handsome knight or prince had helped Lord Ram, and the Lord had to rely on those with ugly forms like that of Narad at present in his time of distress and need.

To wit, just like Lord Vishnu made a ridiculous figure of Narad now and made him suffer the agony of losing the lady of his choice, the curse of Narad would make a similar ridicule of Lord Ram, a manifestation of Lord Vishnu, when he had to suffer the humiliation of first having his wife abducted, and then taking the help of monkeys and bears to get her freed, besides having to face the ignominy of his wife Sita being caught and abducted by a demon king and remaining in his custody in his personal garden for quite sometime, and then accepting her back.

<sup>3</sup>The princess was angry because it was outrageous for a person who was as ugly and hideous as Narad appeared to be, to ever think of coming to the site of her marriage and sit amongst the candidates, in the hope that she would marry him! Woe to such a clown; out with him! She would have asked her father to throw this joker, and an impertinent imposter, into the prison, but it would create a nasty scene, and it was prudent to avoid it at present as it might cause a turmoil, for the ridiculousness of the situation would directly or indirectly make a joke of no one else but her.

She thought that perhaps it was also likely that one of her father's enemies had come to take advantage of her marriage ceremony to ridicule him, and if that is the case, then the best way out is to just neglect the clown and move on.]

At the appointed time, the princess held a garland in her hands (which she would place around the neck of the victor), and accompanied by her friends and maids, she went to take a round of all the assembled suitors sitting in rows. (Doha no. 134)

चौ०. जेहि दिसि बैठे नारद फूली । सो दिसि तेहिं न बिलोकी भूली ॥ १ ॥

The princess did not even glance for a moment in the direction where Narad was sitting haughtily, pent up with pride and puffed up with a false sense of confidence (for he was sure that the damsel would certainly put the garland around his neck). (1)

When he discovered that the princess was not paying any attention to him, he became fidgety and was on his edge, craning his neck as high as he could, and repeatedly making futile gestures to draw her attention towards himself.

Observing this ridiculous condition of Narad, the two attendants of Lord Har (i.e. Lord Shiva, whose one of the forms is known as Rudra) were greatly amused; they smiled in derision and wondered at the strange spectacle<sup>1</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Indeed it was a highly absurd situation. Narad made a clown of himself as he kept on rising half-way up his seat, and making all sorts of gestures to draw the girl's attention. It was more hilarious because of his ugly countenance, which made him look like a monkey. To wit, Narad was actually 'making a monkey out of himself', and this scene was so funny that the two attendants of Rudra could not help but smile in derision. For them, it was a joke of their lifetime which they were thoroughly enjoying.]

The Lord of Laxmi ("lacchinivāsā"; i.e. Lord Vishnu) married the princess and took her home, leaving the rest of the assembled kings and princes doleful as they gave up all hopes of marrying her<sup>3</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Why is Lord Vishnu called 'merciful' when he was actually instrumental in the clowning of Narad, and should be addressed as rude, selfish and stone-hearted for while he disallowed Narad from marrying the lady, he himself went and married her as is clear in these twin verses?

The answer is that the Lord wished for the long-term good of Narad, and even Narad had wished it to be so when he met the Lord*, even though it could mean that at some point of time the sage would become angry and cast some curse on the Lord, which, as it turned out, did happen#. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, *Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 132—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 133 herein before; and #Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 136—to Doha no. 137 herein below.}

Since this was the case, and since the Lord had staged this magical show to teach Narad a lesson as well as to trounce his pride and haughtiness, which, if left unattended, would have permanently tarnished the reputation of the otherwise excellent sage, so therefore it was pre-determined that the damsel would marry no one else but Lord Vishnu, her eternal Lord.

<sup>3</sup>A similar situation prevailed during the marriage ceremony of Sita. When all the kings and princes failed to move the great Bow, which was a condition set by her father, king of Janakpur, for her marriage, all of them were crest-fallen and became sullen; they sat down in defeat like so many deflated balloons. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 250 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that follow it.]

 bēṣu bilōki krōdha ati bārḥā. tinhahi sarāpa dīnha ati gārḥā. 8.

The sage (Narad) meanwhile was most confounded and bewildered, not knowing how to console himself. His mind was utterly baffled as it was under the grip of Moha (delusions and infatuations).<sup>1</sup>

For him, losing this chance of marrying the princess was like a miser losing a precious piece of gem that fell somewhere when the knot tying it to a bundle became loose, letting the gem get lost. (5)

Then, the two attendants of Lord Har, who were watching every development closely with amusement, said with a sarcastic smile to Narad: 'Go and see your face in a mirror.' (6)

Saying this, the two fled in terror (because they were sore affright of Narad losing his temper and venting his ire on them as soon as he discovers how ugly he looked).

Meanwhile, the sage went to a water-body (such as a lake or pond) and looked at his reflection in the water to see what was wrong with his appearance. (7)

When he found out how terrible he looks, he became intensely furious, and his anger leapt up (like an injured tiger). He immediately cursed the two attendants, who had been taunting him all the while, most vehemently with a grave curse<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>As we have read earlier, Narad was under the impression that he has a handsome personality that was a reflection of the one possessed by Lord Vishnu, and hence there was no chance that he would be rejected by the princess. In the event when he failed to woo the lady, he was filled with utter dismay, not understanding how it came to be so. His mind and intellect were so overworked with the thought of marrying the princess, because Moha and Maya (delusions, infatuations, passions and lust) had the better of him and had clasped his wisdom and intellect in their vice-like grip, that all hints thrown at him by the two attendants of Lord Har, who were disguised as Brahmins, could not alert him that there was something amiss in the whole drama.

<sup>2</sup>Narad was amazed that inspite of his having a charming countenance and a handsome personality, the princess paid no heed to him. He was perplexed and flabbergasted in the first place, and during such sensitive time when he was emotionally so upset, the taunts and smiles of the two attendants added fuel to the fire that raged within the frustrated sage. So when he saw his reflection in the water and discovered he had a monkey-like face, the lid blew off his self-control, and like a pent up volcano erupting with full vigour, Narad's suppressed anger and frustration spouted out in the form of a severe curse on his tormentors, the two poor and unfortunate attendants of Rudra who bore the brunt of his ire.]

हँसेहु हमहि सो लेहु फल बहुरि हँसेहु मुनि कोउ ॥ १३५ ॥
dōhā.

hōhu nisācara jā'i tumha kapaṭī pāpī dō'u.
hamṣēhu hamahi sō lēhu phala bahuri hamṣēhu muni kō'u. 135.

Narad cursed the two: 'You two sinful fellows, who are pretentious and full of deceit', go and become a demon, both of you.

Have the fruit of laughing at me<sup>2</sup>, and be warned of laughing at any other sage in the future<sup>3</sup>. (Doha no. 135)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Narad accuses them of pretension and deceit because they had concealed their true identity as attendants of Rudra, and instead assumed the guise of Brahmins to have fun at the cost of the sage's dignity and honour—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 133.

<sup>2</sup>Secondly, instead of coming out straight and warning Narad that he has been deceived by Lord Vishnu, for instead of giving him a charming countenance the Lord has made him look ugly, they had laughed, taunted and smirked at him—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 2-5 that precede Doha no. 134; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 135.

Obviously this impertinent and irreverent behaviour would anger anyone, let alone a revered sage of Narad's stature who was accustomed of getting respect by all. So he was all the more furious at them.

<sup>3</sup>A very interesting observation can be made here in the passing. In due course of time, when the two attendants became the demons Ravana and Kumbhakaran, they turned the table on the same class of people who were the cause of their becoming demons, i.e. the sages and ascetics who had the habit of cursing at will, by subjecting them to ruthless cruelty as a means to teach these sages a bitter lesson of sorts—that they ought not to misuse their mystical powers by furiously cursing everyone at trifle matters, for then the cursed would one day turn against those who had created a hellish life for them, and make them regret for their unbridled anger and misuse of mystical powers that they possessed. In this connection, see: Ram Charit Manas, Baal

Kand, (i) Doha no. 181 along with Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede it; and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 6-8 and Chanda line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 183.

It is like the case of every action having its counter reaction, and the wheel turning full circle, both for the sages as well as for the demons. The sages were responsible for the creation of demons in the first place, because they cursed someone to become a demon to vent their ire at the offender, and then the demons repaid the sages in the same coin by tormenting them ruthlessly to settle scores with those who had cursed them even for minor mistakes.

Why, can't anyone ask these sages that if they had so great a power that they could make humble beings into giant demons, then where was the same power when they could not stop the demons from tormenting them, and instead curse them to perish? Does it mean that these sages could employ their powers only against humble creatures, and not against the mighty monsters that they created?]

फरकत अधर कोप मन माहीं । सपदि चले कमलापति पाहीं ॥ २ ॥

puni jala dīkha rūpa nija pāvā. tadapi hr̥dayam̐ santōṣa na āvā. 1.

pharakata adhara kōpa mana māhīm̐. sapadi calē kamalāpati pāhīm̐. 2.

Though sage Narad had seen that he had an ugly countenance when he looked at his image in the water for the first time a little while ago, but since he could not believe it to be true and come to terms with the reality, so he looked at his image in the water once again to determine if he was not hallucinating, and that what he had seen was a matter of fact. (1)

Peeved, embarrassed and exasperated beyond measure for this misfortune that befell him, his lips quivered, as vehement anger filled his heart. He immediately dashed to the place where he could meet Lord Vishnu (who is also known as Kamlapati)<sup>1</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Though the sage had vented his initial burst of anger at the two attendants of Rudra who had been teasing him, but that did not satisfy him as he knew that the main culprit, who had made a joker out of him and subjected him to such ridicule before the world, was Lord Vishnu, and not those two poor fellows.

What added fuel to the fire of anger in sage Narad was that Lord Vishnu had himself gone to the venue and married the princess, though he knew fully well that Narad would be there with the same intention. This clearly means that the Lord made Narad look ugly on purpose so that the princess would not marry him, and instead would wed the Lord.

This deceit was absolutely unacceptable to Narad, especially when he was so devoted to Lord Vishnu and loyal to him, and also because he had frankly told the Lord his wish, hiding nothing from him, and had sought the Lord's blessings so that he could marry this damsel. This was betrayal and open insult of the great sage, something that stoked his sense of self-respect and the instinct to preserve his honour.

‘Enough is enough’, fumed and fretted the exasperated sage, ‘this fellow Vishnu thinks too much of himself. So now I wilt teach him a mighty good lesson which he wouldst remember for ever.’] bīcahiṁ pantha milē danujārī. saṅga ramā sō'i rājakumārī. 4.

Narad fretted and fumed on his way to meet Lord Vishnu: 'Either I would curse him vehemently (to punish him for treating me so insolently and humiliating me in such a wild manner), or else (if I can't do it) I shall die myself out of shame for the humiliation and abject ridicule and dishonour that I have been subjected to in this world.' (3)

Meanwhile, sage Narad met Lord Vishnu, who is an enemy and vanquisher of demons and evil forces in the world (danujārī), on the way, and the Lord was accompanied by goddess Rama (Laxmi) and that princess. (4)

बोले मधुर बचन सुरसाई । मुनि कहँ चले बिकल की नाई ॥ ५ ॥
सुनत बचन उपजा अति क्रोधा । माया बस न रहा मन बोधा ॥ ६ ॥

bōlē madhura bacana surasā'īṁ. muni kaham̐ calē bikala kī nā'īṁ. 5.
sunata bacana upajā ati krōdhā. māyā basa na rahā mana bōdhā. 6.

The Lord of the Gods (i.e. Lord Vishnu) spoke sweetly and asked sage Narad, 'Oh Sage! Where art thou going so agitatedly, and why art thou feeling so miserable?' (5)

No sooner did Narad heard these soft-spoken words of the Lord, than he lost his temper, as the fire of anger that was yet smouldering inside his heart now suddenly leapt up into wild flames<sup>1</sup>. As he was under the influence of Maya which had already eclipsed his wisdom, Narad lost all sense of propriety and probity. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The sight of Lord Vishnu with the princess fanned the fire of Narad's anger that leapt up in wild flames. Had Vishnu kept quiet, perhaps things would not have precipitated so quickly, and perhaps, as time passed, Narad could have calmed down a wee whit. But the fiat of fate dictated otherwise, and spurred Narad to fall over the edge and blurt out a curse on Lord Vishnu, as we shall read in the following verses herein below.]

पर संपदा सकहु नहिं देखी । तुम्हरेँ इरिषा कपट बिसेषी ॥ ७ ॥
मथत सिंधु रुद्रहि बौरायहु । सुरन्ह प्रेरि बिष पान करायहु ॥ ८ ॥ para sampadā sakahu nahīṁ dēkhī. tumharēm̐ iriṣā kapaṭa bisēṣī. 7. mathata sindhu rudrahi baurāyahu. suranha prēri biṣa pāna karāyahu. 8.

[Without waiting for any formalities and showing basic courtesy to the Lord, and asking the Lord to explain his conduct, sage Narad instead blurted out vengefully—]

‘You can’t see others prosper and fulfill their dreams, because you are very selfish, jealous and pretentious, and full of deceitfulness. (7)

[Now Narad gives some instances to prove his accusations against Lord Vishnu.] At the time of the churning of the celestial ocean in some ancient time, you had motivated the gods who prevailed upon Lord Shiva to drink the poison (known as Halahal) that was produced as a result of this churning, which poison had the effect of making Lord Shiva behave as if intoxicated and stupefied (rudrahi baurāyahu)<sup>1</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When Lord Shiva drank this poison he stored it in his throat which became purple due to the effect of the fierce poison. This lent Lord Shiva the name of ‘Neel-Kantha’, the Lord with a purple or bluish throat.

The story briefly is as follows: A vicious poison called Halaahal emerged as a scorching froth or scum at the time of churning of the ocean by the Gods and the Demons in search of Amrit, the ambrosia of eternal life. The legend goes that Lord Shiva had drunk the fierce poison that emerged at the time of churning of the celestial ocean in the beginning of creation by the Gods and the Demons in search of Amrit, the nectar of eternity and bliss. As soon as this boiling poison came out, there was the fear of the entire creation being scalded by its heat and ferocity. So Lord Shiva took the name of Lord Ram and gulped it in one mouthful. But the Lord knew that if this poison entered his abdomen the whole creation will be annihilated nevertheless as it resided in his abdomen. This shows that Lord Shiva is none but the supreme Brahm in whose body the entire creation resides like the embryo lives in its mother’s womb. Hence, the merciful Lord kept the poison in his throat, giving it a purple colour. {Refer: (i) Sharav Upanishad, verse nos. 11, 16. (ii) Mahabharat, Adi Parva, Canto 18. In its verse no. 18 it is stated that—(a) Lord Shiva had drunk the poison while invoking and repeating the holy Mantra, and of course that Mantra was the holy name of Lord Ram because the Lord is Shiva’s patron deity, and (b) this is the reason why his throat became dark blue or purple, because he had retained the poison in his throat instead of gulping it down in his stomach. (iii) The same fact is endorsed in Tulsidas’ Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 19. (iv) Tulsidas’ Kavitawali, Uttar Kand, verse nos. 157-158 allude to Lord Shiva drinking the Halaahal poison.}

Narad means that while Vishnu prevailed upon Lord Shiva and made the latter drink the harsh poison, but when goddess Laxmi, the patron goddess of wealth and prosperity, emerged from the ocean, Lord Vishnu is so highly selfish that he kept her with him.]

How selfish are you that you made the gods drink Amrit (the sweet ambrosia of eternal life), prevailed upon Lord Shiva to drink the terrible poison<sup>1</sup>, while keeping for yourself the best of the products of this churning in the form of goddess Rama (Laxmi, the patron goddess of wealth and prosperity) and the wonderful, glittering gem known as Kaustav Mani<sup>2</sup>.

Verily, you always serve your own selfish goals, are crooked and mischievous, and you always act with cunning and pretension in whatever you do. (Doha no. 136)

[Continuing to vent his ire on Lord Vishnu, sage Narad said—] 'You have become too independent an Authority with no one over your head to keep a check on you, as a result of which you do whatever pleases you, with no checks and balances that would make you accountable for your deeds. (1)

You decide what is good and what is bad according to your own fancy, and turn things around in a free-wheeling manner in accordance to your whims, transforming that which is good into bad, and vice versa, without having any compunctions, and neither regretting for what you have done nor having to justify it<sup>1</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A similar idea is expressed elsewhere in Ram Charit Manas. Refer: (a) Ayodhya Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 119; (ii) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 282; (b) Uttar Kand, (iii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 112.]

Indeed, you have become bold and stubborn and over-confident of your abilities in an unbridled and unchallenged way by successfully deluding others and getting away with your exploits. You have no fear of anyone, and seem to live happily in an ivory castle of invincibility. (3)

Good or bad deeds done by you have no effects upon you, as you seem to be immune to their consequences.

So far so good; but at last you have made the right call at the right place. Now you will get the fruit of what you did, and reap what you have sown. (5)

So listen now: My curse upon you is that you will have to take a form similar to the one you prevented me from having<sup>1</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>After all the accusations, here comes the final call. What form did Narad want? He wanted to look like Lord Vishnu himself—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 132.

This is Narad's first curse: he cursed Lord Vishnu to assume another form that was an exact image of himself. So it follows that when Lord Vishnu would become Lord Ram in due course of time to uphold the sage's curse, it is plain that Lord Ram would be an image of Lord Vishnu. How remarkable a thing is this! This is the reason that whoever saw Lord Ram, whether ordinary folks of cities of Ayodhya or Janakpur, or of villages and hamlets where the Lord visited on his way to the forest, or the great sages and ascetics and hermits who lived in hermitages or forests, doing penances and observing austerities, whosoever met Lord Ram was captivated by the Lord's stunning charm; the Lord left an abiding impression on them which they cherished and revered as they would do for their worshipped deity.

Verily indeed and in all sooth, as prophesied by Narad, Lord Ram would be a living form, a personification, of Lord Vishnu in this world.]

[This is the second part of Narad's curse—] You have made me look like a monkey. So therefore, monkeys and their kin, the bears, would help you in case you need it<sup>1</sup>. (7)

[And the third curse is this—] Further, you have really done something very good for me (by making me feel miserable and suffer grief for not being able to marry the princess I fell in love with), so therefore, you too would suffer from similar kind of grief arising out of being separated from a woman you love<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This second curse of Narad was honoured by Lord Vishnu in his form as Lord Ram when monkeys and bears of Kishkindha came to his help after Sita, the Lord's wife, was abducted by the demon king Ravana. An army of monkeys and bears accompanied Lord Ram and fought the war of Lanka to have Sita freed. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Kishkindha Kand, Doha no. 21—to Doha no. 23; and (b) Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that precede Doha no. 8.

The Lord (Vishnu) cheerfully accepted the curse by bowing his head before the sage, and felt glad in his heart as he (Lord Vishnu) politely prayed to sage Narad in various ways to calm him down<sup>1</sup>.

Then, the merciful Lord withdrew the mighty force of his Maya (thereby freeing Narad from its influences, and enabling the sage to come to his immediate senses). (Doha no. 137)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The exact wording of the verse says that “Lord Vishnu accepted the curse by placing them on his head”; but in practical terms it means that the Lord bowed his head while Narad was cursing him, and when the sage fell silent, the Lord smiled, said he accepts what the sage has said and would fulfill it, and then the Lord folded his hands to politely request the sage to calm down and forgive him for the mischief he had done which had caused so much agitation in the sage.

At the same time, Lord Vishnu withdrew the Maya's cloud that had cast its shadow over Narad, which instantly shown the light of wisdom for which the sage was famed. As soon as this light showed, Narad woke up as someone from a bad nightmare. He was overcome with intense regret and great remorse, fell down at the Lord's feet asking for forgiveness and cancellation of his curses, and lamenting gravely that he had committed a grave mistake, asking the Lord to advise him some way to repent for it, as we shall read soon in Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that follow herein below.]

As soon as Lord Hari lifted the veil of his Maya, neither was there Rama (goddess Laxmi) nor the princess in sight. (1)

It was then that the sage realized that there was something grave and mysterious about the whole affair, something that he had missed to take into account all the while. This realization made him sore affright and shaken to the core of his being so much that he immediately fell down at the feet of Lord Hari, clasping them with his (trembling) hands while pleading for mercy and forgiveness, and expressing his sincere regrets and repentance<sup>1</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When sage Narad saw Lord Vishnu on the way, with Laxmi on one side and the princess on the other side, the sight had made Narad furious with anger, provoking him so much that he vented out his wrath by cursing the Lord vehemently, for he thought that the Lord was purposely teasing him by showing off the princess who stood by the Lord's side as if to tell Narad that he was not suitable for her, that she thought him to be inept and inapt for her.

What added fuel to Narad's fire of jealousy, repugnance and hate was that it was Lord Vishnu, of all others, who would pull the rug from under his feet, especially when the sage was so devoted and loyal to the Lord, and had always considered the latter as his best well-wisher? He had even confided with the Lord his wish to marry the princess, and had requested the Lord to grant him pleasing personality resembling his own so that his wish to marry the princess could be realized.

In this background, when Narad saw Lord Vishnu with the princess by his side, he obviously treated it as a case of betrayal.

But suddenly the situation changed, as if by magic. The curtain of delusions that had fallen before Narad's eyes was suddenly pulled aside, and he could see what the reality was: that Lord Vishnu was standing alone, and there was neither Laxmi nor the princess to be seen anywhere.

Stunned and dumbfounded, it suddenly struck the benumbed sage that there was something very mysterious and strange in all that had happened with him. He was not a fool; he was a wise celestial sage, a son of the creator Brahma, and someone who has had experience of the strange, mystical and mysterious ways of how Lord Vishnu works. This sudden realization punctured the balloon of Narad's puffed up ego provoked by his anger, as a result of which he virtually collapsed at the Lord's feet like a crumpled balloon.]

मैं दुर्बचन कहे बहुतेरे । कह मुनि पाप मिटिहिं किमि मेरे ॥ ४ ॥

mṛṣā hō'u mama śrāpa kṛpālā. mama icchā kaha dīnadayālā. 3.
mair̥m durbacana kahē bahutērē. kaha muni pāpa miṭihim kimi mērē. 4.

[Filled with extreme remorse and a sense of overwhelming guilt, sage Narad pleaded with Lord Vishnu—] ‘Oh merciful Lord (kṛpālā)! I plead with you (with all the sincerity I can muster) that let my curse be in vain; let it be false and without effect.’

The Lord who is always gracious and compassionate towards those who are miserable and humble (dīnadayālā), said politely: ‘It was my wish. [To wit, everything that happened was as I had wished it to happen. So my dear Narad, don’t regret or feel ashamed and so low-down. Get up and take the whole episode as a lesson for you. Be reassured I am not angry at all with you. I just wished to protect you from falling into the trap of passions and its attendant attachments and infatuations that would have ruined you; I was worried about maintaining the sanctity of your vows of celibacy, renunciation and sage-hood. So let there be no hard feelings betwixt the two of us, for I love you as you love me.]’ (3)

[Sage Narad, meanwhile, could not overcome his sense of guilt and wrong-doing inspite of Lord Vishnu’s assurance to him that everything was in accordance with the Lord’s wish, and Narad should not feel personally responsible for the unfortunate way the things went. So he pleaded with the Lord for forgiveness as he had used uncouth words for the Lord that were unthinkable for him if he had been in his right senses, and this transgression was a sinful act that he cannot so easily forget. Hence, the sage requested the Lord to advise him a way to repent for his impertinent behaviour, and the unintentional sin that he had committed.]

Sage Narad said with immense remorse and regret in his voice: ‘Lord, I have spoken many wrong things, and have used uncivil and uncouth words (for you)<sup>1</sup>. Tell me how this grave sin of mine can be erased; tell me please some way for repentance so that the guilt that is lying heavily on my conscience can be shaken off.’ (4) kō'u nahim̐ siva samāna priya mōrēm̐. asi paratīti tajahu jani bhōrēm̐. 6.

Lord Vishnu advised sage Narad: ‘Go and do Japa (meditation involving repetition) of the holy name of Lord Shiva one hundred times (saṅkara sata nāmā). This will immediately give your heart the desired peace. (5)

Verily indeed, for sooth and without gainsay, no one is as dear to me as is Lord Shiva<sup>1</sup>. Never forget this cardinal principle. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When Lord Vishnu appeared in this world as Lord Ram, he had reiterated this principle once again. The first occasion was at the time of crossing the ocean by constructing a bridge across it—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 2—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 3.

The second occasion was in Ayodhya where the Lord used to give discourses on matters of spiritual importance for the citizens. He had emphasized the importance of having devotion for Lord Shiva on one such occasion. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 45.

Sage Yagyawalkya too has said the same thing to sage Bharadwaj in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no. 104.]

jēhi para kṛpā na karahim purārī. sō na pāva muni bhagati hamārī. 7.
asa ura dhari mahi bicarahu jāī. aba na tumhahi māyā ni'arāī. 8.

Oh Sage! Remember that a person on whom Lord Shiva (also known as 'Purari') is not pleased, shall not be able to have devotion (Bhakti) for me<sup>1</sup>. (7)

Keeping this principle in your heart (i.e. remembering it always), go and roam freely on earth<sup>2</sup>. Be assured that my stupendous Maya would not come near you henceforth<sup>3</sup>. (8)

<sup>2</sup>A very interesting thing is to be observed here. Sage Narad was a celestial sage who used to roam around in the heavens. But now Lord Vishnu tells him to “go and roam on the earth”. What does it imply? For one, it is to tell Narad to personally experience how the life is in the mortal world where the sage has cursed the Lord to go. Let the sage witness the pains and torments of life on earth like the way the Lord would experience himself when he comes down to earth as Lord Ram.

The second intention of the Lord was to spread his message which he has given to Narad in the heaven: that if one wishes to worship Lord Vishnu or any of his forms, then it is imperative for the devotee to pay respects to Lord Shiva too.

This mandate was also aimed at giving a message of wisdom for those who were so stupid as to make distinction between the two aspects of the same Supreme Being, one as Lord Vishnu who carries out the function of sustenance and protection of this creation, and the other as Lord Shiva who maintains balance by bringing to an end an older thing in order to make space for a new thing that is young, so that the cycle of creation and conclusion can continue smoothly, and the wheel can roll on and on. Truly, if there is no death on one end of the scale, and there is continuous birth on the other end of the same scale, one can easily imagine the consequences it would have on the limited space on the surface of the earth and its resources. There would be overcrowding and fights for even basics of life that would soon get exhausted, bringing about mass annihilation as the scale itself will topple over. Is it not better to maintain an ecological balance instead of this scenario of mass extinction?

This advise given to sage Narad by Lord Vishnu that no one is as dear to him as is Lord Shiva, and that if anyone wishes to worship Lord Vishnu should also worship Lord Shiva, was also aimed at bridging the wide gulf that existed between two types of sects, one which called itself 'Vaishnavas' and the other 'Shivaites' who worshipped the two deities independently, and who were usually at loggerheads with each other, creating rift in the society, and splitting the people unnecessarily on fictitious beliefs.

The third reason: Lord Vishnu wished that Narad should be a first-hand witness when the Lord would manifest himself as Lord Ram—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 187.

Narad would then follow the Lord all through his life in this world, so that, first, Narad would have no doubt that his curse had been fully honoured by Lord Vishnu without cutting corners and trying to play tricks on the sage, and second, to chronicle the whole story which Narad would then go and narrate to the gods in the heaven. In this journey, often times sage Narad would be accompanied by other great sages of heaven, such as Sankaadi etc.—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 27.

It is also quite possible that sage Narad would have told Lord Shiva, during his frequent meetings with him, about the events of Lord Ram's life on earth. Probably all these briefings by sage Narad were later on collated by Lord Shiva into a seamless story while he was meditating on Lord Ram, producing what has come down to us as "Ram Charit Manas"—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 9 that precedes Doha no. 35.

<sup>3</sup>Lord Vishnu assured Narad that he should not fear from falling prey to worldly temptations that he would encounter routinely while he moved around in the mortal world which is so full of sensual attractions and material charms that are too strong to be easily resisted. Lord Vishnu blessed Narad that henceforth, nothing would disturb his inner peace.]

Lord Vishnu reassured the sage in various ways, and then disappeared from sight.

Then, Narad proceeded towards Satya Loka (the upper heaven where the creator Brahma resides), while singing the glories of Lord Ram all along the way<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 138)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This verse is an instance that clearly shows that Lord Vishnu and Lord Ram are the same Divinity.

Another such instance is when sage Narad approached Lord Ram and asked the Lord to explain why he hadn't let the sage marry the princess of his choice, an obvious reference to the present episode concerned with Lord Vishnu. {Apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 43—to Doha no. 44.}

It ought to be noted here that when Narad approached Lord Ram to ask the latter why the Lord did not allow him to marry the princess, both used personal pronouns to address each other, such as 'you' and 'I'. Had Lord Ram been a different person and not Lord Vishnu himself, Narad would not have used 'you' to ask the Lord why he didn't allow him to marry—viz. 'Oh Lord, why did "you" not allow me to marry that girl?’ And Lord Ram would not have answered him using the pronouns ‘I’ and ‘You’ by saying—‘Narad, “I” didn’t allow “you” --- ’.]

ati sabhīta nārada pahīṁ ā'ē. gahi pada ārata bacana sunā'ē. 2.

Meanwhile, the two attendants of Lord Har (Rudra, or Shiva), who had hidden themselves somewhere out of fear of Narad, saw that the sage was moving along the road headed to some place, and from his calm countenance they deduced that he was presently free from delusions and anger, and instead, appeared to be happy and contented in his Mana (mind), --- (1)

--- They mustered courage to come out of hiding and approach the sage, though they still were greatly alarmed and affright of provoking him. However, they came to the sage and fell down before him, pitifully clasping his feet as they spoke with great humility in their voice.<sup>1</sup> (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>After Narad cursed the two poor fellows, they were so scared stiff and numbed by this sudden unfortunate turn of events, which they had never expected would boomerang on themselves so harshly, that they hid somewhere to observe what would happen now, and were exploring options to somehow seek forgiveness from the sage and ask him to mitigate the horrifying effects of his curse on them as far as was possible. So they were closely following Narad, and saw how the sage had cursed Lord Vishnu also, which was a little bit reassuring for them because they realized that they were not alone to be at the receiving end of the sage’s wrath. Then they saw how subsequently Narad was freed from his delusions as he fell down at the Lord’s feet to ask for forgiveness for himself.

All these developments were encouraging for the two terrified attendants of Lord Har, for now they thought that they could safely approach the sage and beg him to forgive them in the same way as the sage had asked Lord Vishnu for forgiveness himself. Further, they observed that after the volcano of anger subsided and the lava of ire of the enraged sage had dissipated and cooled down, he was as peaceful and tranquil as he always had famously been. Narad, they concluded, was himself very sorry, regretful and remorseful for what had happened, and therefore there was a very remote chance of him becoming angry again. Hence, the two attendants thought it to be the right moment to go and ask for forgiveness from the sage, and see how much their future suffering can be mitigated and taken care of.

They knew about the mystical powers of sage Narad, and that he was a favourite sage of Lord Vishnu and a son of the creator Brahma. So, if Narad felt pity on them then they were sure that he would bless them and devise a means to reduce their sufferings.]

[Pleading for mercy, the two attendants of Lord Har said to sage Narad—] ‘Oh exalted sage (munirāyā)! We are not Brahmins, but attendants of Lord Har<sup>1</sup>. We are extremely sorry for the great mistake we had made (by insulting you), and for which we have already been punished (by way of your curse upon us)<sup>2</sup>. (3)

Oh merciful sage, please be kind upon us now to bless us with your grace and mitigate our sufferings that would befall upon us as a result of your curse.’

Sage Narad, who was always merciful and gracious on those who were humble and distressed (dīnadayālā)<sup>3</sup>, took pity on the two attendants and blessed them as follows— (4)

<sup>3</sup>From the recent developments it would seem that Narad was very harsh and ill-tempered sage for he had cursed the two poor fellows as well as Lord Vishnu. But that was not Narad’s true nature, as this verse clearly implies by using the term “dīnadayālā” for him. All the rancour and heartburn that had been caused recently were not his own fault, but it was caused by the effects of ‘Maya’ of Lord Vishnu. And as soon as Maya lifted its gloomy veil that it had cast on him for so long, Narad was back to his normal self, a sage who was peaceful and merciful to the core.]

‘You two will certainly go to become demons<sup>1</sup>, but (I bless you that you won’t be ordinary demons but) ones who would be famed for exceptional qualities and valour, possessing immense strength, powers, authority and sway over the world<sup>2</sup>. (5)

By the strength of your arms, you two would conquer the whole world in an era when Lord Vishnu would reveal himself as a human being<sup>3</sup>. (6)

You two will die at the hands of Lord Hari (Lord Vishnu) in a battle, and this would ensure that the two of you will get final liberation and deliverance from the world of transmigration (where you would be born as demons due to my curse), and at the same time attain emancipation and salvation for yourselves, and eternal bliss and beatitude for your souls so much so that you won't have to return to the cycle of birth and death any time again.<sup>4</sup> (7)

The two attendants felt assuaged and comforted by the sage's reassuring words. So they bowed reverentially at the feet of the sage and went their way<sup>5</sup>.

By-and-by, the two became great demons in due course of time. (8)

Note—<sup>1</sup>The words of sage Narad could not go in vain—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1 and 4 that precede Doha no. 68; (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 73.

Besides, whatever is written in one's destiny, it cannot be erased. In this connection, refer to: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no. 97; (b) Ayodhya Kand, (ii) Doha no. 171.

<sup>3</sup>By this blessing, sage Narad ensured that both his curses, on these two attendants and on Lord Vishnu, would be effective simultaneously, which would not only be good for these two poor fellows but would also prevent Lord Vishnu from taking the trouble to become a human being again in a separate era to grant deliverance to their souls.

<sup>5</sup>Feeling reassured and contented that though they would have to bear the effects of the curse by becoming demons, yet it would be a blessing in disguise for them as they would not only occupy a powerful and famed position in that race, but would also be lucky to meet Lord Hari personally in the form of Lord Ram, and that the Lord would himself help them attain their final deliverance, salvation and emancipation by killing their demon-body and liberating their souls from its bondage.

Assured of salvation and deliverance, the two attendants thanked sage Narad and went their way.]

So it was that Lord Vishnu, who gives joy to the gods and is a provider of happiness to noble human beings, revealed himself as a human being to remove the burden of the earth (symbolized by cruel forces known as the demons) in one of the eras<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 139)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This episode was narrated by Lord Shiva when goddess Parvati expressed her astonishment when told that sage Narad had once cursed Lord Vishnu to become a human being, and she wished to know what had happened.

Refer to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no. 124.

If we examine this episode closely we would discover that the word “dīnadayālā”, meaning one who is very kind, compassionate, merciful and gracious towards those who are miserable, distressed and lowly, those who are overcome with grief and need solace and succour, has been used for both Lord Vishnu* and sage Narad#. {Apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, *Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 138 (Vishnu), and #Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 139 (Narad).}

What does this imply? Well, Lord Vishnu is called “dīnadayālā” because though Narad had cursed the Lord so vehemently, the latter did not become angry with the sage, but rather welcomed him with due respect and accepted the sage’s words with humility. Remember: Vishnu is no ordinary god, but the almighty Lord of this creation who could have severely punished Narad for his rude and irreverent behaviour that crossed all limits of civility and proper conduct, for the sage had transgressed all boundaries of courteousness and self-restraint that is expected from a great sage of his stature and reputation. Further, Vishnu was the best well-wisher and guardian of Narad as the latter himself has acknowledged. {Apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2 and 7 that precede Doha no. 132.} So therefore it was incredulous for Narad to even think of using foul words for his patron deity, much less of cursing him. Yet, Lord Vishnu pardoned him without showing any trace of anger or revulsion as the sage’s behaviour.

A similar situation prevails in sage Narad’s response to the plea of the two attendants who fell down at his feet and asked for forgiveness. Though the two had been very insulting in their behaviour towards the great sage, laughing at him and teasing him in sight of the full assembly at the venue of the marriage of the princess, and then continued with their insolent behaviour by pursuing the sage and taunting him even after he left the assembly in a huff when he failed to draw the princess’ attention toward himself, which infuriated Narad so much that he cursed them to become demons*, yet when they asked for forgiveness, the sage did not think twice to bless them with an auspicious fate#. {Apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, *(i) Chaupai line nos. 2-5 that precede Doha no. 134; (ii) Doha no. 135 along with Chaupai line nos. 2 and 6 that precede it; and #(iii) Chaupai line nos. 4-7 that precede Doha no. 139.}]

[Lord Shiva continued with his narration, telling Parvati—] ‘In this way, strange and mysterious are the many stories associated with the different manifestations of Lord Hari and the deeds he did over many different eras and times. (10

In all the Kalpas (an era consisting of one cycle of creation and its conclusion) the Lord manifests himself for one reason or another, doing countless deeds that are fascinating and perplexing at the same time, --- (2)

--- And every time and in every age, great sages, minstrels and bards compose verses to sing the glories of the Lord and honour his divine manifestations, as well as to chronologically record the mystical deeds that he does during such times. (3)

[Note—Lord Shiva has already told Parvati that stories and narratives related to the Supreme Being are endless; no line can be drawn to mark a beginning or end of them. They are as diverse as the era in which the Lord manifests himself, and as varied as the circumstances of his manifestation and its objectives. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 121—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 124; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 4-6 that follow herein below; and (b) Uttar Kand, (iii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 91—to Doha no. 92.

These stories and narratives of the Lord are so unique and strange that they defy logic and arguments. They are both fascinating as well as bewildering because on the one hand they are extremely interesting and captivating for the mind and its power to imagine, while on the other hand they are so mystical and strange that common logics and arguments used to prove the authenticity of anything or happening in this world do not apply to them.]

There are a variety of incidents and episodes associated with each of such manifestations of the Lord, and the sages, minstrels and bards have sung and glorified them in their own ways<sup>1</sup>.

Hence, those who are learned, wise and intelligent do not express surprise or incredulity when they hear or read such stories and narratives related to the Supreme Lord of the world. (4)

Verily indeed and in all sooth, Lord Hari and stories associated with him are endless and without limits. These are narrated and heard by all the sages, saints and pious persons over time. (5)

Truly, Lord Ram's divine stories are so endless and mystical that even if one were to spend an entire era narrating and singing them, one would not be able to finish them. Nay, one would neither find an end to them nor know from where to begin. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This gives rise to countless variations in the details of the stories associated with the Lord and his manifestations in different eras, caused by different circumstances, having different objectives, and then narrated by different persons who not only have their unique signature style of narration but also lay emphasize on a particular event that appeals to them more, and which they view from their own prism of thinking, that would naturally differ from the perspective and viewpoint held by others.]

prabhu kautukī pranata hitakārī. sēvata sulabha sakala dukha hārī. 8.

Oh Bhavani (i.e. Parvati), I have narrated this episode that describes how the Maya of Lord Hari had successfully deluded sage Narad, though the sage was so highly enlightened, erudite and wise. (7)

Indeed, the Lord enjoys playing strange tricks by employing his Maya, yet at the same time he is very considerate towards those who submit themselves to him, for then the tricks of Maya of the Lord do not have influence on such persons<sup>1</sup>.

By serving the Lord (and having devotion for him) everything is accessible; to submit to the Lord in humble service eliminates all sorrows and miseries (associate with life in this gross mortal world). (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Shiva meant that Maya is so powerful that no matter how learned, illustrious, wise and enlightened a person may be, yet it makes a dumb-head of him if it casts its veil of delusions on that person. So what is the way out; how can one be safe from this net of Maya?

The answer is found in Sortha no. 140 herein below, as well as in Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 44—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 45; (ii) Doha no. 85 along with Chaupai line nos. 3-8 that precede it; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 89; and (iv) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 116—to Doha no. 119-a.

In essence, these verses say that Maya can be easily overcome by having Bhakti (devotion) for Lord God (read: Lord Ram, for he is the deity to whom this holy book is dedicated), by worshipping the Lord and serving him in the best way one can, for it is the grace of the Lord that alone can act as the shield against the onslaught of Maya.]

There is no one, including the gods, humans, great sages et al, who cannot be influenced by Maya, who can claim that he is immune to the tricks played by Maya.

Keeping this in view, those who are wise and erudite worship the Lord who is the Sovereign of Maya itself, for Maya cannot defy the Lord's wishes<sup>1</sup>. (Sortha no. 140)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Maya will not shy away from exerting its nasty influences on anyone, no matter how powerful or exalted he may be. Maya does not spare even the gods, or powerful human beings such as great sages and ascetics. Yet, it would not disturb or distract those who are blessed by Lord Hari or Lord Vishnu and his manifested form as Lord Ram. Now, Lord Ram has himself asserted later on that those who have Bhakti (devotion) for him are immune to the influences of Maya. Sage Kaagbhusund endorses this view when he told Garud that ever since he had been accepted by Lord Ram by the virtue of devotion that the sage had for the Lord, Maya has had no influence on him—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-5 that precede Doha no. 89.]

--- As to why the Supreme Brahm, the Lord who is eternal, without a birth and attributes, as well as formless and invisible, would take a birth as a human being to become a King of Kosalpur (Ayodhya)<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Earlier, Lord Shiva had told Parvati that there are many reasons why the Supreme Being would come down to earth and assume the form of Lord Ram. Shiva had also told her that he would narrate a few of such reasons for her. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 122.}

Till now he had narrated the episode of Narad, and so now he begins the narration of another such wonderful incident that led Lord Vishnu to come down to earth as Lord Ram.

It is the story of the same Lord Ram who had assumed the form of a hermit and was wondering in the forest when you saw him<sup>1</sup>. (3)

Do you remember that in your previous life, when you were known as Sati, you had watched that event (of Lord Ram wondering in the forest like an ordinary man searching for his lost wife) and were completely baffled and utterly confused about the authenticity of Lord Ram (inspite of my best efforts to make you see the truth)<sup>2</sup>. (4)

Even till this day that shadow of doubt that had clouded your wisdom at that time persists and continues to dog you (because you have yourself expressed the wish to remove certain doubts about Lord Ram that still distract you)<sup>3</sup>.

So listen to this narrative (that explains why the Supreme Being became a human being in the form of Lord Ram) as listening to it would remove your doubts and eliminate all lingering confusions about the Lord that you might have. (5)

I shall narrate, according to my understanding and intellect<sup>4</sup>, all the events and mysterious deeds done by Lord Ram during that manifestation.' (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 48—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 51; and (ii) Doha no. 52—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 55.

Lord Shiva draws Parvati's attention to the incident which was the primary cause of all her miseries in her previous life when she was known as Sati; an incident that led Lord Shiva abandon her, she dying by burning herself in the fire sacrifice organized by her father, Daksha Prajapati, and then taking a new birth as Parvati.

Lord Shiva had expressed his displeasure to Parvati in the beginning too—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Doha no. 114 along with Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede it; and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 119.

<sup>4</sup>Lord Shiva has already asserted that the stories associated with Lord Ram are countless and varied, and different sages, minstrels and bards sing them according to their understanding and abilities. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 114; and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 140 herein above.

Hence, he reiterates here that he would endeavour to narrate Lord Ram's divine story as faithfully in accordance to his own understanding as he can, but that does not mean that it is exhaustive and the only way it can be narrated; it is one of the many ways it is narrated.]

Sage Yagyawalkya said<sup>1</sup>: ‘Oh Bharadwaj! When Uma (Parvati) heard these words of Lord Shiva (that referred to her previous life and how those doubts still linger in her mind), she felt a bit shy and embarrassed, but at the same time she smiled at the fun that Lord Shiva intended<sup>2</sup>. (7)

[Now, that said, Yagyawalkya resumes his narrative by quoting Lord Shiva's discourse with Parvati which went as follows:-]

So now, Lord Shiva (known also as ‘Brishketu’) began to narrate the story of why Lord Ram had manifested on that occasion (when Sati met him in the forest as cited above in verse nos. 3-4). (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Let us not forget that the entire discourse between Lord Shiva and Parvati was narrated by sage Yagyawalkya to sage Bharadwaj when the latter wished to hear the divine story of Lord Ram—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 47 along with Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede it.

<sup>2</sup>As we would recall, a pleasant exchange of this kind had already taken place between Lord Shiva and Parvati at the beginning of the current discourse. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 112—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 113; (ii) Doha no. 119—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 121.]

[Sage Yagyawalkya said to sage Bharadwaj—] ‘Oh wise sage (munīsa)! I shall now tell you that story (which Lord Shiva narrated to Parvati)<sup>1</sup>, which please listen with full attention, because the divine story of Lord Ram has the mystical ability, and the power that is inherent in it, to remove the consequences of sins committed in Kaliyug, for this story is auspicious itself and spreads auspiciousness around it, and it is a very pleasant story that is charming to hear<sup>2</sup>. (Doha no. 141)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 47. If we read the current Doha no. 141 in conjunction with this previous Doha no. 47, it would be abundantly clear that sage Yagyawalkya paused for a while after narrating the episode of Narad, and then resumed the story by reminding sage Bharadwaj that he is continuing with the same narrative of the discourse between Lord Shiva and Parvati with which he had begun his own discourse on a specific request of Bharadwaj, and therefore the latter must pay full attention to it and listen to it with due reverence.

<sup>2</sup>The glories, holiness and auspicious character of Lord Ram’s divine story, known as the ‘Ram Charit Manas’, has been extolled elsewhere too. *In an ancient time, there was a noble and pious couple. The man was called ‘Swayambhu Manu’, and his wife was called ‘Satrupa’. They were the ancestors of the human race, for it was from them that the wonderful human race descended<sup>1</sup>. (1)

The couple was diligent in following the principles of Dharma—i.e. they followed the rules of good conduct, propriety, probity and ethics, and led a life in accordance to the principles of righteousness and auspiciousness. Their deeds and conducts have been legendary, and even in later ages the Vedas (scriptures) sang their glories and praised them in laudatory terms. (2)

[Note—*Till now, sage Yagyawalkya narrated the story of Narad. This story explained why Lord Vishnu would become a human being in the form of Lord Ram.

Now in this current episode of Manu and Satrupa, the sage narrates one of the reasons why Lord Vishnu became the son of king Dasrath and queen Kaushalya of the kingdom of Ayodhya.

<sup>1</sup>The story of the creation has been narrated in Srimad Bhagwad Mahapurāṇa, Skandha 3, Chapter 12. Manu and Satrupa were the first male and female in this world, and the rest of this creation, that depends on the process of intercourse between a male and a female, is an off-spring or a descendent of this first couple.

Though they lived a conjugal life as a couple who enjoyed pleasures of the sense organs, as this was imperative to start the process of creation as mandated by the creator Brahma, yet they maintained internal discretion and dispassion, remaining aloof from the charms of the material world. They practiced renunciation and self-control in all matters, and were wise, self-realised and enlightened so much so that inspite of appearing to be involved in the affairs of the world and engaged in procreation, they still lived in a state of consciousness that is known as ‘Turiya’, the transcendental state of existence attained in higher stages of Yoga (meditation) where the pure ‘self’ of a person is detached from his physical body so much so that it remains aloof from and disinterested in whatever the bodies does.

The couple lived a long and honourable life that is said to extend for a long period of 72 four-Yuga cycles, each cycle consisting of Sata, Treta, Dwapar and Kali Yugas.

Manu and Satrupa had two sons named Priyavrata and Uttānपाद, and three daughters named Aakuti, Devahuti and Prasuti. Aakuti was married to Ruchi Prajaapati, Devahuti to sage Kardam, and Prasuti to Daksha Prajaapati. Later on in history, some of the famed wives of great sages were daughters of Devahuti. Some examples are Anusuiya who was the wife of sage Atri, and Arundhati who was the wife of sage Vasistha.]

nṛpa uttānapāda suta tāsū. dhruva hari bhagata bhaya'u suta jāsū. 3.

laghu suta nāma priyabrata tāhī. bēda purāna prasansahim jāhī. 4.

King Uttānपाद was the couple's (Manu and Satrupa) son, and the famed devotee of Lord Vishnu, the child named Dhurva<sup>1</sup>, was his (Uttānपाद's) son. (3)

The couple's younger son was named Priyavrat<sup>2</sup>, who has been praised by the Vedas and the Purans (ancient scriptures and histories). (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The story of Dhruva is briefly as follows: He was the elder son of king Uttānपाद from his first wife Suniti. The king was so charmed by his second wife named Suruchi that he completely neglected Suniti and Dhruv. Once it so happened that the child Dhruv was snubbed by his step-mother for attempting to draw affection of his father. The child was very upset and despondent. He approached his mother for solace. She advised him to accept Lord Vishnu as his eternal and loving Father and protector. For this, Dhruv had to do severe Tapa (austerity and penance). The overwhelmed child was so determined that he immediately proceeded to the forest to do Tapa. He met the celestial sage Narad on the way who instructed him on ways to meditate upon the Lord. The Lord was extremely pleased by Dhruv's sincerity and devotion and appeared before him. He blessed the child and gave him two boons—one was the restoration of his honour and kingdom of the kingdom, and the other was a permanent place in the heavens, a position so exalted, steady and unwavering that even the God could not match it. So, in due course of time, Dhruv assumed a personified form of a divine God and took up his heavenly abode in the Dhruv Loka. The story related to him is narrated in detail in the Vishnu Puran, section 1, cantos 11-12.

The Tripadvibhut Maha-Narayan Upanishad of the Atharva Veda, in its Canto 5, paragraph no. 15 mentions this Dhruv Loka and Dhruv, the God, when it describes the path taken by a devotee of Lord Vishnu to the latter's abode in heaven when the former leaves his mortal body. The devotee has taken a ride on the back of the Garud, the vehicle of Lord Vishnu who is represented by the divine ethereal Mantra known as OM in this Upanishad, and has already passed through the Satya Loka where Brahma the creator lives, the Ishan Loka where Lord Shiva lives, the Graha Loka where the different Grahas live, the Saptarishi Mandal where the seven celestial sages live (and which is represented by the Great Bear constellation of stars in the sky), the Surya Mandal which is the realm of the Sun God, and the Chandra Mandal which is the realm of the Moon God. Then he reaches this Dhruv Mandal.

The Dhruv Loka or Dhruv Mandal is represented by the North Star and its immediate environs in the celestial map. The North Star is a personified form of Dhruv. The North Star has a great symbolic importance and value here. This star remains static and unchanging in its position in the sky—it is a metaphor for stability, uniformity, unchanging nature, steadfastness and durability. It is a vital guide for navigation purposes in the night. Hence, if a person is steady in his thoughts and single-mindedly pursues his chosen path, always keeping the aim in sight, he is sure to achieve success and obtain his objective in life. The objective of the spiritual aspirant is to attain his Lord Vishnu and find Mukti. So when he has crossed all hurdles and overcome formidable obstacles in the symbolic form of praises and honours lavished on him en-route to heaven as described above in this narration, it is only then that he can rupture through this world and reach the exalted abode where Vishnu lives. Now, if the celestial sky is imagined as a huge sphere, then this is the point from where the cosmic traveler has ruptured the solar system and entered the upper reaches of the cosmos where the upper heaven is situated. Since Lord Vishnu's abode is supposed to be unchanging and steady in its glory unlike other worlds, the metaphor of the North Star as a gateway to Vaikunth, the abode of Vishnu, appears to be very appropriate here.

In Ram Charit Manas there is a reference to Dhruva in the context of praising the holy Name of Lord Ram. It says that Dhruva had attained an eternal place amongst the stars by the virtue of his repeating the holy Name of the Lord. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 26.

The story of Dhruva has been narrated in detail in Srimad Bhagwad Mahapurana, Skandha 4, Chapter nos. 8-12.

He was very wise, self-realised and enlightened, practiced renunciation and detachment, and was a great devotee of Lord God. On the request of the creator Brahma and his father Manu, Priyavrata had to leave the path of complete renunciation of the world and instead follow the path of a householder. He had married Bahishmati, the daughter of Vishwakarma, the architect and engineer of the gods. From his wife he begot ten sons, one of them named Aagnirdha, and a daughter named Urjwasi who later on became the wife of sage Sukracharya, the Guru (preceptor and advisor) of the demon race.

Out of his ten sons, three became Param Hansa (those who renounced the world and became perfect Sanyasis), and the rest seven became rulers of the seven continents. He is credited to have divided the earth into seven continents, assigning his seven sons to rule over them, one son to look after one continent. These continents were marked and separated from one another by creation of seven oceans, as well as mountain ranges, forests and great rivers that formed their natural boundaries.

By his mystical powers, Priyavrata created seven great chariots that were as radiant as the sun. Riding on them, he circled the earth seven times in such a way that even during the night the earth remained illuminated. He ruled for  $11 \times 10^8$  human years. {Refer: Srimad Bhagwad Mahapuran, Skandha 5, Chapter 1.}]

Devahuti was his (Manu's) daughter, who in due course of time became the dear wife of sage Kardam. (5)

It was she who bore the ancient sage Kapil, famed for his compassionate and merciful nature, in her womb. [To wit, Devahuti was the mother of sage Kapil.] (6)

He (sage Kapil) was an exponent and preacher of the school of philosophy known as 'Sankhya Sastra'<sup>1</sup>. He was exceptionally wise, self-realised and enlightened, being well-versed in the principles governing metaphysical Truths pertaining to the Supreme Being, the Lord God. (7)

It was that king Manu we are talking about. He ruled for a long period of time, and always obeyed the rules and instructions given to him by the Lord God.

[To wit, Manu lived an exemplary life in accordance with the principles of Dharma—apropos: verse no. 2 herein above.] (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Sankhya Sastra: We find references to this philosophy in the following Upanishads—(i) Krishna Yajur Veda's Varaaha Upanishad, Canto 2, verse no. 55, and Canto 4, verse no. 35; Shwetashwatar Upanishad, Canto 5-6; Pran Agnihotra, verse no. 1. (ii) Shukla Yajur Veda's Brihad Aranyak Upanishad, Canto 2, Brahmin 5, verse no. 14; Mantriko-panishad, verse no. 14. (iii) Atharva Veda—Sita Upanishad, verse no. 33; Annapurna Upanishad, Canto 5, verse nos. 49-50.

This is one of the six great schools of Indian philosophy. It was first propounded by sage Kapil as 'Sankhya Sutras'. [Refer Bhagwata 3/25-33, and Canto 5-6 of Shwetashwatar Upanishad of the Krishna Yajur Veda tradition.]

Sage Kapil was the celebrated sage who is regarded as the fifth incarnation of Lord Vishnu (Bhagavata, 1/3; 3/24). He is compared to Lord Krishna in Bhagavata (10/26). He was the brother-in-law of sage Vasistha, being the brother of his wife Arundhati, and the only son of sage Kardama and his wife Devahuti. He taught even his mother spiritual wisdom in Bhagavata, and hence this part of this scripture is called 'Kapil Gita' in which the sage has expounded upon the philosophies of Sankhya Shastra, Ashtanga Yoga (the eight-fold path of Yoga) and Bhakti-yoga (the path of devotion for and submission to the Lord) (3/25-33).

Sage Kapil is however renowned for one of the six schools of Indian philosophies known as Sankhya Shastra.

The word Shastra means any body of knowledge which has been deeply researched and then systematically codified and made useful in a meaningful way.

The word Sankhya, according to some scholars, refers to the 'number' or 'numeral' that it refers to, because it says that there are twenty five elements or 'Tattwas' in creation. However, there are some others who assert that it refers to 'Gyan' or acquisition of truthful knowledge of the reality behind the façade of illusions. It stresses on Gyan or truthful knowledge as the only path leading to liberation and deliverance of the soul from this world, and its attaining final emancipation and salvation riding on the boat of knowledge.

Therefore, the combined word Sankhya Shastra refers to the philosophy that endeavours to unravel the great secrets of creation based on sound knowledge and rational logic. It has six chapters and contains five hundred twenty six Sutras or keys or codes that unlock the profound treasure of knowledge pertaining to who the creature actually is, how has he come to be what he is at present, and how he can be freed from this vicious cycle of birth and death. Only when one understands the beginning can he understand the end, because this so-called 'beginning' has its origin in the previous 'end'. That is, only after something ends and carries forward certain baggage with it does a new beginning can start. After all, this is based on the fundamental tenet of Nature that 'nothing can start from nothing; there must be something from which anything starts'. That is why we say that there cannot be smoke without a fire.

Now, if one goes back to the 'very beginning of creation' when there wasn't any prior life from which any new life could be born on the principles of 'deeds and their consequences', i.e. the theory that when a creature does any deed in this life then he would have to take a new birth to suffer the consequences of these deeds because they cannot be wished away, the question arises ‘what started this creation then?’ The Sankhya Shastra endeavours to answer precisely this question in a very logical and systematic manner.

This secret was revealed, according to the of the Krishna Yajur Veda tradition’s Shwetashwatar Upanishad, 5/2, to sage and seer Kapil who was the first person to whom the esoteric secrets of creation were unraveled by the Supreme Being (Brahm) himself. In fact, the whole of Cantos 5 and 6 of this Upanishad are dedicated to this philosophy of Sankhya Shastra.

Other Upanishads where it is explicitly referred are the following—(i) Krishna Yajur Veda’s Varaaha Upanishad, Canto 2, verse no. 55, and Canto 4, verse no. 35; Pran Agnihotra, verse no. 1. (ii) Shukla Yajur Veda’s Brihad Aranyak Upanishad, Canto 2, Brahmin 5, verse no. 14; Mantriko-panishad, verse no. 14. (iii) Atharva Veda—Sita Upanishad, verse no. 33; Annapurna Upanishad, Canto 5, verse nos. 49-50.

It was propagated by Kapil’s disciple Aasuri, and then by the latter’s disciple Pancha-shikaa.

This philosophy accepts only three basic yardsticks or valid sources of knowledge—viz. ‘Pratakshya’ or direct perception or cognition of anything such as directly seeing a thing for one’s self, ‘Anumaan’ or implied knowledge or deduction of anything entails inference of something based on some other first hand knowledge, and ‘Shabda’ or the word affirming this knowledge which is like a testimony of some witness or any dependable source.

So this philosophy adopts the approach of reaching the unknown from what is known. It has reduced all that can be experienced in this world to two fundamental units of creation—the Purush (the Supreme Being; Brahm; cosmic Self) and Prakriti (Nature; the invisible matrix of all forms of natures and temperaments that characterize this creation). The basic argument of this philosophy is that ‘nothing can be produced from nothing’. In other words, if the creation has come into being, then there must be something that pre-dates this present creation. If this creation is the effect of some past deed, then obviously there must have some occasion when certain deed was done which resulted in the present. It states that ‘Karya (the result) pre-existed (had a truthful existence) in the Kaaran (the cause of the result)’. Suppose we have an earthen lamp. This lamp, made of clay or mud, was inherently present in the un-moulded lump of clay or mud before it was shaped. Had it not been so, the clay or mud could not have been moulded into the shape of the lamp.

When this argument is applied to the experience of the world, one observes that there are three basic qualities exhibited by all things—one that gives pleasure and happiness, the other which is just the opposite, and the third which does not effect us at all, i.e. we remain neutral to it. Sankhya philosophy states that there are three ‘Gunas’ or basic virtues and qualities in creation which determine these three responses as well as the characters of things which evince these responses. These three Gunas are Sata which produce positive responses of happiness and bliss, Raja which create negative response of pain and sufferings, and Tama which generates neither.

In more physical terms, Sata Guna means pure and holy, and it is conducive to knowledge marked by these characteristics. The Raja Guna produces desires and ambitions which create restlessness in their wake. Tama Guna is meanest of them all, for it creates a tendency for resistance and inactivity. A man having the Tama Guna in excess would not do anything himself and neither would he allow others to do their duties.

It should be noted here that there is a situation when all these three Gunas can theatrically exist in perfect balance—this situation is the ideal situation and is synonymous with Prakriti at the cosmic level. This Prakriti, therefore, becomes perfectly ‘neutral’ and self centered; it is the perfect example of grossness because it remains in a state of perpetual coma or paralysis because of this balance. It is when this perfect balance is disturbed that it starts stretching and yawning like a man waking up from a deep slumber.

An example would illustrate. An electrolyte works when there is a difference of potential between the two electrodes—i.e. the cathode and the anode. A neutral solution having the same electrodes dipped in it would not perform the function of electrolysis.

On the other hand, the Purush is the cosmic Consciousness or the Atma or cosmic Soul.

The ‘evolution of the creation’ starts when a union is established between this Purush known as ‘Brahm’ who is pure cosmic Consciousness and the most sublime aspect of creation, and ‘Prakriti’ or cosmic Nature which is Brahm’s grosser aspect.

There arises a question here. Brahm or the Purush is neutral and absolutely unattached to anything, while Prakriti is gross and lifeless. How is their cooperation possible? Well this is illustrated by the example of a physically handicapped but intelligent man who has lost the leg and cannot walk, and a blind man who cannot see but can walk. The blind can carry the lame on his back, and under the latter’s guidance, can reach the destination. In this mutual cooperative way they both fulfil their desires and obligations.

It is a spontaneous cooperation and flows naturally. It is like the case of milk flowing from the udder of a cow when she sees its calf.

Now let us move to the next step and see how the creation evolved from the Purush or Brahm.

From Brahm (or Purush), the first entity that was created is Prakriti (the cosmic or primary Nature). It ought to be noted here that there are two levels in creation, viz. the ‘macrocosmic level’ that is all encompassing but invisible and subtle, and the ‘microcosmic level’ at the level of the visible aspect of creation, such as the individual creature, that is gross. At the cosmic level we have Brahm also known as the ‘Purush’ or the cosmic Male, and Prakriti, which is its other half, the Mother Nature.

The word ‘Prakriti’ at the cosmic level means Mother Nature, and it includes all that exists in this physical world, such as the entire animal and plant kingdom as well as the numerous variations in the landscape that forms a part of the physical world. On the other hand, at the microcosmic level it means individual’s primary ‘nature’ or his fundamental inclinations, basic or inherent features, qualities, characters etc. that distinguish one person from another. But the underlying principles remain the same and are applicable at both the subtle level as well as the gross level.

Now, since Sankhya Shastra deals with evolution of the ‘living world’, it postulates that the ‘nature’ of the entire living world, i.e. its ‘Prakriti’, is governed by the mixing of the three basic ‘Gunas’ or fundamental qualities in creation, viz. Sata Guna, Raja Guna and Tama Guna, in various permutation and combination.

It ought to be noted here that ‘Sata Guna’ stands for all that is pure and good; ‘Raja Guna’ stands for activity that expresses dynamic energy to do something; and ‘Tama Guna’ indicates inactivity and everything that opposes the Sata and Raja Gunas.

The first product of this mixing of the Gunas at the macrocosmic level of Prakriti (Mother Nature) is the 'Buddhi' (the cosmic intellect). From that comes into being 'Ahankar' (cosmic ego; the individualism marked by the word "I" or "Me").

From the 'Satvic Guna' part of Ahankar emerged the 'Mana' (the cosmic mind) + the five 'Gyan Indris' (the five organs of knowledge or perception—viz. eye, ear, nose, tongue and skin) + the five 'Karma Indris' (the five organs of action—viz. hand, leg, mouth, excretory and genital).

From the 'Tama Guna' part of Ahankar emerged the five 'Tanmatras' (the five subtle perceptions of sight, hearing, smell, taste and feeling), and from these further developed the five 'Bhuts' or grosser elements (such as the sky, air, fire, water and earth).

Therefore, we have the following cosmic Primary Elements of creation—

1 Prakriti (Nature) + 1 Buddhi (mind with its intellect quotient) + 1 Ahankar (ego and pride of individualism) + 1 Mana (mind with its emotional quotient) + 5 Gyan Indris (5 organs of perception—eye, ear, nose, tongue and skin) + 5 Karma Indris (5 organs of action—hand, leg, mouth, excretory and genital) + 5 Tanmatras (5 subtle perceptions of sight, hearing, smell, taste and feeling) + 5 Bhuts (such as the sky, air, fire, water and earth) = Total 24 'primary elements of creation', or 'primary units of creation' or 'principles of creation'.

However, if we add the very first manifestation of Brahm (which is the cosmic all-pervading Consciousness and the primary basis of all that exists) in the form of 'Purush', the cosmic Male aspect of Brahm, then the total comes to 24 + 1 = 25.

Here it is to be noted that the difference between Brahm and Purush is only in the matter of degree of subtlety—for 'Brahm', being without any attributes and the pure cosmic Consciousness that prevails in this creation, is the subtlest entity of creation, while the 'Purush' is a slight more grosser form of Brahm because it has the character of being a 'Male' as opposed to Brahm which is 'neutral'.

This inclusion of 'Brahm' or the 'cosmic Absolute Truth' or the 'cosmic pure Consciousness', albeit as 'Purush' as one of the 'first and primary of the elements' of creation, without which the rest of the elements won't exist or become redundant to begin with, fits in very well with the primary definition of Sankhya Shastra. The word 'Sankhya' means 'number' as well as a 'comprehensive knowledge', which incidentally is also the purpose of the 'Shastra' or a body of knowledge. Therefore, that knowledge that teaches the ultimate "Truth" of creation is known as 'Sankhy Shastra'.

There is another version as to what constitutes the twenty-five Tattvas. They are the following—1 Purush (the primal cosmic Male; the Viraat Purush), 1 Prakriti (primal Nature), 1 Mahtattva (the powerful Buddhi or intellect), 1 Ahankar (ego, pride), 1 Mana (mind), 5 organs of perception (i.e. the eye, nose, ear, tongue and skin), 5 organs of action (i.e. the hand, leg, mouth, excretory and genitals), 5 perceptions (such as the spoken word or speech, sight, smell, touch and taste), 5 Bhuts (i.e. the five primary elements, the earth, water, fire, air and space or sky) = 25.

The above unfolding of the creation and its fundamental elements is at the 'macrocosmic level'. The same process is followed to interpret the evolution at the microcosmic level—the level of the individual creature.

So we have the origin of the cosmos from Brahm, the 'Supreme Being' who created the macrocosmic first Male called 'Purush' who was Brahm's image, and his female counterpart, the 'Prakriti' (Mother Nature). Their union—or the bringing together of Brahm and Prakriti, the cooperation between them—became the basic cause of this vast and myriad creation coming into being. The individual male and female creatures, or all living beings for that matter, had evolved from this union.

In other words, the individual creatures therefore were the ‘microcosmic forms’ of the Purush and the Prakriti that existed at the ‘macrocosmic level of creation’.

The result of the union of Purush and Prakriti were the following entities in this sequence—‘Buddhi’ (intelligence, wisdom, mind), ‘Ahankar’ (pride, ego), the mind-heart complex called the ‘Mana’, the five perceptions (of smell, hearing, touch, taste and sight) together forming the “subtle body” of the creature, the five Bhuts or elements (space, wind, fire, water, earth from which the gross body was moulded), the ten sense organs (five organs of perception—ear, nose, tongue, eye and skin, and five organs of action—hand, leg, mouth, anus and genitals), which together formed the “gross body” of the creature, the individual creature’s Atma (pure consciousness that represents Brahm, the cosmic Consciousness) and its Prakriti (the ‘nature’ of the individual creature that corresponds to the cosmic Prakriti with the three Gunas affecting its primary character) both of which are invisible and subtle.

Therefore, according to this interpretation, we have 1 Purush + 1 Prakriti + 1 Buddhi + 1 Ahankar + 1 Mana + 5 Perceptions + 5 Bhuts + 10 Indris (5 sense organs of perception and 5 of action) = 25 Principal Elements at the macrocosmic level of creation. All these elements are invisible and subtle by nature.

At the level of the individual creature who has a visible gross body, the same elements exist in their grosser form and with a slight variation as follows—

1 Atma (or soul of the individual creature representing Brahm or Purush) + 1 Nature (or the individual’s unique character representing Prakriti) + 1 Buddhi + 1 Ahankar + 1 Mana + 5 Perceptions + 5 Bhuts (that moulds the creature’s gross body) + 10 Indris (5 sense organs of perception and 5 of action) = 25 Principal Elements at the microcosmic level of creation.

It further postulates that Brahm created Nature (cosmos) because it allowed itself to be covered or mired by the three Gunas—‘Sata’ meaning righteousness and virtuousness which are the best and noblest of qualities, ‘Raja’ meaning worldly passions and desires which are the medium or mediocre qualities leading to worldly desires, and ‘Tama’ meaning evils, sins and other mean mentalities leading to perversions and vices. The Purush, though he remains aloof, still gets shackled or attached to Prakriti, the creation, because of these three Gunas which act as ropes or strings that tie him down. This fact has been very stated in Shwetashwatar Upanishad, 5/10-12 and 6/10.

Breaking one’s habits is tantamount to liberation and deliverance from this bondage, and it is called Mukti. The three Gunas are the causes of the myriad temperaments, natures, thought patterns and behaviours of all the creatures, because they have all these three qualities or virtues in them, though they vary in ratio or proportion. These three Gunas are also present in Mother Nature, giving rise to a populace which is so varied and diametrically opposite to each other, even virtually getting at each other’s throat, because of the infinite possibilities created by their mixing in different proportions to mould the innate nature, inclinations and temperaments of a creature.

This school of philosophy says that there are five elementary ‘Bhuts’ in this creation—they are the earth, water, fire, wind and space which, in different permutations and combinations, form all the creatures who have a gross body. A creature, it says, has eleven organs— five organs of perception (ears, nose, eyes, tongue and skin), five organs of action (hands, legs, mouth, anus and genitals) and one organ called the Mana (mind and heart).

According to Mahopanishad, 1/4 – 6 of Sam Veda tradition, these twenty-five elements or Tattwas are the following—five organs of perception (ear, nose, tongue, eye, skin) + five organs of action (hand, leg, mouth, genitals, excretory) + one Mana (mind) + one Ahankar (ego, pride, arrogance) + one Pran (the vital life-giving breath; the essential vibrations of life; the rhythm and essential functions pertaining to life) + one Atma (soul) + one Buddhi (intelligence, wisdom, discrimination) + five Perceptions (sight, smell, hearing, taste, touch) + five Bhuts (earth, water, fire, air, space) = twenty-five elements.

The Annapurna Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition, Canto 5, verse nos. 49-50 assert that those ascetics who see only one non-dual entity known as the supreme transcendental Brahm or cosmic Consciousness in this ever-changing and multifarious creation are the ones who are truly knowledgeable of the essence of the Sankhya Shastra. Now let us what these verses say—“Verse no. 49 = An ascetic who regularly practices only one type of spiritual philosophy symbolized by practicing only one type of Samadhi, and is steady and diligent in it—only such a wise and enlightened ascetic is able to expunge all other philosophies from his mental horizon, only he can prevent his mind from being confused and confounded about what to do and what to avoid. He can focus his efforts and attention on his chosen path more effectively, and walk this path more stridently and confidently, overcoming all hurdles that may occur.

[The term ‘Samadhi’ broadly means to remain focused on the pure consciousness and to live in a plane of existence that is known as transcendental. When in this state, the person is unaware of the world and the body, along with any of their activities. Here it implies that a man who does not waver or remain wobbly by being uncertain of the veracity, the truthfulness and the effectiveness of the philosophy he is practicing, who does not keep oscillating between this and that as he is unable to decide what to do and what not to, who is certain as to what is true and what is false, and what his goal in life is, and who is certain and convinced of himself and the philosophy he practices—it is only such a man who can ever expect to succeed in his endeavour in any field in this world, whether mundane, secular or spiritual.

In other words, a spiritual aspirant must be of a firm and stabilized mind in order to realise his spiritual goals. An undecided, fluctuating and vicissitudinous mind which is a victim of confusion and perplexities can never ever lead the aspirant steadily to his spiritual goal. And what is this goal? It is to realise the truth of the Atma, the truth that comes with self-realisation that requires a focused mind and great diligence, the truth that, in its finer and higher forms, is equivalent to Brahm-realisation, and which translates into his final spiritual Mukti or Moksha (i.e. his spiritual liberation, deliverance, emancipation and salvation). He obtains freedom from all fetters representing delusions and ignorance that tie his soul down and shackle it to this world and the body. A freed creature enjoys bliss, beatitude and felicity; he enjoys happiness, ecstasy and contentedness that come when one has finally reached his desired goal or destination which had eluded him for generations. This is the fruition of Samadhi.]

Such a wise and enlightened man realises the essence to which the Sankhya philosophy of Hinduism refers to is only ‘one’ and ‘non-dual’, and not many and varied. [He realises that the spiritual Truth known as ‘consciousness’ is only one and not two or more though the Sankhya philosophy refers to Tattwas or essential elements as being twenty-five in number.]

An ascetic who has known this secret is indeed not an ordinary man, but a highly attained and enlightened soul. He is 'living being' who has understood the truth of 'life' in a truthful manner. [In other words, he is not to be identified with a gross body now, but with the 'living Atma' that resides inside this body. Realisation or awareness of this 'truth' of life is a true form of wisdom and enlightenment.] (49).

“verse no. 50 = Those great ascetics who have successfully controlled their various vital winds by diligently following the principles of Yoga (meditation), and have consequentially attained the high stature of self-realisation when they have experienced the glory and radiance of the consciousness residing inside their own self as their Atma—such ascetics become free from all diseases (both physical as well as spiritual), and attain a divine state of being (existence) which has no beginning or end (because they would have activated their dormant cosmic energy and shifted the focus of their identity from being that of the gross and perishable body that has a limit scope, to that of the Atma which is subtle, sublime, eternal, infinite and imperishable).

Such realised and acclaimed ascetics are renowned as being those who are truly expert in the knowledge of the Sankhya Shastra, as those who have truthfully understood the meaning of this school of Indian philosophy (50).

A related philosophy is known as Sankhya Yoga. This philosophy is a combination of Sankhya philosophy and Yoga philosophy. In Shwetashwatar Upanishad 6/13 it is stated that the Supreme Being can be known by the means of 'Sankhya Yoga', i.e. by an intelligent fusion of 'Sankhya' and 'Yoga'.

This philosophy is narrated in Srimad Bhagwat Maha-puran, Skandha (Chapter) 11, Sarga (Canto) 24.

The second chapter of Bhagvata Gita is also called Sankhya Yoga. Now, let us analyse this word. It has two parts—viz. 'Sankhya' meaning learning and knowledge, and 'Yoga' meaning a union, a conjunction, a fusion. Elsewhere, e.g. 5/5, this word has been used to signify 'Gyan' and 'Karma' or a conjunction of knowledge and the philosophy of doing deed. The 'Praanaagni-hotra Upanishad', 1, uses this word to mean 'intense thinking, deep contemplation or deep insight'. It is also, therefore, synonymous with 'Gyan Yoga' or the great concentration and diligent divergence of all energies of the creature to acquire truthful knowledge of the Truth and Reality behind what is apparent but not the whole truth, and what is not apparent at all.

These two paths are not separate, independent and distinct from one another. They are like the two legs by which one walks. The word Yoga also means to bring about a union between two entities, to create a synergy between the mundane and the spiritual. Here it refers to the union between the Atma and the Brahm, or the coordination of various elements of the creature's body so that congenial atmosphere conducive to spiritual upliftment and enlightenment is created for the realisation of the true nature of the 'self', which would mean realisation of the presence of Brahm inside the very own self of the seeker. To bring this about, deep concentration of mind is needed along with the focusing of all the energies of the body in one single pursuit; this is meditation and contemplation.

The word Sankhya Yoga therefore means a combination of both the eclectic values of Sankhya philosophy and that of Yoga. Hence, that which brings about a fusion or union between the known and the unknown, that which establishes a coordination between the creature's individual world and the cosmic world of the pure consciousness, that which brings the Atma, the pure 'self' of the creature close to the supreme 'Self' of the cosmos, that which links and ultimately brings about a merger of the single unit with its parent body, and that which helps in the creature's final liberation from the vicious cycle of birth and death, is called Sankhya Yoga.

Now the question arises how is this brought about? The answer is in the following the manifold path of Yoga besides acquisition of knowledge as expounded and espoused in the Upanishads. Yoga has basically two connotations—viz. (1) meditation and contemplation which aim in harnessing all the energy and potentials at the disposal of the creature and diverting them and concentrating them on one single goal chosen by the practitioner of Yoga; and (b) following other methods of achieving this aim as laid down in the scriptures dealing with Yoga.

There are four paths of Yoga—(i) Gyan Yoga, (ii) Bhakti Yoga, (iii) Karma Yoga and (iv) Raj Yoga.

(i) Gyan Yoga involves the intellect and mind to determine and delineate the true and the false; it helps to access and understand the reality and falsehood behind the manifested visible world which appears to be 'real' but is actually like a 'shadow of the truth'. This Gyan Yoga helps to establish the mind firmly into seeing unity in diversity. Those following Gyan Yoga are called 'seers' because they can 'see' beyond the visible, multifarious and bewildering variety of this false world. Gyan Yoga is in the realm of the intellect and discriminating mind of a creature.

(ii) Bhakti Yoga refers to having devotion for a chosen Godhead who is a person's ideal, on whom he showers all his adoration, and on whom he focuses his attention. He is emotionally and sentimentally involved with his deity. Hence, the heart is the realm of Bhakti Yoga; it helps to commune with the divine.

(iii) Karma Yoga expounds on the importance of doing deeds and taking actions, but with a different attitude. It stresses that we must not get 'involved or attached' to those deeds or action in as much as we shouldn't be bothered about the rewards or punishments incumbent on such deeds or actions. We must do them dispassionately and with detachment. The action or deed should be treated as one's offering to the God as well as an offering to the sacred fire sacrifice. This will ensure that the actions or deeds are not unrighteousness, corrupt or evil. On the contrary, whatever is done in which a person's subtle sub-conscious says is not the correct thing to do will be deemed to be unrighteous, unethical and unlawful, and therefore cannot be an offering to either the God or the sacred fire sacrifice.

(iv) Raj Yoga is the psycho-spiritual practice of exercise and breath control; it involves the various steps involved in meditation and contemplation, as is generally understood by the term Yoga. This Yoga lays emphasis on physical training of the body and the mind, and is the subject matter of numerous Upanishads dealing with such exercises (e.g. Yog Chudamani of Sam Veda). It deals with such subjects as Pranayam, purification and activation of Naadis, kindling of Chakras (subtle energy centers in the body) etc.

These four types of Yogas are not mutually exclusive; they coalesce and overlap with each other and their main aim is to help the aspirant seeker in his pursuit of 'self-realisation'.

There is another platform of Yoga as propounded by the greatest exponent of this philosophy, i.e. sage Patanjali. According to him, Yoga consists of eight-fold path. These are briefly the following—(1) 'Yam' or self restraint; (2) 'Niyam' or observance of certain sacrosanct rules; (3) 'Asan' or postures for meditation; (4) 'Pranayam' or breath control exercises for purification of the body and mind; (5) 'Pratyahar' or withdrawal of the mind and its control; (6) 'Dhaarna' or having a firm conviction, faith and belief on the sanctity and truthfulness of the chosen path; (7) 'Dhyan' or contemplation and concentration of the faculties of the mind and intellect; and (8) 'Samadhi' or a perpetual trance-like state in which the aspirant loses all awareness of the external world and even himself, and remains perpetually in meditation. These eight-fold path of Yoga have been listed in Varaaha Upanishad, canto 5, verse no. 11—11 ½ of the Krishana Yajur Veda tradition.

The Mandal Brahmin Upanishad of the Shukla Yajur Veda tradition describes these terms in detail in its Brahman (canto) 1, section 1, verse nos. 3-10.]

In spite of living a householder's life and getting involved in the process of procreation and expansion of the resultant creation, and then taking care of it and making proper arrangements for its smooth functioning, the couple remained internally detached from all external things. They were not tempted by the countless attractions and charms of sensual objects, or the pleasures and comforts of this material world.

By-and-by, as time passed and days advanced, they approached their old age which corresponded to the fourth quarter of any person's life-span, when they realized and regretted that their whole life had been spent without devoting it to Lord Hari's Bhakti (exclusively devoting one's time in worshipping the Lord, offering prayers to him, leading a pious life of renunciation and detachment, and having devotion for the Lord as the only aim of life—"janama gaya'u haribhagati binu")<sup>1</sup>. This filled the couple with great remorse, and they now decided to find an immediate remedy for it. (Sortha no. 142)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>What is the importance of Bhakti which made Manu and Satrupa so regretful and full of remorse that they could not practice it while remaining engaged in the affairs of the world?

The answer is found in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 35; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 45; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 84; (iv) Doha no. 114-b; (v) Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 115; (vi) Doha no. 119 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-10 that precede it; (vii) Doha no. 122 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede it.

Lord Ram has asserted that the best fruit that a tree symbolized by a human body is to have the virtue of devotion for Lord God—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 43—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 45.]

Having decided that enough was enough, and that they would spend the remaining part of their lives in spiritual pursuit and devotion for Lord Hari, the pious king (Manu) abdicated the throne and transferred all royal powers and duties to his son (Uttaanpaad, the elder son) much against the latter's wishes.

Thence, he went to the forest along with his wife (Satrupa) (to lead an austere life of a hermit, doing penances and spending time on spiritual matters)<sup>1</sup>. (1)

They went on a pilgrimage and headed to a famous holy place called Naimisharanya<sup>2</sup>. This pilgrim site is considered as the holiest and is conducive to spiritual practices, for it bestows success to an individual in his or her spiritual pursuit. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>According to Hindu scriptures, a person's life is divided into four quarters.

The first quarter is called 'Brahmacharya Ashram' when he leads a celibate life studying and acquiring knowledge to prepare himself for the world.

The second quarter is called 'Grihastha Ashram' when he marries, raises a family, involves himself in household affairs such as looking after business and other financial matters, and in general expands his family's prosperity and good name.

The third quarter is called 'Vanprastha Ashram' when he is expected to hand over the affairs of his household and world to his heir(s), and move out of his home to go to the forest ('Vana') to do penance and austerity. But in practical terms, during this quarter the person would first prefer to go on a pilgrimage which he had deferred all his life due to household responsibilities, after completing which he would enter the fourth stage.

The last and the fourth quarter of life is called 'Sanyas Ashram', which means a phase of life when a person completely renounces all his relationships with the world and spends his time in meditation, contemplation, doing penances, and in general thinking of nothing else but Lord God in preparation for the final exit from this mortal world.

It is in this 'fourth quarter' that king Manu and Satrupa decided to completely detached themselves from the world and go to the forest to do Tapa (penances and austerity).

So therefore, the pious king abdicated the throne and handed over the royal duties to his eldest son Uttaanpaad.

<sup>2</sup>Naimisharanya: It is situated in the district of Sitapur in the present-day state of Uttar Pradesh in India, and lies geographically on the right bank of the river Gomti. There are three legends associated with this holy place as follows:

(a) According to Varaaha Puran, a sage named Gaurmukha had burnt to death a giant army of demons in a very short period of time called a 'Nimish', i.e. a matter of minutes. Hence, the place came to be known as 'Naimisharanya'.

(b) According to Devi Bhagwat Mahapuran, when the great sages were very scared by the ferocity of Kaliyug and asked the creator Brahma for advice, the latter gave them a mystical wheel, telling them that they should follow the wheel from behind, and when the rim of the wheel falls on the ground, they must deem that place to be auspicious, for Kaliyug won't have its negative influences thereabouts, and it is there that they can continue with their spiritual practices, such as doing sacrifices and penances, unhindered. It is at this place that the great sage Suta (the parrot sage who was the son of the legendary sage Veda Vyas who had classified the Vedas and codified their philosophy in the form of the Upanishads, and had also written the 18 Mahapurans, as well as Srīmad Bhagvad) had collected all the sages and saints to narrate the story of the Mahabharat.

(c) According to Vishnu Puran, one can wash off his sins by bathing in river Gomti at this place.

Now, why did king Manu and his queen choose Naimisharanya over other pilgrim places? The answer is that in Sata-Yuga (the first era of the 4-era cycle of one cycle of creation and destruction), Naimisharanya was considered as the best place for doing Tapa; in the second era called Treta-Yuga, it was a place called Pushkar (located in the present-day state of Rajasthan); in Dwapar-Yuga, it was a place called Kurushetra (where the great Mahabharat war was fought); and in Kali-Yuga, the bank of the holy river Ganges is regarded as the purest and the best place to do spiritual practices.]

pahumcē jā'i dhēnumati tīrā. haraṣi nahānē niramala nīrā. 5.

At this holy place (i.e. Naimisharanya) abided a large community of great sages and saints who were successful in their spiritual fields. It is there that king Manu headed with joy in his heart. (3)

While he moved ahead steadily on his path with a confident gait, he displayed stability of mind and determination of heart, which lent him a halo that was most admirable, giving an impression that he personified the twin virtues of Gyan (gnosis, enlightenment, self-realisation and truthful knowledge) and Bhakti (devotion for Lord God) in his form<sup>1</sup>. (4)

In due course of time, he reached the banks of river Gomti (dhēnumati tīrā). Then, he cheerfully took a bath in the river<sup>2</sup>. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>King Manu, as we have already read, was a very righteous king, who lived life in accordance with the laws of Dharma, upholding all its tenets, carrying on his duties diligently while remaining free from worldly temptations. At the same time, he never forgot his aim of life, which was to pursue devotion for Lord Hari. This means the king was a wise, enlightened and self-realised soul, as well as one who was pious and devoted to Lord God. Apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 142 along with Chaupai line nos. 2 and 8 that precede it.

<sup>2</sup>This was done by the couple, king Manu and queen Satrupa, to refresh themselves after a long journey, and also to observe the custom that when one visits a holy place situated near a river, one ought to first take a purifying bath in it before doing any other thing. We shall read in due course of time that when Lord Ram was on his way to the forest with his wife Sita and brother Laxman, and came to the bank of a river, the Lord took a bath in it and offered prayers—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 103 (river Ganges); (ii) Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 106 (at Prayag, the confluence of three rivers, Ganges, Yamuna and Saraswati).]

No sooner did the news spread of the arrival of the sage-king (nṛpariṣi) who was famed for his noble life and adherence to the laws of Dharma in all its respects, than all the sages and mystics who lived there (at Naimisharanya) came to meet him and pay their regards to the pious couple (Manu and Satrupa)<sup>1</sup>. (6)

The sages accompanied the king and took him around to all the holy places in the vicinity, advising him to pay his respects at each of them. (7)

Meanwhile, the king became thin in his body as he began observing strict austerities. He wore clothes like that of a hermit, and spent his time listening to religious discourses in the company of sages and saints<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Manu was not an ordinary visitor; he was a renowned king of his time. So, as soon as the news spread of his arrival, all the sages, saints, mystics and hermits who lived in Naimisharanya came to call on him. After formalities were over, some of them took him around all the holy places in the vicinity and guided him through the rituals offered at each of these places.

We would read in our story of Ram Charit Manas that when Lord Ram arrived at Chitrakoot, his temporary residence in the forest, all great sages as well as the forest-dwelling tribal people had come to meet the Lord and pay their respects to him. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 133—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 137.

They developed great devotion and affection for the holy lotus-like feet of Lord Vasudeo in their Mana (mind and heart)<sup>2</sup>. (Doha no. 143.)

Sage Narad had advised Dhruv to use this Mantra to please Lord Vishnu when Dhruv did Tapa (penance). Refer: Vishnu Puran, Part 1, Canto 11, verse nos. 55-56.

<sup>2</sup>To wit, as time passed, the two enjoyed worshipping Lord Vishnu and offering their obeisance at the holy feet of the Lord. Their devotion and affection for the Lord increased day-by-day, and they employed the twelve-letter Mantra to meditate and focus their attention on the Lord.]

karahim ahāra sāka phala kandā. sumirahim brahma saccidānandā. 1.
puni hari hētu karana tapa lāgē. bāri adhāra mūla phala tyāgē. 2.

Surviving by eating leafy vegetables, fruits and edible roots, they (Manu and Satrupa) did meditation and constantly remembered Brahm (the Supreme Being) who is a personified form of eternal consciousness, truth and bliss (brahma saccidānandā). (1)

After practicing the above austerity as a first step in their spiritual pursuit, they moved on to the next phase of doing Tapa by increasing its severity, with the objective of pleasing Lord Hari. During the second phase, they abandoned eating roots and fruits, and survived solely by drinking water.<sup>1</sup> (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In this context, we ought to recall how Parvati, the divine consort of Lord Shiva, had done her Tapa as narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 74.

When we compare the Tapa done by Parvati with that being done by Manu and Satrupa as described in these verses as well as the verses that will follow herein below, we will find quite a similarity between the two.]

 sambhu biranči biṣṇu bhagavānā. upajahiṁ jāsū ansa tēṁ nānā. 6.

Deep in their hearts they had a strong desire to have a divine view of that Supreme Lord who is --- (3)

--- Without any attributes, who cannot be subjected to divisions, who is eternal and infinite, who has no beginning nor an end. He is the Lord who is mediated upon by those who are enlightened, self-realised, learned in the principles of metaphysics, and are well-versed in spiritual matters. (4)

Verily, even the Vedas can't define or describe him in entirety, and so they suffice by saying "Neti-Neti", i.e. not this not that<sup>1</sup>. The Lord remains ever blissful as he is the supreme cosmic Consciousness itself personified. He has no comparisons, and is beyond application of any epithets that can be aptly applied to him. (5)

He (i.e. Brahm) is the supreme Creator of this creation, and even the Trinity Gods consisting of Lord Shiva (the concluder), Brahma (the creator) and Vishnu (the sustainer of this physical world), as all other entities in this creation, are born from a fraction of that supreme Creator<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The Vedas tried their best to describe Brahm and his glories and attributes, but there was still much left to be said. They failed to present an exhaustive picture of Brahm who is an embodiment of cosmic Consciousness. So finally the Vedas surrendered, saying: 'If we say that Brahm has such and such attributes or qualities, or if we try to define Brahm by use of words we know, then it is certain that we would only scratch the tip of the iceberg, so to say, for much would be left untouched, and much more is not even known to us. So we cannot say conclusively that what we define as Brahm by using any given set of attributes is an exhaustive view of Brahm, and yet what we say is Brahm with those particular attributes is not wrong either. To wit, no one can define Brahm exclusively and exhaustively.'

<sup>2</sup>According to the philosophy of the Upanishads, everything in existence is a manifestation of Brahm. Nothing exists in this creation which is not one or the other form of Brahm.

The three Gods of the Trinity are the same Brahm playing different roles. As Brahma he carries out the role of creation; as Vishnu he takes care of the world; and as Shiva he brings an end to everything, to start afresh.]

This Lord is the one who is very kind towards his devotees so much so that it is for the devotee's sake he would have no second thoughts to assume any form the devotee wishes him to take, and then do many charming deeds that would fascinate the devotee<sup>1</sup>. (7)

If this assertion of the Vedas is really true, then we (Manu and Satrupa) are sure that the Lord would also honour our wishes. (8)

ēhi bidhi bītē baraṣa ṣaṭa sahasa bāri āhāra.
sambata sapta sahasra puni rahē samīra adhāra. 144.

In this way, by drinking only water to survive, the couple continued to do Tapa for six thousand years. After that, during the next phase of Tapa (which was the third) they survived only on air (i.e. they survived by just breathing in fresh air as they discarded even drinking water for survival). (Doha no. 144)

चौ०. बरष सहस दस त्यागेउ सोऊ । ठाढ़े रहे एक पद दोऊ ॥ १ ॥
बिधि हरि हर तप देखि अपारा । मनु समीप आए बहु बारा ॥ २ ॥
मागहु बर बहु भाँति लोभाए । परम धीर नहिं चलहिं चलाए ॥ ३ ॥

caupā'ī.

baraṣa sahasa dasa tyāgē'u sō'ū. ṭhāṛhē rahē ēka pada dō'ū. 1.
bidhi hari hara tapa dēkhi apārā. manu samīpa ā'ē bahu bārā. 2.
māgahu bara bahu bhāmṭi lōbhā'ē. parama dhīra nahim calahim calā'ē. 3.

Then, stepping up their penances, they (Manu and Satrupa) stopped taking in air as well for the next ten thousand years, and all the while stood on one leg<sup>1</sup>. (1)

The Gods of the Trinity, i.e. Brahma the creator, Hari (Vishnu) the sustainer and protector, and Har (Shiva) the concluder of this creation, were highly impressed by their Tapa, and they appeared before the pious couple many times (to request them to seek what they wished to have as boons, and stop such severe penances). (2)

These three Gods repeatedly asked them (Manu and Satrupa) to seek boons of their choice, but the couple was unmoved with such temptations, for they remained steady in their Tapa and focused to achieve the higher aim for which they had started their penances in the first place<sup>2</sup>. (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It will be observed that this marks the fourth of their Tapa. Previously they had first relied on fruits, edible roots and leafy vegetables for survival, then discarded them and started drinking water only, then relied only by breathing air—i.e. they stopped eating or drinking anything at all.

This way, they gradually increased the severity of their Tapa in a step-by-step manner, which also helped them to sufficiently acclimatize their bodies to withstand the severity of the last phase when they stopped even breathing in air to survive. It was possible because by this time their bodies had become so thin and reduced to a skeleton (refer verse no. 4 herein below) that they needed no support to remain standing in a single posture like statues. This was the height of Tapa. Imagine: can we modern humans ever even think of doing it even in our wildest of dreams? But yes, it was possible in that era because we must keep in mind also that we are talking about Sata-Yuga, an era when it was common, and possible as well, to practice such severe Tapa without much difficulty—because people of that era practiced great austerities and exemplary self-control over their sense organs that empowered them with stupendous energy and dynamism that is inherent to the ‘consciousness’ that lived inside their bodies. This inherent power of the ‘consciousness’ is there today too, but unfortunately it is dissipated by us due to our indulgences and reckless waste of this energy in pursuit of the world and the temptations of its material charms which drains away and exhausts the dynamism of the Spirit.

<sup>2</sup>And what was their aim? The answer is that they wished to have a direct communion with Brahm, the Supreme Being who is the supreme Lord of the creation including these Gods of the Trinity—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-8 that precede Doha no. 144.

As we shall read shortly, Manu and Satrupa were successful in their endeavour, as Brahm would reveal himself before them. What lesson do we learn from this episode? It is that when we finally fix a target in life, we must remain steadily focused on it and move forward to realize it, but we must, at the same time, be on guard not to get distracted by so many diversions and temptations that may come in our way. Success will not be easy; it may require great personal sacrifices. But resilience and faith and belief in ourselves pay at the end of the day. We must not lose courage and hope.]

प्रभु सर्बग्य दास निज जानी । गति अनन्य तापस नृप रानी ॥ ५ ॥
मागु मागु बरु भै नभ बानी । परम गभीर कृपामृत सानी ॥ ६ ॥ asthimātra hō'i rahē sarīrā. tadapi manāga manahirṁ nahirṁ pīrā. 4.

prabhu sarbagya dāsa nija jānī. gati anan'ya tāpasa nrpa rānī. 5.
māgu māgu baru bhai nabha bānī. parama gabhīra kṛpāmṛta sānī. 6.

Their bodies were reduced to being mere skeleton of bones, yet they had no regret or remorse. [To wit, they did not lose courage and hope.] (4)

The Supreme Lord (Brahm) is all-knowing, so he could see the sincerity and faith of the pious couple and understand what was in their heart. The Lord realized that the king (Manu) and his queen (Satrupa) were truly his devotees, and were matchless in their commitment to him. (5)

So finally, being moved by their faith, devotion, sincerity and commitment, the Lord spoke in the form of an invisible voice that was heard in the sky. This voice was deep and grave, and it resounded in the sky (like a rumble of an approaching cloud). It said: 'Ask, ask for any boon you two wish to have'<sup>1</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When Brahma, Vishnu and Shiva appeared before Manu and Satrupa and asked them to seek boons as said in verse nos. 2-3 herein above, they appeared in person, so they could be seen by the couple. Since the couple had wished to make a direct connect with Brahm, the Supreme Being, so they simply neglected these three gods.

But now the situation changed. Since Brahm is invisible, all-pervading and consciousness itself personified, and since the sky element is one of the myriad forms of Brahm, so when the couple heard the sky itself virtually speaking to them, for the sound seemed to come from the whole dome of the firmament above them, as if coming from all directions at once, they could easily understand that it was Brahm speaking at last.

In the earlier case of the Trinity Gods, the voice came from a particular direction where these Gods stood, but now when Brahm spoke the whole sky seemed to be speaking. It indeed would have been a fantastic experience!

Here we ought to note that whenever Brahm, the Supreme Being and the supreme Father of this creation who is a personified form of cosmic Consciousness, the Lord who had created even the Trinity of Gods*, speaks, his voice resonates throughout the sky as if the whole dome of the firmament above the earth is filled with sound waves#. {Apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, *(i) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 150; #(i) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 74; (ii) Doha no. 186.}

This is the difference between how Brahm is heard and how Lord Vishnu, who is a close resemblance of Brahm, is heard; because while the voice of Brahm fills the whole sky, the voice of Vishnu comes from a particular direction where he stands.]

मृतक जिआवनि गिरा सुहाई । श्रवन रंध्र होइ उर जब आई ॥ ७ ॥
हृष्टपुष्ट तन भए सुहाए । मानहुँ अबहिं भवन ते आए ॥ ८ ॥ mṛṭaka ji'āvani girā suhā'ī. śravana randhra hō'i ura jaba ā'ī. 7.

hraṣṭapuṣṭa tana bha'ē suhā'ē. mānahun' abahim bhavana tē ā'ē. 8.

When (the waves of) that sound, which was rejuvenating for the soul and could infuse a new life into someone who is dead, entered the ears of the couple and traveled down to their hearts --- (7),

--- It had such a miraculous effect on their bodies<sup>1</sup> that they became healthy once again as they were in the beginning of the whole exercise, making it appear that they had just arrived from home. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A fine instance of spiritualism and science going hand-in-hand. Everyone knows that sound travels in waves, and that sound waves have energy in them. It can have different names and different usage, but the basic idea that any kind of sound wave will have energy remains a universal truth. When radio or electronic signals are sent to remotely control and operate robots of any kind, whether on earth or at far away destinations such as the moon or mars, it is this energy that is primarily at play.

So, when the sound energy of the voice in the sky hit the eardrums of Manu and Satrupa, it made them vibrate. This vibration was transmitted to their head, energizing it and reactivating its sensory neurons that may have become paralysed by so long of un-use. This in turn stirred the body into activity, reviving the beating of the heart and circulation of blood in it.

The resultant effect was that the couple woke up as someone would after a period of sound sleep—fresh and rejuvenated.]

--- The form of the Lord that resides in the lake-like heart of sage Kaagbhusund<sup>4</sup>, and the Lord who has both a Saguna (visible) form as well as a Nirguna (invisible) form as affirmed and praised by the Vedas<sup>5</sup>. (5)

Oh gracious Lord who eliminates the distress and wants of those who surrender before you and seek your refuge and blessings (pranatāratī mōcana)! Be kind upon us so that we can see that form which I have outlined above.<sup>6</sup> (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-7 that precede Doha no. 48.

<sup>2</sup>This is a clear hint that the couple wished to see the divine and holy form of Lord Ram—because Lord Shiva has this form eternally enshrined in his heart$, being the greatest devotee of Lord Ram who constantly repeats the holy name of Lord Ram as his preferred Mantra (spiritual formula)*, and is also the one who had first conceived the story of Lord Ram, known as the Ram Charit Manas, in his heart#.

The Vedas have offered their prayer to Lord Ram in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chanda line nos. 1-24 that precede Doha no. 13.

<sup>6</sup>And what is the form of Lord Ram which Manu wishes to see? We can have an idea of that form from what sage Sutikshan wished to have enshrined in his heart as narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 2-20 that precede Doha no. 11. We shall come to read about it in due course of our reading when we come to that particular set of verses.]

The words of the pious couple were liked by the Lord very much as they were soaked in affection for the Lord, were very sweet and politely spoken, and pleasant to hear. (7)

However, the merciful and gracious Lord who is ever-obliging and goes out of his way to please his devotees as he invariably loves them, and who is invisibly present throughout this creation because he is all pervading and omnipresent<sup>1</sup>, finally revealed himself before the couple. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In this context, refer to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-7 that precede Doha no. 185 where Lord Shiva has reiterated this fact to the gods and mother earth when they were searching for Lord Vishnu.

To wit, the Lord is present everywhere and every moment of existence, and the only requirement to make his presence felt is to have sincere love and devotion for him. In the present case, Brahm in the form of Lord Ram revealed himself before Manu and Satrupa because this condition was fulfilled.]

The divine form of the Lord as he presented himself before the pious couple had a hue like that of a blue lotus flower, a blue gem (sapphire), and dark rain-bearing clouds<sup>1</sup>.

This form was so bewitchingly beautiful to behold that it put millions of Kamdeos (patron god of beauty) to shame. (Doha no. 146)

The Lord wore an ear-ring shaped like an alligator (or a large fish)<sup>1</sup>, and his head was adorned by a majestic crown<sup>2</sup>.

The curl of hairs of the Lord (that swayed softly as he shook his head) resembled a swarm of bees (humming around and hovering over a lotus flower symbolized by the Lord's enchanting face)<sup>3</sup>. (5)

On his chest there was a mark of sage Bhrigu's footprint<sup>4</sup>, and on his bosom dangled a wonderful garland of marigold flowers as well as other garlands made of an assortment of glittering gems<sup>5</sup>. (6)

Remember: We have, just a little while ago, read how sage Narad had vehemently cursed Lord Vishnu, but instead of feeling disgusted and angry, the Lord forgave Narad and cheerfully accepted the curse to calm down the angry sage. {Apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 137.}

The Lord was attired in a glorious robe known as 'Pitambar' that was yellow in colour and shining brilliantly<sup>1</sup>. On his abdomen there were three folds on the skin<sup>2</sup>.

His navel was so captivating for the mind and heart of the beholder as if it was a whirlpool or eddy currents in river Yamuna that would trap anyone who falls in it<sup>3</sup>. (Doha no. 147)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Vishnu is attired in a body-wrapping piece of garment made of fine yellow silk that shines in light. This cloth is called 'Pitambar'. <sup>2</sup>The three folds of skin on the abdomen imply that the Lord's body was muscular and well proportioned, and not flabby with excess of belly fat; the Lord was not pot-bellied but had a well-built muscular body. The navel present in the middle of such a muscular abdomen is compared to the whirlpool or eddy currents of river Yamuna as it attracted the attention of all those who beheld the Lord.

It ought to be noted here that such physical features and their beauty and charm as are described presently were a norm in ancient classics that narrated the Saguna or the visible form of the Supreme Lord. We must keep in mind that poets were, and are still, accustomed to describing physical beauty of their subjects, whether it is Nature or a person, as a means of putting into practice their art of writing creatively, to express their emotions through their chosen subjects, as well as to impress upon their audience the singular charm of the subject they have chosen to focus their attention on.

In our present case, the poet is Goswami Tulsidas, and the subject he has chosen to write about is Lord Ram. Hence, Tulsidas uses all his poetic skills and puts them to good use while describing beauty in all its forms. Later on we shall come across extensive verses where the poet has been very liberal with his pen in describing the beauty of Mother Nature too. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 37—to Doha no. 38; and (b) Kishkindha Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 13—to Doha no. 17.}

The glory of the lotus-like feet of the Lord cannot be described, for they were so enchanting as to attract even the minds of dispassionate sages, who had otherwise renounced all attractions of the world, like swarms of so many bees<sup>1</sup>. (1)

To the left of the Lord was present the Adi-Shakti, the Primary Goddess whose presence was most adorable and auspicious, who was always obedient to the Lord, who represented the cosmic authority, the dynamism and the powers of Lord Vishnu, and who was responsible for creation of this universe on the instructions of the Lord<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In this imagery, the sages are compared to bees who flock to a lotus flower and hover over it in search of nectar, because these sages always think of the holy feet of the Lord, compared to a lotus flower here, and derive bliss by meditating upon them. These sages have renounced all attractions of the world, nothing charms their minds, but they find the Lord's holy feet so enchanting and elevating for their spirits, enhancing their spiritual experiences and aiding in their spiritual pursuits so much that they simply can't resist being attracted to them.

Like an Emperor uses his sovereign authority and royal powers inherently vested in him to carry out his wishes in this world, so likewise Brahm too employs the Adi-Shakti to carry out his wishes at the cosmic level of existence.

At the highest level of existence, which is the subtlest level of existence, Brahm represents the cosmic Consciousness that has the Adi-Shakti by its side to represent its supreme authority and powers in this creation. This Adi-Shakti is also known as Maha-Maya. At the next level of existence, a little lower level than Brahm but still higher than the gross physical world, the Adi-Shakti is called Goddess Laxmi while Brahm is known as Vishnu. And finally, at the lowest level of existence represented by the gross world, the Adi-Shakti exists in the form of Sita, and Brahm in the form of Lord Ram. When the pious couple (Manu and Satrupa) had the divine vision of Lord Hari (as described in the forgoing verses), a vision that was so exceptionally beautiful that it resembled an ocean of beauty that had revealed itself at that moment, they were spell-bound and so dazed that they continued to gaze it intently without blinking even for a fleeting moment. [Note—<sup>1</sup>A similar idea is expressed in Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line no. 9 that precedes Doha no. 49 where we shall read that Lord Ram had asked Vibhishan to seek any boon that he wished to have from the Lord because the Lord can't let anyone coming to meet him go back without any blessing in the form of a gift symbolizing courtesy.]

Hearing the words of the Lord (i.e. Lord Hari), the couple joined the palms of their respective hands reverentially as a mark of respect for the Lord, and gathering courage (to speak before the Lord) they replied in a sweet voice --- (1)

tumhahi dēta ati sugama gōsā'īm. agama lāga mōhi nija kṛpanā'īm. 4.

However, we have a profound wish lingering in our hearts, which is so singularly unique that on the one hand it appears that it is possible to accomplish it, and on the other hand it seems to be incredulous to ever think of it being fulfilled. (3)

While it is surely within your powers to fulfill that wish<sup>1</sup>, yet it seems to be so out of reach for me (mōhi)<sup>2</sup> who am so humble that I tend to shy from even expressing it in words<sup>3</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Just a moment ago, Lord Hari had assured the couple that they are free to seek any boon they wish to have and feel reassured that it would be fulfilled as the Lord is a great donor, and he would not shy away from fulfilling the desires of anyone who seek anything from him—apropos: Doha no. 148 herein above.

So the couple was sure that whatever wish they had in their hearts would be sure to be fulfilled by the Lord.

<sup>2</sup>It is to be marked here, as in verses that follow herein below, that Manu is speaking on behalf of his wife Satrupa too. It is quite in order because it is impractical that both Manu and Satrupa would speak at the same time. Usually, the husband becomes a spokesperson who speaks on behalf of his wife who is standing by his side.

<sup>3</sup>But at the same time they doubted if they themselves were capable of honouring their obligations towards the Lord should the latter agree to fulfill their desire; would they be able to live upto the Lord's expectations from them if the Lord obliges them by honouring their wish?

To wit, they were sure of the Lord's ability of granting their wish, but were unsure of their own abilities to honour the Lord's expectations from them.]

jathā daridra bibudhataru pā'ī. bahu sampati māgata sakucā'ī. 5.
tāsu prabhā'u jāna nahim sō'ī. tathā hṛdayam' mama sansaya hō'ī. 6.

It is like the case of someone having access to the all wish-fulfilling Tree, for then that person who has so many desires in his heart would hesitate from asking the Tree to fulfill some particular wish, because he won't be able to decide what to ask and what not to. (5)

That person would not know the mystical powers of Tree (that it would grant fulfillment of all wishes, whatever they may be, and whether such wishes are expressly sought to be fulfilled or kept a secret)<sup>1</sup>.

In the same way, I (Manu) have hesitation in my heart (because we, both my wife Satrupa and myself, are unable to decide whether to expressly request you to fulfill that single wish of ours, or just leave it to you to decide what you want to give us at your own discretion). (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The mystical all wish-fulfilling Tree can make everything a reality; nothing is impossible for it to grant to the seeker. So when a person comes to this Tree, he becomes uncertain what to do: should he ask for a particular boon, or leave it to the discretion of the Tree to grant whatever it deems fit.

In the former case, asking for a specific boon, the Tree would be happy to dispose of the application by giving what was asked for, and get done with it. But in case the seeker leaves it on the Tree to give whatever it wishes to give out of its own free will, the Tree would be in a quandary, for it would not be able to decide what to gift the seeker, and being mindful of its reputation of giving the greatest of gifts, it would go on giving and gifting one thing after another to protect its own honour and reputation as a great Giver.

In this situation obviously, the seeker would be the gainer, for if he had asked for one particular thing the Tree would have gladly given it to him and get over with its obligation, but when the seeker leaves it on the Tree to give what it pleases, the Tree would go on giving and gifting abundantly, more and more, out of shame to appear to be miserly, thrifty or stingy in giving gifts as it would bring great dishonour to its reputation of being a generous giver.

<sup>2</sup>So Manu and Satrupa say that they are unable to decide whether to ask the Lord to grant them the wish they have in their hearts, or leave it at the discretion of the Lord to give them whatever the Lord pleases. They say that they think it would be better for them to keep quiet and take recourse to the second option—which was to leave it to the Lord to grant whatever he wishes, because the Lord, being all-knowing, would certainly know what wish they have in their hearts even if they do not express it clearly in words, and then having fulfilled that wish the Lord would feel shy if he does not give anything to them as bonus from his own side in addition to that secret wish. Hence, the couple would be the gainer. As we shall presently see, this is what exactly happened.]

[Lord Hari replied—] 'Oh king ("nr̥pa"; Manu)! Leave aside all hesitation and ask whatever you want. There is nothing that I cannot grant you<sup>1</sup>.' (8)

I speak truthfully, for nothing is hidden from you (and therefore I can't speak falsehood to you)<sup>1</sup>, that I wish to have a son in your likeness. (Doha no. 149)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In verse no. 7 that precedes this Doha, Manu has just said that the Lord is all-knowing, and so he aware of what wish the couple has in their hearts. Hence, speaking false is out of the question.

In the context of what Manu has said earlier in verse nos. 3-4 that precede this Doha, it is easy for Lord Hari to manifest himself as a human being by taking a birth as the couple's son, but the responsibility that would fall on the shoulders of Manu and Satrupa if they became parents of the Lord in his human manifestation was not going to be joke. This responsibility and its accompanying expectations were so great that Manu and Satrupa were doubtful whether they would be successful in living upto it.]

The Lord observed that the couple had profound affection for him, and when he heard the king's words that though were brief yet were matchless and had immense depth in them, the merciful, compassionate and gracious Lord blessed them by saying: 'It will be as you have wished<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Where can I find anyone who is like me? So therefore, oh king (nr̥pa), I shall come and manifest myself as your son<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>What did the couple wish? They wanted to have the rarest of rare privilege, and its accompanying joy, to have a son who will be in the likeness of the Supreme Being—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 149. So the Lord blessed them that he will certainly honour their wish.

Why are the words spoken by Manu on behalf of the couple so rare that the Lord had to acknowledge them as being matchless and with a deep meaning? Well, rarely a great sage would do severe Tapa only to wish for the Lord to be his ‘son’, of all things! It was common for pious people to do Tapa to attain emancipation and salvation, while those who were evil and of a demonic nature would do Tapa to get powers that would make them invincible and grant them authority which would enable them to conquer the world and rule over it unopposed. But rarely anyone would wish to have the Supreme Being as his or her son.

Wishing to have a son in the likeness of the Supreme Being was a very clever design by Manu because he knew well enough that it would mean that the Lord would have to come down to this world himself to become his son, as there was no one in existence who is exactly like the Lord. Yet by saying he wanted a son in the likeness of the Lord, instead of saying he wanted the Lord himself to be his son, the king maintained decorum and showed his respect to the exalted office of the ‘Lord Emperor of the world’ which the Supreme Being, Lord Hari, occupied. To wit, for an ordinary person to dare to ask the supreme Emperor of the realm to assume the humble role of becoming his son and come to stay in his household will be nothing short of an insult to the high office that the Emperor occupies; it will be really unthinkable for anyone to make such a ridiculous and absurd wish.

But in the case of Lord Hari, Manu and Satrupa the case was different: the pious king and his wife had the greatest of respect and affection for the Lord, and did not have the slightest and the remotest intention to insult and undermine the august institution of the Supreme Being by asking him to come to this mortal world and assume a gross form of a human being. But at the same time, the love and affection they had for the Lord was so profound that it got the better of them, for they could not resist the urge to explore if it was possible for them to shower their love and affection on the Lord personally, at a more personal level and from much closer quarters that is free from the necessity of observing formalities and protocols while interacting with the Supreme Being in a formal surrounding as was the case at present. Interactions with the Lord in more formal setups would last for a limited period of time, but when the same Lord would come down in their home as their son, all barriers and formalities would be erased, and then they would have a free hand to be able to show the intensity of their love and affection for the Lord as abundantly and in as many ways as they wished.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Hari saw through the trick; he understood the couple’s real intentions. So the Lord smiled in amusement, and then the obliging Lord decided to fulfill the couple’s secret wish as outlined herein above by saying that “he did not know where to find a son in his own likeness, so it will be better and easier and convenient for him to come down himself as their son to honour their wish”.

Here we are witness to the remarkable play of mutual affection between the Supreme Being and his devotees! Indeed it is truly said that the Lord goes out of his way to please his devotees, even if it means a lot of problem for himself.]

satarūpahi bilōki kara jōrēm. dēbi māgu baru jō ruci tōrēm. 3.
jō baru nātha catura nṛpa māgā. sō'i kṛpāla mōhi ati priya lāgā. 4.

Then turning to Satrupa the Lord respectfully joined the palms of his hands<sup>1</sup> and said: 'Oh Devi (meaning literally a 'goddess'; "dēbi"; the word is used to show respect while addressing an honourable lady)! You too can ask for any boon that you wish to have.<sup>2</sup>' (3)

Satrupa replied: 'Oh Lord! What the clever king has asked, I too agree with it, and it pleases me too to seek the same boon<sup>3</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Hari had just a while ago promised to become a son of king Manu. The Lord, being the keeper and upholder of the laws of Dharma, would surely expect that as righteous couples king Manu and his wife Satrupa would be inseparable as husband and wife because they were strict followers of the laws of Dharma, which obliged them to be loyal, honest and committed to each other as couples for all times to come, which also means that both of them would share a common destiny. So if the Lord would become a son of Manu, obviously Satrupa would be his mother.

This is why Lord Hari joined his palms to pay his respects to his future mother which Satrupa would surely be when the Lord manifests as the son of Manu.

<sup>2</sup>But then, why did the Lord ask Satrupa separately if she wished anything for herself? Well, the Lord wanted to judge her as an independent individual. It is like the case of a wise and judicious Emperor who would question all those who come to him with petitions, giving every individual a fair opportunity to present his or her case, before making a final decision.

So, Lord Hari wanted to make sure if the king and his wife were really honest couple, fully committed to each other and determined to share their destiny as one common goal, for then their case would be all the more stronger in their favour, and the Lord would be assured that he would be obliging a couple who is extremely auspicious, righteous and a follower of the principles of Dharma, that they were of a steady mind and pious nature, and not someone who are so selfish that when the opportunity comes to grab something exceptionally valuable and rare, they would break all vows and fight with each other to have the bigger pie and the better half of the cake. Surely, the Lord would desist from taking birth in the household of such people.

<sup>3</sup>Satrupa's answer pleased the Lord. Now the Lord was sure that Manu and Satrupa were eternally inseparable from one another, and would share the destiny of being the Lord's worldly parents in due course of time when he came down to earth as a human being. Hence, the Lord joined his palms to pay his respects to Satrupa who would be his future mother.]

[Satrupa continued—] But oh Lord, it seems to be too incredulous and good to be true, although it pleases you because you are always obliging towards your devotees (that you would become our son because<sup>1</sup>) --- (5)

Taking into considering your cosmic form as briefly outlined above to be true, I become doubtful if our wishes will ever bear fruit, but at the same time what you speak (that you would be our son) is surely the truth, for it cannot be false at all. (7)

It is because you (Lord Hari) would do everything possible that pleases your devotees and makes them happy, for your devotees have no other destination but your own self<sup>3</sup>. (8)

Satrupa wished to ensure that the Lord would give her and Manu the privilege of enjoying the same sort and level of joy, happiness, bliss and beatitude that are enjoyed by the greatest of devotees of the Lord. Let this joy and happiness be of a higher level, of a transcendental nature pertaining to the plane of supreme Consciousness, and not limited to the gross level of the physical world. Let the Lord bless the couple that at the end they would find deliverance for their souls; let them be blessed with the reward of having spiritual bliss and beatitude; let them attain emancipation and salvation at the end of their lives.]

Hearing the polite words of Satrupa, words that had a deep meaning, were pleasant to hear and were spoken sweetly<sup>1</sup>, the Lord who is like an ocean of mercy, compassion and kindness (kṛpāsindhu), replied to her sweetly and politely (as she had done herself)<sup>2</sup>--- (1)

[The Lord replied—] ‘I have granted you whatever was there in your heart, and let there be no doubt about it. (2)

Oh mother (mātu)! I further bless you that wisdom and sagacity of the highest order will never desert you, and your sense of right judgment and a judicious nature would stand you in good stead in the most trying of times as a result of my special grace upon you<sup>3</sup>.’ (3)

Satrupa has told the Lord that “she agrees with what her husband Manu has sought, which was to have a son in the likeness of the Lord”, thereby making it clear that she wishes, one, to be eternally united with her husband, and two, to become the Lord’s mother so that she would be able to shower all her motherly affection and love upon the Lord at a personal level like her husband had wanted to do himself.

The other thing that Satrupa has said was that “though she understood that the Lord had promised to fulfill her wish and he would surely do so as he was always obliging towards his devotees, yet it seem so strange and beyond credulity to imagine that the Lord would actually do it, and how will he manage it, for the Lord was a personified form of cosmic Consciousness, making him all-pervading, all-encompassing, omnipresent, immanent, invisible and almighty Lord of the world, and the one who had created even the Trinity Gods, so she is not able to comprehend how he would manage to honour a wish that would be so such humbling and completely unfit for his exalted stature as the Lord of the world and its supreme Father, because it would compel him to come down to the earth to live a mundane humdrum life like an ordinary human being?” To wit, since Brahm was the Supreme Father of creation who had created the Trinity Gods along with the rest of the creation, it seems quite odd and beyond comprehension that she, Satrupa, and her husband, Manu, would have the honour of being the ‘mother and father’ respectively of the same Lord.

Earlier, when the Lord had appeared before Manu and Satrupa, they were extremely exhilarated; they were thrilled and overcome with emotions so much that they lost awareness of themselves, had prostrated before the Lord, and had clasped the Lord’s holy feet, whereat the Lord had caressed their heads and affectionately lifted them from the ground—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 148 along with Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede it.

<sup>2</sup>Therefore, it was a very courteous and most affectionate interaction between the Supreme Lord and his devotees who would eventually be the Lord’s worldly parents. This being the case, little formality was needed between the Lord and the couple because now a personal bond was created between them. They talked with each other as parents would do with their son.

<sup>3</sup>We shall read eventually that at the time when Lord Vishnu appeared before mother Kaushalya, who was Satrupa in that life, in a Holy Spirit form just before the Lord took the physical form of her son, she had prayed to the Lord and showed that she recognized who he was, and that prayer of hers resonates perfectly with what the Lord tells her now—that even in that birth, wisdom and erudition won’t desert her. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chanda line nos. 1-16 that precede Doha no. 192.

As the story unfolds we would read that during the entire episode related to Lord Ram being sent to the forest, Kaushalya had shown exemplary courage, for she maintained a sense of maturity, calmness, resilience and fortitude. Even Dasrath had lost his mental bearing, for he wailed and lamented and regretted gravely for being instrumental in the Lord going to the forest, so much so that he had later died due to grief. But Kaushalya maintained her mental poise and balance throughout.

When Kaushalya came to learn that her son Lord Ram was banished to the forest by Kaikeyi, the other queen of king Dasrath, who wanted her own son Bharat to ascend the throne of Ayodhya, she took the news calmly as privately she knew that Lord Ram was none but Lord Vishnu himself who had come down to this world with a lot of work to do, one being to fulfill his promise to the gods and mother earth that he would eliminate the scourge of the demon race in his form as Lord Ram, and therefore the Lord could not stay put in Ayodhya in order to rule the kingdom as its king, and he had to venture out. So therefore, whatever was happening was a part of a wider plan of the Supreme Being, and hence it made no sense in fretting and fuming uselessly.

This wisdom and erudition of Kaushalya was evident when she uttered no harsh words against anyone, and showed no rancour or ill-will either against Kaikeyi or her son Bharat who was made the reason for Lord Ram's being sent to the forest, or even against her husband king Dasrath for sending her beloved son Lord Ram to the forest even though he had the right to ascend the throne as he was the eldest of the four brothers. She also showed personal sympathy for Bharat because he was made a scapegoat in the whole sordid affair. When Lord Ram went to seek her permission to proceed to the forest, Kaushalya's reaction was singularly remarkable and an outstanding example of Dharma being put into practice. Instead of raising a hue and cry, and crying foul, she advised her son what a noble mother was expected to tell her son in such an unprecedented adverse situation. Even when Sita went to seek her permission to join her husband Lord Ram while he prepared to leave for the forest, Kaushalya's advice for her was full of wisdom and righteousness. During the Lord's long absence from the forest, she acted her part as the senior-most member of the household with perfection, never letting anyone feel that she harbours any trace of ill-feeling against a single person. Kaushalya treated Kaikeyi as her sister, and Kaikeyi's sons Bharat and Shatughan as her own sons. Kaushalya made no distinction between Kaikeyi and Sumitra, the third queen of Dasrath, and showed no special favour for Sumitra though her son Laxman had made the supreme sacrifice by accompanying Lord Ram and Sita to the forest.

All these events are narrated in Ram Charit Manas, in the first half of Ayodhya Kand, and we shall be reading them by-and-by. But one thing is undeniable throughout these events—and it is that: all this was possible because of Brahm's blessings given to Satrupa presently as narrated in this verse, that wisdom and erudition would never desert her.]

 सुत बिषइक तव पद रति होऊ । मोहि बड़ मूढ़ कहै किन कोऊ ॥ ५ ॥

 mani binu phani jimi jala binu mīnā. mama jīvana timi tumhahi adhīnā. 6.

[After the conversation between Lord Brahm (the Supreme Being) and Satrupa, Manu, who had remained silent till now, thought for a moment that if he remained quiet any longer then perhaps he would lose a golden chance of a life-time which he will regret forever. So he politely submitted before the Lord as follows—]

Manu offered his obeisance at the holy feet of the Lord and said: 'Oh Lord, I have one more prayer to make (in addition to the one I have already made before you)<sup>1</sup>. (4)

Let my affection for your feet be in accordance to my wish to have you as my son, even though that would be stupid for me to think in this way<sub>2</sub>, and people would jest that there is no one bigger fool than I am (to think in this term)<sup>2</sup>. (5)

Even as a serpent cannot survive without its luminescent Mani on its head (which is a small sac of effervescent exude from the serpent's head that shows light to the reptile during its nocturnal foraging for food), and a fish cannot survive without water—let my life be similarly dependent upon you. [To wit, just as the serpent would die without its Mani, and the fish without water, let me not survive in case I am separated from you.]<sup>3</sup>.’ (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>And what was Manu's first request to the Lord? Answer is found in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 129: to have a son in the likeness of the Supreme Being.

<sup>2</sup>One can see the difference between the approach of Satrupa and Manu, and later on in the story it did exactly happen as they had wished. We have already noted how Satrupa had reacted to Lord Ram's going to the forest in a note appended to verse no. 3 herein above, which shows how wisely and with maturity she had behaved throughout the event.

Contrasted with her was the behaviour of king Dasrath who was Manu in his previous life. While Kaushalya was privy to the reality of Lord Ram as the Supreme Being even before the Lord's physical appearance as her son*, and therefore her attitude towards the Lord and all the events associated with him were conditioned with this wisdom, king Dasrath had no such advantage. {*Apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chanda line nos. 1-16 that precede Doha no. 192.} So what was the result?

<sup>3</sup>The result was that Dasrath behaved like an ordinary man who would be forced to take certain actions due to his falling prey to the cunning designs of a woman whom he favoured much (in this case she was Kaikeyi), and once forced to take such actions that would be against his wish, he would be powerless to make amends, and in the wake of the disastrous consequences that it would produce he would be reduced to a being a spineless wreck, grieving, lamenting, weeping, pleading, frothing in the mouth, losing consciousness and generally acting as a weakling inspite of the fact that he was one of the most powerful kings of the time. The utterly miserable and pitiable condition of Dasrath has been vividly described in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 29—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 37; (ii) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 81—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 82.

What more, he would eventually die distraught and a broken man, wailing and lamenting for his dear son Lord Ram whom he had himself sent to the forest. In this context, we can refer to Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 153—to Doha no. 155.

While Dasrath presents a picture of utter misery, by contrast we find Kaushalya wisely calm, poised, steady in mind and resilient.

All this was because we find that while Satrupa was blessed by the Lord to have wisdom and erudition and judicious thinking, Dasrath did not want it; he wanted to treat Brahm, the Supreme Being, as his worldly 'son' when the Lord manifests as Lord Ram.]

अस बरु मागि चरन गहि रहेऊ । एवमस्तु करुनानिधि कहेऊ ॥ ७ ॥

asa baru māgi carana gahi rahē'ū. ēvamastu karunānidhi kahē'ū. 7.
aba tumha mama anusāsana mānī. basahu jā'i surapati rajadhānī. 8.

Seeking this blessing from the Lord, Manu fell down before the latter and clasped his holy feet till the time the Lord, who is an ocean of mercy, grace and compassion, finally granted his wish by saying, 'So shall it be!' (7)

The Lord continued: 'Now, you two obey my instructions and go to live in the heavenly abode of the king of gods (i.e. Indra)<sup>1</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Why did the Lord have to say "obey my instructions" when he asked Manu and Satrupa to go and spend some time in the heaven. It is because they were not interested in any heavenly comfort, for had they been they would not have neglected Brahma, Vishnu and Shiva when these three Gods of the Trinity appeared before them and asked them to seek any wish they wanted fulfilled—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 145.

It was then Brahm had appeared before the pious couple. Who is 'Brahm'? He is the Supreme Father of creation; he is a personified form of cosmic Consciousness. Brahm has no form, for he is formless and without attributes—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 150.

His voice was heard as if the whole sky, the entire firmament was speaking, as the Lord is all-pervading, omnipresent and immanent in every single element in creation, with the sky representing the Lord's vast, fathomless, cosmic, invisible and endless form. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 145.

So, being aware of this, the Lord knew that if he did not tell them to obey him, there were fair chances that they would not go to live in heaven.]

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Why did the Lord want Manu and his wife Satrupa to go to heaven and enjoy some heavenly comfort before being born as a king and queen of Ayodhya? It was to reward them for the severity of Tapa they had done, as well as to set an example for others that if a person sets his sight at a higher goal as his aim in life, and if he succeeds in attaining the summit, then all the other junior goals that are lower down and form different milestones on the way to the summit would automatically be his even without asking specifically for them. For instance, if one wishes to become a king, and succeeds in it, then all powers and authorities and positions in the hierarchy of the kingdom that come under the jurisdiction of the king would automatically come under the command of that person by the virtue of his becoming a king, without his asking for them separately. Likewise, when one seeks the highest goal of spiritual bliss and beatitude, then heavenly comforts and pleasures are a part and parcel of this experience.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Doha no. 149 (Manu); and (ii) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 150 (Satrupa).

The Lord was addressing Manu when he asked the couple to go to heaven as is clear when he says that eventually he would become their son when Manu becomes a King of Ayodhya. The Lord did not specifically refer to Satrupa because she would always go where Manu went.]

[Brahm, the Supreme Being, said—] ‘I shall assume a human form out of my own free will, and then manifest in your household (as your son). [This would fulfill your wish to have me as your son.] (1)

My dear (tātā), I shall manifest myself along with all of the accoutrements and accessories that form a part of me (ansanha sahita dēha dhari)<sup>1</sup>, and then do deeds that would give a lot of joy to my devotees (when they recount them again). (2)

When people would reverentially listen to these stories related to my life and the deeds I do during my incarnation later on, then such fortunate ones would be able to gradually develop a sense of renunciation and dispassion for material world, and as a result of it they would be able to cross over this ocean-like world of transmigration to attain emancipation and salvation for themselves<sup>2</sup>. (3)

My Adi Shakti<sup>3</sup>, i.e. the primary form of cosmic energy and dynamism possessed by Consciousness that has created this world, would also manifest itself with me in the form of Maya, the stupendous power that I employ to create a veil of delusions (that would help me to stage manage things in such a way that I will be able to conceal my true identity, and the world will think that I am an ordinary human being like the rest of them). (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Later on in the story we shall read that a similar prophesy was made by Brahm when he had told the gods and mother earth that he would come down to earth to eliminate the scourge of the demons who had been tormenting them—apropos: Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 187.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Shiva has also asserted the same thing earlier. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 122.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that precede Doha no. 13 that speak the same thing.

<sup>3</sup>To wit, the Adi-Shakti that had created this world is the same that has also given rise to Maya in this world. The word Adi-Shakti refers to the primary form of the Lord's dynamic powers that he had employed to create the world. Further, it is the same primary force of Nature that is also the source of all delusions created in this world. These delusions are the effects of Maya, and Maya is powered by Adi-Shakti.

There are many references to 'Maya' in Ram Charit Manas. Refer: Uttar Kand—(i) Doha no. 41; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 44; (iii) from Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 70—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 72; (iv) from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 116—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 117.

The stupendous powers of Maya are evident when we recall how it had led the wise sage Narad astray so much so that first he wanted to marry, and unable to do so he cursed Lord Vishnu for playing a spoil-sport in his wish and preventing him from marrying the girl of his choice, even going to the extent of cursing the Lord vehemently. But when Lord Vishnu withdrew his Maya, all illusions vanished, and Narad could once again see things in the right perspective. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 129; (ii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 132; (iii) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 137—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 138.]

I shall certainly fulfill your wish (to have me as your son). It is my truthful promise to you, and it cannot go in vain.' (5)

The Lord (i.e. the Supreme Being) repeatedly said so (to assure the pious couple that they need not doubt it), and then the Lord vanished from sight<sup>1</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>At the time sage Narad had met Lord Vishnu and regretted having cursed him, the Lord had vanished from sight after assuring the sage that he ought not to feel sad as everything had happened according to the Lord's own wish, and that the Lord harbours no ill-will against the sage—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 138.

When the Supreme Being first came to Manu and Satrupa, the Lord had no form; he had an invisible presence, and his voice seemed to come from the whole dome of the sky overhead. But when the pious couple wanted to see the Lord present himself in a visible form, it was then that he revealed himself physically in a form narrated in Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 the precedes Doha no. 146—to Chaupai line no. 5 the precedes Doha no. 148 herein above.

It is this visible form of the Lord that vanished from sight.]

After this, the pious couple enshrined the magnificent and divine view of the merciful Lord (that they had just seen) in their hearts and lived in that hermitage for some time.
(7)

When the right time came, they left their mortal bodies and went to heaven to live in the city of Amravti, the heavenly capital of the gods (as ordered by the Supreme Lord)<sup>1</sup>. (8)**

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Sortha no. 151 along with Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes it.

**It is very important to note a crucial point here at this juncture, for if it is not clarified here it may cause a lot of confusion later on as we progress in our narration.

In Ram Charit Manas there are two instances where the Supreme Being has revealed himself to bless a devotee couple, who was doing severe Tapa (penance and austerity) to have a divine glimpse of the Lord, that he would become their son to honour the couple's wish to have a son in the likeness of the Lord. One instance is that of sage Kashyap and his wife Aditi, and the other is of king Manu and his wife Satrupa.

The instance of Kashyap-Aditi has been mentioned but only briefly in Ram Charit Manas, in its Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 123; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 187.

But the story of Manu-Satrupa has been narrated in detail, as we are presently reading it, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 142—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 152.

Earlier, Lord Shiva has told Parvati that there are many reasons why the Supreme Being would manifest himself as a human being in the form of Lord Ram in different eras of time, known as Kalpas, but the divine story of Lord Ram follows the same pattern despite the diversity of the origin of the story, and the fundamental cause of the Lord's manifestation also remains the same, because it fulfills two basic criterions: (i) the Lord manifests to oblige his devotees, and (ii) to eliminate the scourge of evil and negative forces in Nature that are represented by the demons, when they become dominant in creation and disturb the balance of the rule of law and probity symbolized by Dharma. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 121—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 122.}

Then Lord Shiva proceeds to narrate some instances of the countless such instances when the Supreme Being became a human in the form of Lord Ram. The first instance he cites is that of Jai and Vijai. In the era when these two became the demons Ravana and Kumbhakran, sage Kashyap and his wife Aditi had prayed to the Lord that they want to have him as their son. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 122—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 123.}

The second instance Lord Shiva cites is the event associated with Jalandhar who became the demon Ravana, and the Lord had to come down as Lord Ram to get rid of him. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 123—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 124.}

The third instance is of the era when sage Narad cursed Lord Vishnu. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 124.}. Then Shiva goes on to describe this event in detail when Parvati asks him to do so.

The fourth instance is of the era when Manu and Satrupa did their Tapa, which we have just finished reading. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2, 6 that precede Doha no. 141; and from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 142—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 152.}

This event will be followed immediately herein below with the narration of the story of how king Prapabhanu became the demon Ravana due to curse of Brahmins. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 153—to Sortha no. 183.}

Then we read in the verses that follow immediately after Pratapbhanu's story that gods and mother earth prayed to the Supreme Being to rescue them from Ravana's horrors, upon which the Lord promised them that he will come down personally to the world in the form of Lord Ram to take care of this issue. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 184—to Doha no. 185; and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that precede Doha no. 187.}

Having made all the above observations, now we shall come to the important point which has confounded great scholars of the story of Ram Charit Manas for centuries. This question, which has been subject of great discussion and debate, is this: Out of the two instances of the Supreme Being promising his devotee couple that he would become the couple's son known as Lord Ram, one is related to Kashyap and Aditi, and the other to Manu and Satrupa—then, which out of these two is the main story of Lord Ram as narrated in this book Ram Charit Manas that we would be reading? Is the story of Lord Ram the one pertaining to the Supreme Being blessing Kashyap and Aditi, or is it the one when the Lord blessed Manu and Satrupa?

One school of thought avers that the main text of the story of Lord Ram as narrated in the present book 'Ram Charit Manas' pertains to the era when the Lord blessed Kashyap and Aditi, and the other school is of the view that it belongs to the era when the Lord blessed Manu and Satrupa. Followers of these two views cite verses from the text to prove their point. Now, let us see what those verses are.

With reference to view that the main story of Lord Ram as narrated in Ram Charit Manas belongs to the era of Kashyap and Aditi, as well as of sage Narad cursing Lord Vishnu, the following verses are cited: Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 123; (ii) Doha no. 137 along with Chaupai line nos. 6-8; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 2-6 that precedes Doha no. 187; and (iv) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 188.

Now, it ought to be carefully noted that out of these four groups of verses cited herein above, the ones listed in (iii) are most pertinent and significant in the context of the view that the story pertains to the era of Kashyap-Aditi and Narad because we read that the Lord has himself said that “he will come down to earth as Lord Ram to fulfill his promise made to Kashyap and Aditi, as well as to Narad”. Close on the heels of this is the verse cited in (iv) above where the poet Tulsidas, the narrator of this story, says “now I shall resume the narration of the main story of how Lord Ram was born in the household of king Dasrath and his queen Kaushalya from where I had put it on hold earlier because I had started narrating some other incidents that were interesting and had some bearing on the reason why the Supreme Being had become Lord Ram”.

To this is added another significant verse of Ram Charit Manas where it is narrated that sage Narad had met Lord Ram during the Lord’s wondering in the forest. The sage offered his obeisance to the Lord, and then Lord Ram answered certain questions asked by the sage. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 41—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 46.}

That seems pretty good and certain to settle the question in favour of the story being related to the era of Kashyap-Aditi and sage Narad, but for the argument of the other school of thought that stresses that the story belongs to the era of Manu and Satrupa, as well as king Pratapbhanu becoming the demon Ravana. They rely on the following set of verses: Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 2-6 that precede Doha no. 141 where Lord Shiva tells Parvati that he will tell her the story of Lord Ram which had led her to get confused in her previous life as Sati, and then Shiva proceeds with a detailed narration of the event related to Manu and Satrupa being blessed by the Supreme Being that he would become their son*1, and then of king Pratapbhanu becoming the demon king Ravana*2. {Refer: Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, *1=Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 142—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 152; and *2= Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 153—to Sortha no. 183.}

Then the proponents of this theory quote Baal Kand, Doha no. 188 along with Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede it, and link it with Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Sortha no. 152 (i.e. the verses we are currently reading, that pertain to the story of Manu and Satrupa) to say that after Manu and Satrupa’s event, Tulsidas had used the story of king Pratapbhanu and his becoming the demon king Ravana, and the subsequent prayers of the gods and mother earth to the Supreme Being to protect them, as an interlude, for during the intervening period of their being blessed by the Lord and their becoming king Dasrath and queen Kaushalya when they would be spending some time in the heaven as ordered by the Lord, Tulsidas would describe the story of king Pratapbhanu and how he became the demon king Ravana, and then how the gods and mother earth would pray to the Lord to protect them against the tyranny of the demons. So, after this pause, Tulsidas resumes his main narrative, of Manu and Satrupa becoming king Dasrath and queen Kaushalya respectively, and the Supreme Being manifesting himself as their son known as Lord Ram.

Now therefore, the important question is this: Which of the two versions or schools of thought regarding the actual narration of the story of the life and time of Lord Ram as narrated in the book Ram Charit Manas is the correct one? Is the main story of Ram Charit Manas related to the era of Kashyap and Aditi as well as Narad, or is it related to the era of Manu and Satrupa as well as king Pratapbhanu?

To be frank, this humble author, who is presenting the story of Ram Charit Manas to his readers in English, is not able to decide, and so he thought it wise and prudent to present the two sides of the same coin to his learned readers in a neutral way. Nevertheless, he wishes to point out that this debate has only an academic value, for the real benefit of reading the divine story of Lord Ram is its spiritual reward, its spiritual importance, and this importance is unaffected by which era this story belongs to. It is easy to understand this point of view: For instance, there are many rivers having different sources of origin, each having its own character, and they all travel through diverse terrains, to finally end in the ocean to become one with it, when they lose their unique character and independent origin to become one single body of water that recognizes no distinction between these various rivers after their merger with the great mass of water we call the 'ocean'. So in the same manner, whatever is the cause of the origin of the holy and divine story of Lord Ram, what matters to us most is its spiritual value which remains the same, and so does the main framework around which the story is built.

A concordant idea is found in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Sortha no. 90-b, where what sage Kaagbhusund tells Garud can be interpreted in the present context as meaning that a wise person with a steady mind is he who is focused on his target, and such an enlightened, erudite and sagacious person would not get unnecessarily involved or entangled in futile debates and harbour unwarranted doubts regarding Lord Ram as are normally caused by the many variations in the Lord's story and their sources of origin, for he would instead concentrate on having devotion and love for the Lord, and in worshipping the Lord who is an ocean of mercy, compassion and grace, because this latter approach would give him immense internal happiness and peace, as well as spiritual bliss, rather than creating more and more vexation in his mind and robbing him of whatever peace he has if he allows himself to get unnecessarily dragged into debates and discussions that are nothing but futile mental exercises of mere academic value, because they lead to no conclusion.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 121 which explicitly asserts that Lord Ram is a transcendental Being who cannot be a subject matter of debates and application of worldly logic that one applies to understand other things in this mortal creation, for the Lord is beyond comprehension and reach of the mind.

It is like the case of a thirsty person coming to a water body to quench his thirst; he would, and should, be more interested in quenching his thirst rather than standing by the side of the water and contemplating on its history, the geography and geology of the place, the astrological chart, the time of the day, the position of the sun and the moon et al, to decide whether or not he should drink the nectar-like water that beckons him to come and remove his thirst first and protect his life instead of making a clown of himself by getting involved in such senseless contemplations while dying for want of water. In this context, refer to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 43.

The Supreme Being had manifested himself as Lord Ram in many Kalpas (eras), and though the reason varied from Kalpa to Kalpa, yet the main outline of the Lord's divine story remained the same. We get this hint in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 121—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 122. Hence, it is not of great importance to which Kalpa the story actually relates to, but the importance is to derive spiritual benefits from reading, hearing and narrating it.

Another important point that we can make here is this: Since the story of sage Kashyap and Aditi doing Tapa and their being blessed by the Supreme Being is not narrated in detail anywhere in this book Ram Charit Manas, it would therefore not be wrong to deduce that the story of Manu and Satrupa has been especially narrated to give the reader an idea of the sort of Tapa that Kashyap and Aditi did in order to have a divine vision of the Supreme Being, of their having the same wish as Manu and Satrupa to have the Lord as their son, and the same way that the Supreme Being promised them that he would fulfill their wish by becoming their son.]

Oh Bharadwaj! Now listen to another fascinating story related to the cause of Lord Ram’s birth.’ (Doha no. 152)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>We must always remember that we are reading a conversation between sages Yagyawalkya and Bharadwaj while reading this story, for when the latter had asked the former to tell him the divine story of Lord Ram and describe the causes why the Supreme Being would become a human being in the form of Lord Ram, sage Yagyawalkya had preferred to quote the conversation between Lord Shiva and Parvati in order to answer sage Bharadwaj. This is clearly mentioned in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 45—to Doha no. 47.

So therefore, what we are reading is a conversation between these two great sages, where the narrator of the story is Yagyawalkya and the listener is Bharadwaj, while the actual text of the story is the one that Lord Shiva narrated to Parvati as mentioned in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 107—to Doha no. 109; (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 121—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 122.]

[PAUSE 5 FOR A THIRTY-DAY RECITATION]

In the verses that follow now, we shall read how a great and noble king named Paratapbhanu was treacherously condemned to become a fierce demon named Ravana. This story is covered in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 153—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 188.

The story of the previous life of Ravana, the great king of the demon race and the ruler of the kingdom which had its capital on the island of Lanka, is a very fascinating tale about a noble king of a great kingdom who was overcome with a jealous desire to rule over the whole world un-opposed, how this desire led him to become a victim of conceit and treachery, how his yearning was exploited by a cunning enemy who took advantage of his hidden desire to settle old scores and seek revenge upon him by ensuring that the unsuspecting king was condemned for life to become a demon, to lead a life of ignominy and denunciation, a life which would have led him to slide down to even further lower levels of existence had he not been provided salvation by the Supreme Being who came down to this mortal world himself in the form of Lord Ram to liberate Ravana's soul from his evil body and grant eternal rest to him.

This wonderful story has been narrated in the great epic known as 'Ram Charit Manas' written by Goswami Tulsidas. It is described in its Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 153—to Doha no. 176.

Now, let us read this interesting story from Ram Charit Manas verbatim in detail.

चौ०. सुनु मुनि कथा पुनीत पुरानी । जो गिरिजा प्रति संभु बखानी ॥ १ ॥
बिस्व बिदित एक कैकय देसू । सत्यकेतु तहँ बसइ नरेसू ॥ २ ॥

sunu muni kathā punīta purānī. jō girijā prati sambhu bakhānī. 1.
bisva bidita ēka kaikaya dēsū. satyakētu taham̐ basa'i narēsū. 2.

[Sage Yagyavalkya was once asked by sage Bharadwaj why the Supreme Being had to come down to this mortal world in the form of a human prince known as Lord Ram. While answering Bharadwaj, sage Yagyavalkya narrated a fascinating story that on some previous occasion had been told by Lord Shiva to his divine consort Parvati (who was known as Girija as she was the daughter of the king of mountains).

It was the story of a great king known as Pratpabhanu, who was the son of a great and righteous king called Satyaketu. He ruled over a mighty kingdom known by the name of Kaikaya<sup>1</sup>.]

Sage Yagyavalkya (also spelled as Yagyawalkya) said to sage Bharadwaj: 'Listen oh sage. Listen to this great, ancient and legendary tale which Lord Shiva had narrated to Girija (his divine consort) in some time in the past. (1)

There was a famed kingdom (a principality) known as 'Kaikaya<sup>2</sup>'; it was famous throughout the world. A great king by the name of 'Satyaketu<sup>3</sup>' ruled there. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It is believed that this story of Ravana's previous life when he was king Satyaketu of the kingdom of Kaikaya is narrated in three most ancient and obscure texts known as (i) Agastya Ramayan written by sage Agastya, (ii) the Maha-Ramayan, and (iii) Shiva-Samhita.

<sup>2</sup>The kingdom of 'Kaikaya' lied on the other side of two ancient rivers named Vyaas and Shaalmali. At the time of this story, its capital was known as Girivraj or Raajgriha. At present it lies in the state of Kashmir in the north of India, nestled in the mighty range of the Himalayas. Its present name is 'Kakkaa'; locally it is also called 'Gakar'. It is believed that it was established by sage Kashyap.

By the fiat of fate it so chanced that when Satyaketu, alias Pratapbhanu, was cursed by the Brahmins to be doomed, then the cunning false-hermit, who had been instrumental in arranging the feast where the Brahmins cursed the king, informed all his enemies of the development. They launched attacks from all sides to take advantage of the situation, confident that Pratapbhanu could be easily conquered now. In the ensuing wars, while all kings returned with the spoils of war and contented at being successful in defeating their erstwhile arch enemy, one of them remained behind to establish his sovereignty there. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-8 that precede Doha no. 175.}

In due course of time, one of the princesses of this kingdom of Kaikaya was married to king Dasrath of Ayodhya; her name was 'Kaikeyi' or 'Kaikai'—meaning the daughter of the kingdom of Kaikaya. She was the step-mother of Lord Ram and the mother of Bharat. It was she who became instrumental in Lord Ram's going to the forest for a fourteen year period of exile during which the famed war of Lanka took place and Ravana was slayed by him.

<sup>3</sup>The name 'Satyaketu' of the king is significant. It means one who holds high the Flag (ketu) of Truth (satya). To wit, king Satyaketu was an upholder of truth and righteousness, and ruled over his kingdom judicially and in accordance to the laws of Dharma (probity, propriety, nobility, compassion, prudence, righteousness, ethics and morality).

It is really such a wonder and an irony of fate that such a great and righteous king who was loved by his subjects and had not a scar on his character that would go against him should become a hated 'demon' known as Ravana who was loathed by the world.]

धरम धुरंधर नीति निधाना । तेज प्रताप सील बलवाना ॥ ३ ॥

तेहि कें भए जुगल सुत बीरा । सब गुन धाम महा रनधीरा ॥ ४ ॥

dharama dhurandhara nīti nidhānā. tēja pratāpa sīla balavānā. 3.
tēhi kēm̐ bha'ē jugala suta bīrā. saba guna dhāma mahā ranadhīrā. 4.

The King (Satyaketu) was a great champion of good virtues and an upholder of Dharma (the principles of auspiciousness, righteousness, probity, propriety, ethics and noble conduct). He was well-versed in the laws of politics and statesmanship, was endowed with glory, esteem and dignity that come with being meritorious and above reproach, and was famed for his valour and strength, but at the same time he was very polite and courteous. (3)

He had two sons who were like their father—i.e. they were repositories of virtues and had all the merits of their father, possessing all the fine qualities and characters that he had. They were strong, valiant, righteous and noble like their father<sup>1</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A son inherits his father's genes and legacy. A worthy son is one who takes forward the name of his father and his family to higher glories, instead of doing anything that would put them to shame. If a father is meritorious and good, his son would normally be like him. This natural law of inheritance of qualities is endorsed in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precedes Doha no. 142 where the birth of Dhruva, the great devotee of Lord Vishnu, is mentioned. It is said here that there was a very noble and righteous king named Swayambhu, and from him was born Uttanpad, a son who was like him in all meritorious virtues, and then Dhruva was born to Uttanpad and he also inherited the glorious virtues of his grandfather and father.

Amongst the great qualities of a king is his being righteous and judicious in the affairs of the state, being compassionate and considerate when dealing with his subjects, having excellent knowledge of statecraft and principles of statesmanship, and being courageous and valiant in the battle-field. Satyaketu and his two sons had all these virtues in them.]

apara sutahi arimardana nāmā. bhujabala atula acala saṅgrāmā. 6.

The elder son, who was the heir to the throne, was called ‘Pratapbhanu’<sup>1</sup>. (5)

The second son was named ‘Arimardan’<sup>2</sup>. He had immense strength and valour in his arms that was unmatched by any other warrior. During a duel or a war, he was extremely steadfast and stood his ground like a mighty mountain. [To wit, it was well-nigh impossible to defeat him in a duel. He never turned his back and fled the battle-field. During a war he made his enemies bite dust, and his mere presence sent chill down the spine of his adversaries.] (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The word ‘Pratapbhanu’ literally means ‘one whose glories and fame shone like the sun’; or ‘one who shone like the sun for his glories and fame’.

In his next birth also as Ravana, this unique quality of the king lasted because there was no one to match Ravana’s fame in the world.

<sup>2</sup>The word ‘Arimardan’ refers to ‘one who vanquishes his enemies and crushes their strength’. This surely was true even in this prince’s next birth when he was born as Kumbhakaran. No one dared to confront him in the battle-field, and when he stepped to face his enemy, the latter’s army was scattered like dry leaves in a severe storm.

Arimardan was stronger in physical strength as compared to his elder brother Pratapbhanu. This was also replicated in their next birth as Kumbhakaran and Ravana respectively.

When we shall eventually be reading about the battle at Lanka we shall read how Kumbhakaran single-handedly dispersed Lord Ram’s army helter-skelter under his vicious onslaught<sup>1</sup>, while no such feat could be achieved by Ravana. {<sup>1</sup>Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 10 that precede Doha no. 65; and Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 67.}

We shall cite an instance from the battle of Lanka to highlight how Arimardan was stronger than Ravana. It so happened once during the course of the war that Hanuman, who was a very strong warrior in his own right and matched Ravana and Kumbhakaran in their might and valour, had been punched by Ravana forcefully which made Hanuman buckle and fall back a bit, but he managed to recover from the blow quite easily and got up angrily to face Ravana and give him a strong blow of his fist in revenge which made Ravana fall unconscious for a moment. But when Kumbhakaran gave a mighty fistful to Hanuman, the latter swooned and fell down unconsciousness for some time, unable to recover instantly. These two events are respectively mentioned in Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 84; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 65. ]

भाइहि भाइहि परम समीती । सकल दोष छल बरजित प्रीती ॥ ७ ॥
जेठे सुतहि राज नृप दीन्हा । हरि हित आपु गवन बन कीन्हा ॥ ८ ॥ bhā'ihī bhā'ihī parama samīti. sakala dōṣa chala barajita prīti. 7. jēṭhē sutahi rāja nrpa dīnhā. hari hita āpu gavana bana kīnhā. 8.

The two brothers warmly loved each other, and there was perfect unity between them. Their affection for each other was genuine and selfless, without guile, deceit and blemishes of any kind. (7)

The king (Satyaketu) abdicated the throne and installed his elder son (Pratapbhanu) on it<sup>1</sup>. After that, the king went to the forest to lead an austere life for his spiritual pursuits and devote the rest of his life in devotion of Lord Hari<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>According to ancient tradition, when a king became old he should appoint his eldest son to throne as his heir. This is also borne out when king Dasrath decided to anoint his eldest son Lord Ram to the throne of the kingdom of Ayodhya. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 2; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 4; (ii) Doha no. 31.}

<sup>2</sup>This was another tradition according to which a man was expected to spend the last quarter of his life as a Sanyasi—i.e. one who renounces all his attachment with the world and spend his remaining days in meditation and contemplation in preparation for his ultimate death and attainment of peace for his soul. Prior to that, he should hand over all his worldly responsibilities to his heirs and withdraw himself to the forest or any other serene place that would give him freedom from involvement with the world and its endless worries. This is called Vaanprastha—literally meaning ‘heading to the forest’.

So in accordance to this tradition, king Satyaketu handed over the reign of the kingdom to his elder son and went to the forest to lead a life of devotion and contemplation. There he would spend his remaining days in worshipping Lord Hari, also known as Lord Vishnu, the Supreme Being.

This event also shows that the family of Pratapbhanu was god-fearing and devoted to Lord Vishnu. It's such a twist of fate and an irony of providence that members of the same family would become arch enemies of Lord Vishnu in their next birth as Ravana, Kumbhakaran, and the rest of the demon race.]

When Pratapbhanu ascended the throne and was declared a king, a royal proclamation to this effect was made throughout the land.

He ruled the kingdom most righteously in accordance with the laws and rules laid down in the Vedas (scriptures). There was no trace of sin and evil throughout the realm during his reign. (Doha no. 153) nṛpa hitakāraka saciva sayānā. nāma dharamaruci sukra samānā. 1.

saciva sayāna bandhu balabīrā. āpu pratāpapuñja ranadhīrā. 2.

The king had an able and wise chief minister. His name was 'Dharmaruchi'<sup>1</sup>. This minister was clever and prudent like the legendary sage Sukracharya (who is said to be the Guru or the priest and preceptor of the demon race) in his wisdom, knowledge, prudence and abilities. (1)

All circumstances were favourable (for a great kingdom with a glorious future)—the minister (Dharmaruchi) was most competent, intelligent, skilled and wise, the king's brother (Arimardan) was counted as the first in the rank of great warriors and those who were brave and valiant, and the king (Pratapbhanu) himself was a veritable treasury of fine glorious qualities as well as one who was steady in the face of an enemy in the battle-field. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The word 'Dharmaruchi' literally means 'one who takes great interest in Dharma—i.e. in the laws of probity, propriety, righteousness and ethics'. If a king's chief advisor and minister is good and competent, the king rises and acquires fame in the world, and the kingdom prospers.

Just like a man has two hands that help him to carry on with his duties in this world, a king has two arms that help him rule over his realm. One arm is his chief minister, and the other arm is his brother, and in the case he has none then his kin whom he can trust. In the case of king Pratapbhanu, both his minister and brother were excellent, and so he was very lucky and in a very fortunate situation.

In the next verse we read that this fortunate circumstance was complemented by the king having an excellent army at his command. This enabled him to extend his rule over vast stretches of the earth, and also to maintain good law and order situation.]

He had a vast army of countless veterans at his command. This army had four divisions or wings (sēna caturaṅga)<sup>1</sup>. The soldiers were all brave, courageous and fearless in the battle-field as well as in their commitment and loyalty to the king and the throne. (3)

When the king observed his mighty and virtually invincible forces, he felt very elated. To celebrate the occasion, trumpets and kettledrums were sounded tumultuously. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The ‘four wings’ of the army of those times traditionally consisted of horsemen, elephants, foot soldiers and chariots. Of course there were variants in the form of archers who used bows and arrows, soldiers who used swords, lancets and spear to fight hand-to-hand battles, the artillery brigade, the boomerangs, the battering-rams, etc. It was a formidable army no doubt.]

Being elated and confident of success, the king decided to launch a campaign to conquer the world. So he arrayed a huge army for this purpose, and determining an auspicious day when to start on his campaign, he marched forward with his army to the accompaniment of drums and other musical instruments to announce his departure. (5)

He fought many a battles with kings on the way who dared to oppose him, conquering them all by the might of his overwhelming force. (6)

[Note—All through history we come across such ambitious kings as Pratapbhanu was, those who led great military campaigns in order to extend their dominion over vast tracts of land. But the great lesson of history was lost and forgotten by them all—that for the time being they did manage to hold sway over the destiny of others, but the rules of Nature and of that of Creation always superseded their ambitious design and lust for power because the tide of time overturned everything upside down, great empires rose and fell, entire civilisations flourished and perished, and a time came when all such great conquerors and emperors whose rein once extended from one corner of the earth to the other, who prided themselves as being the owners and the rulers of the land where the ‘sun never sets’, had to die like all others, quite frequently miserably and in ignominy, probably also lost in obscurity with their memory covered in the dust of time when all their acquired riches and glory shrank and got lost, becoming merely some chapter in the pages of history which only a few interested bothered to open and read.]

sakala avani maṇḍala tēhi kālā. ēka pratāpabhānu mahipālā. 8.

The king conquered all the seven continents by the virtue of the strength of his arms. He demanded and got tributes (spoils of war in the form of taxes, gifts and compensations) from the kings he vanquished. And then he let them off, reinstating them back on their respective thrones as titular kings who were vassals under the Crown worn by Pratapbhanu<sup>1</sup>. (7)

Throughout the length and breadth of the land, the rein of Emperor Pratapbhanu was proclaimed and established (and there was no one to challenge him). He was the only Ruler of the earth in those times<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Pratapbhanu declared himself a supreme Emperor. So after subjugating these kings, he extracted huge tributes from them and made a treaty whereby these kings were restored their kingdoms with the condition that they would hold their title at the pleasure of the Emperor to whom all will owe their allegiance. They would pay regular tributes and stand in attendance in his court whenever called to do so. Otherwise, the punishment would be severe and swift, mostly in the form of their heads being severed.

This had been the norm with great conquerors since times immemorial.

<sup>2</sup>When Lord Ram became the king of Ayodhya, a similar situation prevailed during his time—for there was no other king who was a match for the Lord anywhere on this earth. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 22.]

After having conquered the whole world and making it surrender to the might of his arms, the king returned victorious to his own capital. He revelled and rejoiced in the light of the glory of his conquests and the acclaim that went with it; he enjoyed the spoils of war in the form of its riches, comforts and pleasures.

The king chose appropriate times to indulge in the various pastimes usual for great conquerors and emperors<sup>1</sup>, such as enjoying the comforts and pleasures of huge wealth (aratha), merit and fame that comes by following the laws of Dharma (i.e. by adhering to the principles of righteousness, probity and propriety inspite of being great and powerful; following religious practices—“dharama”), fulfilment of sensual pleasures and worldly desires, and so on and so forth (kāmadī). (Doha no. 154)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In Valmiki’s Ramayan, Lanka Kand, Canto 63, verse no. 9, Kumbhakaran has told Ravana that a person who enjoys things when the time is appropriate for them, such as enjoying meal when it is time to eat, going to sleep when it is time for it, relaxing and doing other activities at their proper and designated times, i.e. doing in the morning, in the afternoon and the evening things that are supposed to be done then, then such a person or a king is praised as being prudent, wise and intelligent; he is lauded as being a follower of Dharma.

So, king Pratapbhanu too followed this principle and did things at the proper and appropriate time.]

The earth became invigorated (green and lush) and started giving excellent yields (such as crops, minerals, fruits, vegetables, marine products etc.) when it got the support of the mighty arms of king Pratapbhanu. In fact, the earth became a personified form of the heavenly cow called ‘Kaam-dhenu’ which gives an abundance of milk and fulfils all the desires of those who seek anything from it.<sup>1</sup> (1)

There was no misery and pain of any kind that would make the subjects of the kingdom suffer in any way, and all the people were happy and contented. All the men and women were virtuous and adherents of the law of Dharma (principles of righteousness, probity, good conduct and thought), and their cheerful and pleasant physical appearances and demeanours showed that there was nothing that either worried them or made them feel unhappy.<sup>2</sup> (2)

[Note—When the earth is ruled by a good and noble king, there is happiness and prosperity everywhere. The subjects are taken well care of, and the fame of the king spreads to all corners of the earth. Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 21—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 22 where we read the same thing about the glory of the kingdom that was ruled by Lord Ram.

The kind of prosperous and rich kingdom that was established under king Pratapbhanu and the happiness of its subjects finds an exact resonance in the kingdom of Ayodhya that was ruled by Lord Ram. This is described in detail in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 20—to Doha no. 23.

The king's chief minister named Dharmaruchi was very virtuous and judicious, and true to his name he diligently followed the laws of Dharma (proper conduct and thought; upholding the principles of prudence, auspiciousness, righteousness, ethics, probity and propriety above all other considerations). He was also god-fearing and was devoted to Lord Hari whom he worshipped with great faith.<sup>1</sup>

He always thought for what would be good for the king, and was careful about the latter's welfare. Keeping this in mind, he always ensured that he would give wise and prudent advice to the king on day-to-day basis. (3)

The king made it a point to always serve and pay his obeisance and worship to his Guru (preceptor and moral guide), the Gods, the saints and pious men, the spirits of his ancestors, and the holy men known as Brahmins who are deemed to be representatives of Gods on earth. (4)

Whatever duties that the Vedas have prescribed for a king, he (Pratapbhanu) carried out all of them cheerfully and with due diligence with the thought that he was paying respect to the scriptures. Hence, he enjoyed doing his duties and fulfilling his obligations. (5)

He routinely gave liberal donations and made charities in various forms on a daily basis.

He also used to listen to religious discourses based on the Vedas, Purans and other scriptures<sup>1</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It was a normal practice with great kings to listen to religious discourses. The great king Dasrath, the king of Ayodhya and the father of Lord Ram too listened to them—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 359.

Even Lord Ram used to listen to such discourses regularly though he knew all the things that were told during such sessions. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 26.

We also read here that the scriptures were read and discussed in each household of Ayodhya during the reign of Lord Ram—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 26.

There is a wonderful book titled ‘Narad Bhakti Sutra’ which is dedicated to the theme of Bhakti or devotion for Lord God. In its verse no. 17 it is said that listening to the scriptures where the glories of the Lord are narrated helps to nourish Bhakti in the heart of a devotee. An English version of this book has been written and published by this author and is available on-line.]

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Usually a great king was expected to do the ‘Ashwamegh Yagya’, or the horse sacrifice. Even Lord Ram had done it. We also read that Lord Ram was very particular about following the path of religious practices and goodness as advised by the scriptures. The king was very wise and intelligent. He had never desired for anything.<sup>1</sup> (1)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The king was well-versed in the doctrines of the scriptures, and so he knew fully well that if a person leads an honourable life in accordance to the principles laid down in the scriptures then all good things in the world come to him even without his asking for them. So therefore, why should he worry about anything; why should he allow himself to be tainted with the negativity associated with 'desires and passions'?

Verily, all his needs, of the world and of the spirit, were being taken care of by his doing meritorious deeds and strictly following the religious path prescribed in the scriptures. So what sense was there in asking for things which he has in abundance, or even if he did not have them currently they would come to him by-and-by.

'Narad Bhakti Sutra', verse nos. 5 and 7 highly praise the virtue of not having any kind of desires.

<sup>2</sup>It has been said in the scriptures that the best form of service to the Lord God is to offer everything to him; all deeds and their fruits ought to be offered selflessly to the Lord. This is one of the best forms of Bhakti or devotion.

It is said that those deeds and their fruits that are not offered to the Lord God are worthy of shame, and it would be good not doing any such deed at all no matter how meritorious they may be.

In this context, the reader should refer to verse nos. 14, 19 and 61 of a wonderful text on Bhakti, called 'Narad Bhakti Sutra'. An English version of this book has been written and published by this author.]

Once upon a time, the king mounted his gallant horse and went on a hunting expedition with all his courtiers, and fully equipped with all the royal paraphernalia needed for the purpose. (3)

He entered the deep recesses of the forest nestling in the lap of the lofty ranges of the Vindhyachal Mountain in pursuit of game, and by-and-by shot many a beautiful deer and other wild animals. (4)

फिरत बिपिन नृप दीख बराहू । जनु बन दुरेउ ससिहि ग्रसि राहू ॥ ५ ॥ baṛa bidhu nahim samāta mukha māhīm. manahum'krōdha basa ugilata nāhīm. 6.

During the course of his hunting, he saw a majestic wild boar<sup>1</sup> that was roaming in the forest. He was so huge and awesome that it appeared that the demon 'Rahu' had come to hide in the wilds, fearing for his own life, after having eclipsed the moon<sup>2</sup>. (5)

It appeared that since the Moon was too large for the demon's mouth, the latter could not gobble it up, and this made the demon seethe with anger as he did not want to let the prey slip away<sup>3</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This was no ordinary wild boar. It was actually a demon named 'Kalketu' who had seven sons and ten brothers. Together they had been causing great horror for the Gods and the Brahmins. So king Pratapbhanu engaged them in a battle and killed all his sons and brothers, but the demon Kalketu managed to escape. He took a vow of revenge upon the king and hid in the forest looking for an opportunity. In due course of time he met a king who had also been defeated by Pratapbhanu in battle and who had managed to escape arrest and fled to the forest. This defeated king disguised himself as a hermit and waited for his chance for revenge.

As destiny would have it, both these arch enemies of king Pratapbhanu, who were buring with the fire of hate and revenge, joined hands and became friends-in-common-cause. The story of this boar and his friendship with the erstwhile king disguised as a hermit is narrated herein below in Chaupai line nos. 3-8 that precede Doha no. 170. They planned a wicked and nasty device which would bring ruin to king Pratapbhanu and his entire family.

<sup>2</sup>According to mythological legend, the demon 'Rahu' has only a head with a mouth with which it periodically gobbles up the Moon and the Sun. This marks the occurrence of the lunar and the solar eclipses respectively. Since the demon's head is severed from his neck, the Moon and the Sun first enter the demon's mouth and then eventually emerge from the hollow of the neck below. This marks the end of the eclipse.

Now Rahu gets frightened that the Moon God and the Sun God would punish him, so he runs away and hides in a thick forest where the light of neither the Moon nor the Sun can reach. This is said to be the legend.

The wild boar which king Pratapbhanu sighted in the dark forest was so huge and fearsome and fat that it resembled the demon Rahu who had the shape of a huge rounded ball because he had only his head.

<sup>3</sup>Actually what is being said here in a dramatic way is that the king wanted to shoot this wild boar, but no matter how hard he tried to achieve success in his effort, the boar always escaped him. This angered the king beyond measure, and so he pursued his game relentlessly, without bothering to be careful and seeking assistance from the soldiers and courtiers who were accompanying him as this would mean his personal defeat and humiliation.

We will read soon how the king's desire to hunt this boar without taking due precautions about his own security led him into the unknown depths of the forest where he got lost because all his companions were left behind while he was on hot pursuit of the game. Then as the fiat of fate had destined for him, he fell a victim of a trap laid by one of his enemies whom the king had defeated in battle some time in the past, and who was bidding for time to settle scores with him.]

The boar had enormous wide jaws; his body was of huge proportions; and he was very fat and bulky. (7)

When the boar heard the tramping sound of the hooves of the king's horse, he growled and grunted angrily and held his ears erect. (8)

When the king observed the huge wild boar who resembled the mighty mountain known as Neel Giri (literally the 'blue mountain') in its girth and the height, he got tempted so much to hunt him down that he whipped his steed and spurred it to move swiftly towards the boar, challenging the latter and saying that he would not be able to escape now<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 156)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In his enthusiasm and excitement, the king shouted at the boar. If he would have been wise and careful like a good and scrupulous hunter, he would have quietly shot an arrow to kill the boar instead of alerting it and giving it a chance to run away. But the king was so over-confident of his strength and powers that he forgot to follow rules. He forgot, for instance, that he is not in a battle-field facing a warrior whom he must challenge first before launching his attack as is the proper rule for a duel. A wild animal who is about to be shot dead won't wait for an arrow before fleeing from the spot for its dear life.]

When the wild boar saw the king's horse approach rapidly, he fled with the swiftness of wind. (1)

The king immediately mounted an arrow and shot it at the boar, but the latter, as soon as he observed the king aiming the arrow, stopped dead on its track and crouched low on the ground to hide himself in the surrounding undergrowth, thickets and wild grass that grew in abundance in the dense forest. (2) pragaṭata durata jā'i mṛga bhāgā. risa basa bhūpa calē'u saṁga lāgā. 4.

The boar repeatedly hid and reappeared as if to tease the king, who was so peeved and embarrassed at this apparent humiliation and virtual defeat that he kept on his hot pursuit of the boar angrily, and deciding not to give up he went very far and deep in the dense forest (without taking precautions about his own safety and calling for support from others in the royal entourage that had accompanied him)<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Thus the boar escaped the arrow and getting killed. We have read earlier that the boar was of a gigantic size and the king was moving at a great speed on his steed. Since the target was large, the king had aimed the arrow in its general direction. Besides this, he was astride a galloping horse, and to shoot an arrow the two hands must be free—one to hold the bow and the other to aim the arrow. It obviously means that the king had to let go of the rein of the horse while it was in swift motion in order to hold the bow, take aim and shoot the arrow. He was confident that the arrow will hit the bull's eye as the target was so huge, and so he must have aimed higher than is usual for a hunter aiming his arrow at an ordinary game.

But this game outwitted the hunter, for it immediately crouched and lay low on the ground in self-defence even as the arrow whizzed past it. Since the king's horse was moving at great speed, it overshot the boar. And by the time the king gathered his wits to look around and search for his prey, the latter rose and quickly vanished in the surrounding thickets in the dense forest.

By-and-by, the wild boar went deep into the thickest part of the dense forest where horses and elephants could not have any access (because this part of the forest was extremely dense and thick with wild undergrowth, thick trees, entangled creepers and tall wild grass). (5)

Though the king was all alone and frustrated, still he did not abandon his game to return back to his companions<sup>1</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Obviously, as has been noted earlier, he felt ashamed at his failure to hunt down a single boar, and what others would say of him when they found out that he returned empty-handed. This prospect was preposterous and intolerable for him. So he continued with his pursuit.]

When the boar discovered that the king was very resolute and would not give up his pursuit, he fled and hid himself swiftly in a dark and deep cave on the side of a great mountain. (7)

The king found to his utter dismay that he would not be able to enter that cave. Disgusted and frustrated, he at last turned back. But by this time he had gone so far deep in that foreboding forest that he lost his way in its dark and un-chartered environ. (8)

Overcome with dismay, frustration and humiliation, the distraught king was very thirsty and hungry. He held his tired and thirsty horse dejectedly, and roamed about in the forest searching for some water-body such as a pond or a stream to quench his and the horse's thirst and refresh themselves somewhat.

For want of water, the two, the king and the horse, were very agitated and almost on the edge of fainting. (Doha no. 157)

While so wandering in the forest, the king sighted a hermitage. In it lived a king disguised as a hermit. (1)

This king had been defeated by Pratapbhanu some time in the past, and his kingdom was conquered and subjugated by the victorious Pratapbhanu who failed to lay his hands on the defeated king as he managed to escape after abandoning his army and his subjects. But the vanquished king, who escaped from thus being captured, retreated to the forest to hide there in the form of a hermit, bidding for time to seek his revenge upon his enemy Pratapbhanu if a favourable opportunity presented itself by providence some time later on. (2) samaya pratāpabhānu kara jānī. āpana ati asamaya anumānī. 3.

gaya'u na gr̥ha mana bahuta galānī. milā na rājahi nṛpa abhimānī. 4.

This defeated king was full of grief and remorse, and thought that the while the time was bad and unfavourable for him it was good and favourable for Pratapbhanu (and so it was useless to resist then). (3)

Thus overcome with shame, regret and humiliation, he did not (or refused to) return to his palace, and abandoned the kingdom. He was too proud to surrender himself before the victorious king (Pratapbhanu) and make a treaty of peace with him<sup>1</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>As destiny would have it, it was this same king whom Pratapbhanu met in the forest, disguised as a hermit! Frankly speaking and to do justice to the vanquished king, no great self-respecting warrior would like to surrender his dignity and self-esteem by kneeling before his vanquisher, especially if he is attacked by someone without any provocation just because his opponent wishes to conquer the whole world by the might of his arm and make everyone bow before his ego as Pratapbhanu had wished.

So this king swallowed a bitter pill that was forced down his throat. Naturally he was filled with vengeance and hatred for Pratapbhanu.

We see in history that the higher one rises the more his ego becomes inflated, and the more he thinks that he is the chosen one, as the case of Pratapbhanu clearly depicts. Such a person becomes cocooned in his own world of grandiose self-belief, thinking that he is the greatest of them all. He gradually becomes a tyrant, a dictator and a hypocrite, someone who gets distanced from reality, someone who loses the virtues of humbleness and simplicity, and someone who has no friends but enemies all around him.

Pratapbhanu had risen to such great heights of unbridled power and authority that unwittingly he had surrounded himself with jealous enemies who were all bidding their times to settle scores with him but of whom he was not aware because they all wore a cloak of submission and loyalty to him while hating him from within.]

tāsu samīpa gavana nrpa kīnhā. yaha pratāparabi tēhiṁ taba cīnhā. 6.

Hence, the defeated king suppressed his anger and went to the forest like a poor man who is insulted, robbed of his rightful possessions and thrown out by someone who is rich and powerful, against whom this poor fellow is powerless to seek revenge. In the forest, this king hid himself in the disguise of a hermit. (5)

It was this king that Pratapbhanu approached when he sighted the hermitage in the thick forest. As soon as the king, who was disguised as a hermit, saw Pratapbhanu, he immediately recognized him (as his arch-enemy, the person who had usurped his kingdom and thrown him to such misery and humiliation). (6)

राउ तृषित नहिं सो पहिचाना । देखि सुबेष महामुनि जाना ॥ ७ ॥

utari turaga tēm kīnha pranāmā. parama catura na kahē'u nija nāmā. 4.

The king (Pratapbhanu) was very agitated and weary with thirst, and so he could not recognize who that hermit actually was. Hence when he saw the holy external appearance and attire of a hermit, he mistook the person living in the hermitage to be some great sage. (7)

He alighted from his horse and bowed reverentially to the (fake) hermit, but he took the precaution of not disclosing his name and who he was. (8)

[Note—The king's enemy who was disguised as a hermit immediately knew that the stranger was king Pratapbhanu, but the latter could not recognize who that hermit actually was. The reason is that Pratapbhanu was weary with thirst and emotionally exhausted so much that his mind did not function properly. Another reason is that the defeated king had disguised himself so perfectly that it was difficult to know his true identity. And third, during the course of his career of battles and wars and conquests, he had vanquished so many kings that it was not possible for him to keep track of each and every one whom he conquered and captured, and those who escaped.

What to talk of Pratapbhanu, even Lord Ram's great messenger Hanuman was misled by a demon named Kaalnemi who was sent by Ravana to capture and kill Hanuman while he was on his way to bring the herb to revive Laxman, the brother of Lord Ram, who lay wounded in the battle-field of Lanka during the epic war. We shall read about it in due course. Kaalnemi had also disguised himself as a hermit and created a nice magical hermitage with a pond of water. Hanuman too was thirsty, and when he saw that pond he went there to refresh himself. Hanuman also could not recognize the demon, and thought that he was some sage. But a demoness who was assigned the task to kill Hanuman went and hid as a crocodile in that pond. As soon as Hanuman went in the water, she caught hold of him, but was immediately slayed by the Lord's messenger. She disclosed Kaalnemi's truth and soon Hanuman slayed him.

This story is narrated in detail in Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 56—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 58.]

This false hermit observed that the king (Partapbhanu) was overcome with thirst, so he showed him the pond of water.

The king cheerfully took a bath and drank water himself, and also refreshed his horse likewise. Then he felt rejuvenated and energized once again. (Doha no. 158)

[Note—Obviously, Pratapbhanu felt obliged and was much grateful to this hermit. And in his elation he lost his usual discretion and caution. He felt that this is a true and helpful hermit who has virtually saved his and his horse's lives as if he was god-sent. The cunning hermit's demeanours and attires were so perfect that he gave no occasion for suspicion.

The pretentious hermit saw that Pratapbhanu was armed as he come a-hunting, while he himself was completely unarmed as a hermit ought to be. Besides it, he saw that a great chance has knocked at this door to settle old scores with his arch-enemy who has landed himself at his doorstep as if he was sent by providence.

So he concluded that if he played his cards carefully and with wisdom then he could fulfil his long-cherished wish to square up with Pratapbhanu. On the other hand, if he made one wrong move and Pratapbhanu could find out who that hermit actually was, he would be killed by well-armed king instantly. So the cunning hermit played his game to perfection and with care.]

When the guest king (Pratapbhanu) was fully refreshed and felt rejuvenated, he became cheerful. Then the hermit took him back to his hermitage.<sup>1</sup> (1)

Observing that the time for the sun to set had arrived, the hermit gave the king a seat to sit down and relax. Then he addressed the king with polite words. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This shows that the water-body was a little way off the hermitage. The false hermit accompanied Pratapbhanu to ensure that the latter did not go away after taking a bath, drinking water and refreshing himself. Because he rightly concluded that if he would be present at the site then the great king would be obliged to thank him and observe some basic courtesy by asking his leave, at which point the hermit would encourage him to come with him to his hermitage and take some rest before proceeding ahead with his journey.

Since it was almost night time, it would be easy to persuade the king to spend the night there in the safety of the hermitage because the forest was full of danger if one ventured into it during the darkness of the night. And if the things went the way the deceitful hermit planned quickly in his head, he would see to it that Pratapbhanu is ruined.

<sup>2</sup>The unsuspecting king agreed to stay overnight because he too did not wish to go forth through a forest with which he was not acquainted. And the treacherous hermit hit the dagger hard and sunk it till its hilt! He of course had to be polite if he wanted to trap the king into talking. Otherwise, the king could say he was tired and excuse himself to go and take rest.

So, as the king was already grateful to this hermit, he readily agreed to sit down and have a little chat with him when offered a seat and the hermit expressed a desire for some light talk.]

The hermit enquired politely, 'Say, who are you and why are you wandering alone in this wild forest? You are handsome and young, so why do you risk your precious life by venturing alone in this fierce wilderness?' (3)

I feel great pity for you because I see in you signs of a great emperor who rules over all the directions of the earth like it were a great circle of his dominion (cakrabarti)'.

I was hunting and pursuing a game when I lost my way. It is due to good fortune that I came here and saw your holy feet. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The king tried to be extra careful here. He was aware that he is renowned for being truthful, but here the situation demanded that he cannot speak the truth for fear of disclosing his identity to a stranger. So he devised a device by saying half-truth, that he was a minister with king Pratapbhanu. In a way he gave a hint to the stranger that if a king's minister is so great that he has signs and an air of a great ruler who rules over all the directions of the earth, then one can imagine the glory and majesty of the king under whom this minister works.

Refer Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 158 herein above where we read that at the time the king first met the hermit he had not disclosed his name then also. The reason is that wisdom and discretion dictates that a king should keep his identity secret in an alien land for he can't be sure whether he is amongst friends or foes.]

The hermit replied, 'My dear, it is dark already now, and your capital city is at a distance of seventy yojans (roughly five hundred and sixty miles) from here<sup>1</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The cunning hermit smiled on the sly at his good fortune and thought to himself—"Well, well; it seems that the king is about to fall in my net, if only I could manoeuvre things a little more to my liking."

tulasī jasi bhavatabyatā taisī mila'i sahā'i.
āpunu āva'i tāhi pahim tāhi tahām'lai jā'i. 159 (b).

Tulsidas (the learned poet-saint who composed this classic tale called Ram Charit Manas) observes in a solemn way that whatever is destined by destiny and is inevitable in one's fate is invariably preceded by circumstances and developments that lead up to the main chain of events. Either such circumstances or developments come to visit at the doorstep of a person who is to face some fiat of providence, or he is himself pulled along involuntarily towards those circumstances and developments that would lead to situations that would be in sync with his destiny. (Doha no. 159-b)

[Note—Put simply it means that what is destined to happen would happen, and no one can change it. There are certain developments in everyone's life which support this conclusion, when no matter how hard one tries and devises things his way they would always go against his wishes and what he had hoped for. In the same way, some unexpected developments occur of which one has no inkling, but they pull him out of some intractable situation which seemed to him almost hopeless a moment ago.

In the present case, Pratapbhanu's destiny brought him face to face with a person whom he had vanquished himself some time ago, but unfortunately he could not recognize him. Though no power on earth could stand the might of Pratapbhanu if all such powers united against him in battle, a lone, poor and unarmed erstwhile king who has been disenfranchised from his kingdom and power by Pratapbhanu who had trounced him would prove one day to be his nemesis and vanquisher without even a fight.

A king who would have knelt before Pratapbhanu in the battle-field praying for mercy, now has the latter bowing before him in gratitude for saving his life by providing him water to drink!

A king whose ruin was caused at the hands of Pratapbhanu now became the cause of ruin of Pratapbhanu himself—and that too without a fight. And the greatest irony is that the prey (Pratapbhanu) came to be killed voluntarily by him (the defeated king now disguised as a hermit) who he had earlier wished to destroy in battle.

This Doha essentially says that “destiny, fate and providence are very powerful forces in a person’s life, and whatever is to happen will surely happen in one’s life no matter how hard one tries to change or avoid it”.]

Accepting the offer of the hermit gladly, the king said, ‘Alright oh Lord’, and went to tie the horse to a tree. Then he came back and sat down before the hermit<sup>1</sup>. (1)

The king praised the hermit a lot, bowed at his feet, and congratulated himself (at finding a friendly person in the midst of a hopeless situation)<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This shows that till now the king had been standing with his horse, but now that he has to spend the night in the hermitage he tied the horse to a tree and came to sit down comfortably.

<sup>2</sup>The king was all praises for this hermit because he felt that the latter was a nice person: first the hermit had shown him water, even accompanied to the pond for the sake of courteousness, and now he has requested the king to spend the night at the hermitage because it was already dark and night had come, the path back to his city was long, and it passed through a dense and hostile forest. The king already had an experience of the sort of wild forest he would have to cross because it was in this forest that he had lost his way. So when offered the chance of staying overnight, he gladly accepted it as god-sent.

In the situation in which the king found himself currently, any other person in his place too would have felt obliged to the hermit who played the role of a perfect host who was most courteous and hospitable.]

mōhi munīsa suta sēvaka jānī. nātha nāma nija kahahu bakhānī. 4.

After he was comfortably seated and felt thankful to the hermit for the hospitality offered by him, the king said most politely, using sweetness in his voice, ‘Oh Lord! I regard you as my father<sup>1</sup>, and so I am venturing to speak to you out of turn. [To wit, even though you have not asked me to say anything, nevertheless I feel sufficiently free to talk to you as a son would to his father, for there is no formality between the two of them.] (3)

Oh sage, you too should regard me as your son and follower, and so please be kind to tell me your name (so that I may become aware about who you are)<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The king wished to show his respect to the hermit and express his thanks to him. He calls the latter his ‘father’ because a hermit and a sage are no less respectable than a father for a man. Besides this, the hermit had saved his life by showing him water and asking him no to venture into the wild forest in the night as it would be too dangerous for his security.

While addressing the king earlier in Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 159, the hermit had used the affectionate word ‘tāta’ for the king, which means “oh dear”, a term that is usually used in classical texts for someone who is very dear, such as a son. So the king reciprocated this gesture by addressing the hermit as his father.

There is another point here. The king was in the company of a stranger with whom he had to pass the night. So he thought it wise to create some kind of close bond, even if it was superficial or artificial, with his host so that the latter’s conscience would stop him from doing any mischief while the king was unarmed and asleep.

<sup>2</sup>Earlier the hermit too had asked the king who he was in Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 159, so the king decided that there was no harm in asking the hermit his name. This was also done to start a conversation, and to keep busy and pass time. It would also help the king to reward the hermit after he returned to his capital the next day.]

The king could not recognize who the hermit was, but the latter had immediately known who his guest actually was as soon as he saw the king<sup>1</sup>.

The king was simple-hearted and had no deceit in him, but the hermit was a cunning fraud who was skilled in conceit and pretensions. (5)

In the first instance the hermit was an enemy, and then he was a Kshatriya by race (i.e. a warrior), and to top it all he was an erstwhile king who was defeated and his kingdom usurped. So (since he was seething with anger) he wished to accomplish his task (of seeking revenge) by hook or by crook<sup>2</sup>. (6)

There are three things mentioned here which went squarely against Pratapbhanu—viz. (i) the hermit being a king who was defeated by Pratapbhanu, and whose kingdom was conquered and subjugated by him, (ii) the hermit being a warrior by birth, and for such a person the greatest humiliation in life is defeat and being forced to run away from the battle-field, and (iii) the hermit being the guest's arch enemy. All these three factors went against Pratapbhanu.

This situation was made worse and exacerbated because the king could not recognize his enemy so that he could have been alert and taken due precautions. The cunning hermit played his cards well and expertly by being most polite and courteous so that no suspicion was raised in the mind of the king. And he mightily succeeded in his game-plan because the king actually failed to recognize his enemy and fell right into the trap laid out for him by his sworn enemy!

The hermit had been waiting for such an opportunity for a long time when he could extract his revenge upon his enemy Pratapbhanu, and now this opportunity came knocking at his door. As the hermit had been a king himself before he was defeated by Pratapbhanu and had to escape and hide in the forest, he knew the tricks of the trade well, and so he knew how to trap an enemy without harming his own interests and extract whatever he wanted from the latter.

So we see the irony of fate here and the truth of what has been said as a maxim in Doha no. 159-b herein above that “destiny, fate and providence are very powerful forces in a person's life, and whatever is to happen will surely happen in one's life no matter how hard one tries to change or avoid it”.]

The disenfranchised and disinherited king (i.e. the hermit) had remembered the pleasures and comforts of royalty which had been snatched away from him. So he was burning with a fire of hatred and vengeance for the person (i.e. Pratapbhanu) who had robbed him of such privileges. (7)

Hearing with his ears the king's unsuspecting and polite words, he (i.e. the cunning hermit) felt very happy and reassured in his heart (that now finally he would achieve his objective and square up with his arch enemy). (8)

दो०. कपट बोरि बानी मृदुल बोलेउ जुगुति समेत ।

kapaṭa bōri bānī mṛdula bōlē'u juguti samēta.
nāma hamāra bhikhāri aba nirdhana rahita nikēta. 160.

The pretentious hermit spoke artfully words that were polite on their face but ambiguous and full of deceit. He said, 'My name now is a 'beggar', because I am poor and without a home of my own.<sup>1</sup>' (Doha no. 160)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The king ought to have taken note of these words, but he failed. A true hermit would never refer to himself as a 'beggar (bhikhāri)' to hint at his hidden regret of having left the pleasures and wealth of a household. A hermit is expected to be happy and cheerful in his chosen way of life of renunciation and meditation. This should have rung alarm bells for Pratapbhanu, but as destiny had wished his fall he overlooked the obvious, so deluded his mind was.

Perhaps the king missed the obvious because he thought that the hermit was being truthful as indeed he had no wealth at present. But at the same time, he concluded, that prior to becoming a hermit he was a rich man—as hinted by the hermit saying that 'now I am a beggar' with no home and riches. That means he had them previously.

The hermit knew how a king thinks and treats others. If the other person is of a noble and rich bearing and heritage, a king would treat him with respect; otherwise he pays little or no attention to him. For the hermit to succeed in his game-plan, it was absolutely necessary for him to gain Pratapbhanu's full attention and confidence. He decided that the chances of Pratapbhanu paying more heed to what he says and accept his advice would be high if the king thought that this hermit was of a noble upbringing but had left all his wealth due to his spiritual urges. This is why it is said here that the hermit "spoke artfully" words that had dual meaning—it was first to test how alert his victim was, and then to inspire so much confidence in him that he would not question the hermit's integrity when he actually began implementing his nefarious design to wreak revenge upon the unsuspecting king.]

सदा रहहिं अपनपौ दुराएँ । सब बिधि कुसल कुबेष बनाएँ ॥ २ ॥

kaha nrpa jē bigyāna nidhānā. tumha sārīkhē galita abhimānā. 1.
sadā rahahim apanapau durā'ēm̐. saba bidhi kusala kubēṣa banā'ēm̐. 2.

The king (Pratapbhanu) replied, 'Those who are intelligent and repositories of wisdom and prudence, as well as free from pride and ego like you [1], always keep the reality about themselves and their glory secret and hidden from others like you have done, for they feel that it is always better to remain incognito and conceal their proficiency and knowledge by remaining in tattered clothes (so that no one pays attention to them and leaves them alone in peace) [2]. (1-2)

[Note—We observe that the king was also speaking in a language that conveyed a double meaning—for what he said might be a genuine praise of a wise and enlightened sage or hermit who wish to remain anonymous so that no one comes to disturb him to seek favours, and at the same time it may mean that the king praised the hermit in sarcasm to indicate that he has indeed recognized who this hermit actually was but was being courteous as the latter had extended warm hospitality to the former.

From what we shall be reading in a moment now, the former case is true—for the king had praised the hermit with a genuine spirit of respect for him and a belief that he was fortunate to have met a nice hermit in the wild forest who came to his rescue when he was lost and would have faced a grave situation during the night in a dangerous place full of wild beasts.

The king's overwhelming sense of gratitude and relief at having found some humble and an apparently holy man was so great that it eclipsed his own wisdom and disarmed him of his usual sense of precaution and prudence. The king fell for the holy attire of the fraudster.

A message that is conveyed by this story is that one should never let down one's guard and take anyone at face value, for more often than not appearances are very misleading.

A true hermit or ascetic would indeed like to live anonymously. Though he may have mystical powers and may be very wise and learned, yet he wishes to be left alone so that he can pursue his spiritual goals. He does not want to be disturbed and mobbed by favour seekers who would flock to him for their worldly desires to be fulfilled if the word leaked out that a particular sage or hermit or ascetic can alleviate their troubles by his spiritual powers. No one in his right senses would normally like to be associated with a beggar in tattered clothes, and so a wise hermit would dress himself accordingly in rags to avoid worldly company.

Besides this, a hermit is expected to be free from pride and ego; he is not supposed to go boasting about his past achievements or present spiritual prowess. So the king said that he respected the hermit for his humbleness and lack of pride inspite of being full of wisdom and abilities. It is not easy to live and survive alone in the middle of the wilderness, surrounded by an uninhabitable forest full of wild beasts, away from civilization and all possible human contact. So a hermit or an ascetic who manages to do so successfully obviously must have some exceptional powers that other men do not possess. Hence, when the king saw the circumstances in which this hermit lived in the middle of a wild forest he was naturally overcome with awe and determined that this was a truly holy man who deserved his praise.]

तेहि तें कहहिं संत श्रुति टेरे । परम अकिंचन प्रिय हरि केरे ॥ ३ ॥

तुम्ह सम अधन भिखारि अगेहा । होत बिरंचि सिवहि संदेहा ॥ ४ ॥

tēhi tēm kahahim santa śruti ṭērēm. parama akiñcana priya hari kērēm. 3.
tumha sama adhana bhikhāri agēhā. hōta biran̄ci sivahi sandēhā. 4.

Verily indeed it is asserted by the Vedas and great saints that those who are simple and unpretentious, who have no worldly assets and attachments are dear to the Lord God<sup>1</sup>. (3)

When the Creator (biran̄ci) and Lord Shiva see someone who is as penniless and homeless as you are, even they begin to doubt about the actual powers and abilities of such a person. [This being the case, how can I know who you actually are or about your spiritual powers and achievements when even the two senior Gods of the Trinity, i.e. the creator Brahma and the concluder Shiva fail to know in depth about the exalted state of persons like you.]<sup>2</sup> (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, the Lord loves those who are attached and devoted to none except the Lord himself, those for whom the Lord is the only wealth, only kin and only support. The Lord does not like a hermit or an ascetic who goes around boasting about his spiritual status. He likes the humble and the meek. The same idea is expressed in the New Testament of the Holy Bible, St. Matthew, 5/3-8; and Galatians, 5/23.

It has been said in the Upanishads and other scriptures that a Sanyasi, i.e. a person who has renounced the world and taken the vows of renunciation ought not to lust for worldly name and wealth any longer. It is because worldly contact creates a disturbance for the hermit's or ascetic's mind and creates a hindrance in his spiritual pursuit. This is also the reason given by this hermit in Doha no. 161 herein below.

The king is being wise and cautious here also, and a bit sarcastic. He defends his inability to recognize the real identity of the hermit because of his holy garb which has such a powerful influence upon the mind of the beholder who is usually trained and accustomed to show the greatest of respect to this attire as well as the person who wears it. This is because the attire of a hermit or an ascetic is universally respected by one and all, and even the great Gods such as Brahma and Shiva pay their homage to a person who is attired like a hermit and an ascetic.

So therefore, the king says that he is paying homage to this 'attire of a hermit' without going into further details about the person himself because he who dons a holy garb is to be shown due respect, especially when he exhibits other glorious traits of humbleness, simplicity, lack of pride and desire for worldly riches as asserted by Vedas and great saints, and as exhibited by his host in the present instance.

Earlier we have read that the king calls this cunning hermit his 'father-like' in Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 160. And now he praises the cunning hermit by comparing him with some great sage who is attired in a holy garb and is extremely humble and wise. So once again the king takes a precaution not to arouse any suspicion in the mind of a stranger in whose company he has to spend the night in a forest. He does not want that the hermit, in case he is some scoundrel, get a hint that the king doubts his integrity because that would be very dangerous for the king's own security. But at the same time, by saying that even great Gods do not know the reality of someone who is in a holy garb such as that of a hermit or an ascetic, the king gives a subtle hint that he is not fully convinced of the truth about his host!

The next verse clearly implies that the king is not fully convinced about the authenticity of the hermit, but he still shows respect to him because of his attire of a hermit which is respectable and makes its wearer an object of respect.]

जोसि सोसि तव चरन नमामी । मो पर कृपा करिअ अब स्वामी ॥ ५ ॥

Whoever you are, I still bow at your feet and pay my respects to you. Now, oh lord, be kind upon me and bless me by your grace<sup>1</sup>. (5)

The hermit observed that the king had indeed been unable to recognize him, and instead has developed great faith, respect and affection for him. [To wit, instead of being suspicious of the hermit, the king developed great affection for his cunning host, and became totally submissive to him.]

So the hermit was now confident that he would be able to carry out his plans as he had wished<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The king urges the hermit to spare him because he is bowing at his feet as a token of surrender. The king thought that in case this stranger hermit had some sense of conscience and humanity in him, then no matter who he is he will be bound by guilt if he does any harm to someone who has surrendered unconditionally before him. Well, this principle applies under normal conditions to someone who is noble in heart, naturally merciful by disposition, of high thinking and exemplary scruples, but not to someone who is burning with the fire of revenge.

Here the hermit is burning with a desire for vengeance, and so whatever scruples and morality he may have in his conscience were reduced to ashes in the raging fire of retribution.

<sup>2</sup>And what was the hermit's plan and wish? It was to settle old scores with king Pratapbhanu and ruin him. Now that he was successful in gaining the full confidence of the king, the hermit prepared for his next move. He wanted to drive the dagger home till its hilt. To wit, he decided that if he took revenge just now he would be able to easily kill the king who was alone, but it would far better if he maneuvered things in such a way that the entire family of the king is ruined for generations to come. So he did not hurry with plunging the dagger right then and there!]

Hence, the hermit played the next move of his game by showing greater affection to the (unfortunate and unaware) king with the aim of winning him over completely and acquiring his full confidence without a trace of doubt<sup>1</sup>. (7)

So he said, 'Listen oh great king<sup>2</sup>! I am telling you all that is the truth. A lot of time has passed while I have lived here. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The false-hermit was by this time convinced that he has succeeded in his plan to deceive the king and get his confidence. The king treated him with great respect just like a great king would treat a hermit who comes visiting his court. The king was not only full of praise for the hermit but also bowed before him, called him a 'fatherly' figure, and now seeks his 'blessings'.

<sup>2</sup>We have read earlier that the king had never told who he actually was. In Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 159 the king had told the hermit that he was a 'chief minister' of king Pratapbhanu. So now when the hermit addressed him as 'the king', he was more convinced of the hermit's mystical powers which enabled him to know the truth of who his guest was!

This simple ploy of the hermit pulled the innocent king nearer to the trap that was being spread out for him for now he was sure that this hermit was no ordinary man but one who has transcendental powers.]

[The hermit continued—] 'No one has met me till now (for I live far away from populated areas, in a remote and secluded part of the forest), and neither do I (prefer to) reveal my identity to anyone. I prefer anonymity because worldly recognition and honour are like a fire that destroys the symbolic forest of Tapa (spiritual benefits gained by practicing austerity and penance).<sup>1</sup> [To wit, a true hermit and ascetic are expected to avoid company with others and lead a life in obscurity and serenity so that he can pursue his spiritual objectives without any interference.] (Doha no. 161-a)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The cunning hermit wishes to keep the king engaged in conversation and gain more access to his confidence so that he would tie the noose more tightly. He knew that king Pratapbhanu was extremely ambitious and had a hidden desire to conquer the whole world, as this was the only reason why he had attacked and conquered, without any provocation, the kingdom of which this hermit of ours was a king earlier. So if the guest king could somehow be cajoled into believing that luckily he has now met a great hermit who possesses supernatural powers, then it is quite possible that he may seek the hermit's help to fulfill his desires and complete whatever remnants of victory that still elude him, and successfully conquer those territories that are still not under his sovereignty.

The hermit therefore tried to impress the king about the magical powers that he possesses, about his great spiritual prowess and special achievements, that usually come to great hermits and ascetics by the virtue of their doing severe Tapa. With these powers the hermits and ascetics can achieve stupendous feats that ordinary mortals cannot even think of.]

सो०. तुलसी देखि सुबेषु भूलहि मूढ़ न चतुर नर ।
सुंदर केकिहि पेखु बचन सुधा सम असन अहि ॥ १६१ ( ख ) ॥

sōraṭhā.

tulasī dēkhi subēṣu bhūlahirṁ mūrha na catura nara.
sundara kēkihi pēkhu bacana sudhā sama asana ahi. 161 (b).

Tulsidas observes that an honourable and pleasant-looking attire and appearance often misleads everyone, for not only the ordinary people but even those who are intelligent and sagacious are deceived by them.

See the peacock; it is so beautiful to look at (with its fantastically wonderful plumes that have an array of colours), and it also has a voice that is attractive and sweet to hear, but ironically it feeds on poisonous snakes. (Sortha no. 136-b)

[Note—The learned poet Tulsidas (who has written this book Ram Charit Manas) makes a great point here as a warning for all of us: that one should not judge someone by his looks, for appearances are more often deceiving and do not tell the truth. So one must always be on guard when dealing with strangers and unknown situations.

A peacock is so lovely to look at from the outside, but it is so horrible from inside that it devours snakes and manages to digest the reptile. The snake that would kill one and all by its poison is unable to harm the peacock because the latter is more poisonous than the snake, and hence is easily able to neutralize the weaker poison contained in the body of the snake.

Who would believe that a bird which looks so pleasant from the outside and has a sweet voice would have such strong poisonous instincts that it does not fear the poison of the snake and easily gobbles it up?

To wit, a person who by his appearances looks very friendly and helpful may actually be some dangerous scoundrel preying for a victim, who will stab one behind one's back without warning so much so that even while putting up a show of warmth with an affectionate embrace, he may gladly and without any remorse drive a knife in the back of the unsuspecting victim during this embrace.

One thing is to be noted here. The voice of a peacock is not actually 'sweet and pleasant' as it is made out to be here, for it is shrill and sharp. But the peacock usually cries out in jubilation when it sees the dark rain-bearing clouds in the sky at the onset of the rainy season. So therefore, the peacock's cry against the background of the sound of thunder of the approaching storm and rain appears very pleasant to hearer because it signals the arrival of rain that is welcomed by one and all at the end of a harsh summer.]

prabhu jānata saba binahīṁ janā'ēm'. kahahu kavani sidhi lōka rijhā'ēm'. 2.

The Lord is all-knowing and he knows everything without saying a word or being told of anything. So therefore, say, what use is there in trying to please and appease the world<sup>3</sup>? (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The hermit has already given the reason for it in Doha no. 161-a herein above. And he further elaborates on it now onwards.

<sup>2</sup>To wit, I spend my time in meditation and contemplation and worship of Lord Hari with great devotion. Being a true hermit and an ascetic, why should I waste my time and energy by thinking of other things and worrying about them? I feel contented in my spiritual pursuits, and prefer to lead a calm and serene life in seclusion, away from all contacts and free from attachments. My basic needs are taken care of by the Lord, and so there is no occasion for me to venture outside into the world.

<sup>3</sup>The pretentious hermit is so cunning that he speaks excellent words of wisdom like a really great, sagacious and enlightened saint so as to convince the king of his noble thoughts and greatness, make him more faithful and devoted towards himself. A truly faithful devotee of the Lord God would seek from no one except his Lord. So the hermit tries to impress upon the gullible king that he is a loyal devotee of Lord Hari, and hence a holy and reliable soul, for devotees of Lord Hari are deemed to be pure in heart and pious souls.

A cheat and a scoundrel would go to any length to achieve his objectives, and he has no compunctions or reservations in employing any dirty trick he can think of as long as his nefarious design succeeds. Lying and falsehoods cause no embarrassment to such persons.]

तुम्ह सुचि सुमति परम प्रिय मोरें । प्रीति प्रतीति मोहि पर तोरें ॥ ३ ॥
अब जाँ तात दुरावउँ तोही । दारुन दोष घटइ अति मोही ॥ ४ ॥

tumha suci sumati parama priya mōrēm. prīti pratīti mōhi para tōrēm. 3.
aba jaum tāta durāva'um' tōhī. dārūna dōṣa ghaṭa'i ati mōhī. 4.

You (the guest king) have a clean conscience and purity of mind; that is why I have (developed an) affection for you and have confidence in you. (3)

My dear, this being the case, if I hide anything from you then it would be a great sin on my part<sup>1</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>What was the thing that the hermit alluded to when he said that he did not want to hide anything from the king? Well, in the beginning this hermit has told the king that he does not want to reveal to anyone who he was, what mystical powers he possessed, or anything else about his spiritual life and achievements, and especially not to a stranger. He has always preferred to remain anonymous and hidden from publicity. This is clearly evident from Doha nos. 160 and 161, and Chaupai line no. 1 that follows Doha no. 161.

But then now the same hermit has revealed quite a bit about himself before the king—that he worships Lord Hari and is the Lord's great devotee, that he seeks from no one except Lord Hari, that he has lived in seclusion for a long time doing Tapa, that he has transcendental powers by which he could know that his guest was ‘a king’ and ‘not a king’s minister’ though the guest himself told him that he was king Pratapbhanu’s chief minister, and so on.

So the hermit now gives a reason why he confided in the king and told him some secrets that he has not revealed to anyone else till now—and it is that he was very impressed by the king’s simplicity and faith in him, and so he decided that when one pure heart meets another pure heart there should be openness between the two.

This was a very clever ploy as it further reinforced the king’s trust in the hermit. It helped the hermit to appeal to the natural emotions of the king to open up with a holy person; the king would now be encouraged to share some of the secrets in his own heart with the hermit just as the hermit has shared some of his own secrets with him in a voluntary way. The hermit correctly guessed that the king would overcome his initial reluctance and open up.

And what message is there in this verse? It is that those who really and truly trust each other should have an open heart and not hide anything between them. This attitude helps them bond and come to each other’s aid in times of need. It also helps both the partners to seek and give selfless advice on various matters. But at the same time it is of utmost importance that one chooses one’s partner most carefully and take due precautions and undertake diligence before reposting complete faith on anyone. For otherwise, one would be doomed as was the unfortunate case of king Pratapbhanu who fell prey to a scoundrel’s sweet words.]

dēkhā svabasa karma mana bānī. taba bōlā tāpasa bagadhyānī. 6.

The more the hermit talked of indifference to the world and his devotion to spiritual pursuits, the more the king’s faith in him increased. (5)

When the false and deceitful hermit, who was like a cunning crane preying on its victim<sup>1</sup>, determined that the king had developed full trust and faith in him so much so that he has become fully devoted to him in his thought, word and deed, he (the hermit) said—(6)

kahahu nāma kara aratha bakhānī. mōhi sēvaka ati āpana jānī. 8.

When the king heard this, he bowed his head (in reverence)<sup>2</sup> and said—(7)

‘Please consider me to be your devoted follower (or servant) and explain to me the meaning of your name. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The hermit is trying to become more and more informal with the king in his effort of developing greater rapport with him. We note that the hermit is playing his trick very expertly, step-by-step, in order to judge how much the king is willing to yield himself to the former.

So therefore now the hermit uses a dearer and more informal term of address for someone, such as the word ‘brother’. He goes a step further in his effort to draw the unsuspecting king, who was slowly slipping into the trap being laid out by the villainous hermit, closer to him with greater trust and faith when he would address the king as his ‘son’ in the Chaupai that follows Doha no. 162 herein below.

The word ‘Ekatanu’ is explained by him in the next Doha no. 162 herein below.

दो०. आदिसृष्टि उपजी जबहिं तब उतपति भै मोरि ।

नाम एकतनु हेतु तेहि देह न धरी बहोरि ॥ १६२ ॥

dōhā.

ādisṛṣṭi upajā jabahim taba utapati bhai mōri.

nāma ēkatanu hētu tēhi dēha na dharī bahōri. 162.

[The hermit replied—] ‘I was born when the creation came into being. My name is ‘Elatanu’ which means ‘one who has had only a single body’, for I never died and therefore I hadn’t taken a birth again. [To wit, I have been in this body of a hermit which you see now ever since the dawn of creation, for I never died, and so there was no need for me to take a new birth again.]<sup>1</sup> (Doha no. 162)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Of all the claims that this hermit made this was the most outlandish. This is a mortal world, and no creature can claim immortality for its gross body; no human being can claim that his gross body has survived and lived in the same way since the beginning of creation. It’s absurd and impossible.

This ridiculous claim of the hermit should have rung alarm bells for the king. But as destiny had planned otherwise, the king’s wisdom was eclipsed and he could not see the tell-tale signs of lies and falsehood in the hermit's words of excessive absurdity.

Well, the hermit made a final test to see whether some sense of prudence and common sense still was left with the king, or has he become totally numbed in his mind and intellect. When a thug wants to rob his victim, he first gives him some intoxicating substance, and then waits and watches what effect it has on the victim. Only when he finds that the drug has its full effect upon the prey that the villain strikes and then flees with the booty.

There is one very interesting observation that can be made here in connection with the word 'Ekatanu'. While one of its meanings is as described above—i.e. a person who has had the same body since the creation started, the other meaning is that 'I have no other physical body', or 'I don't have a second or duplicate body'. If we were to take this second meaning into consideration then also we conclude that the king had been very stupid not to realize that no one has a 'duplicate body' or a 'parallel body' or 'a second body other than one's own body'. The hermit was playing a trick with words upon the king—and the deluded king could not see through it!

This term may also mean that the hermit was the 'only son of his parents'. If he had some other sibling, especially a 'twin', then it could be said that there is another person in the likeness of the hermit as brothers carry the same genes in them, have the same parents, and their features also match each other to a great extent.]

tapabala tēm jaga srja'i bidhātā. tapabala biṣṇu bha'ē paritrātā. 2.
tapabala sambhu karahīm saṅghārā. tapa tēm agama na kachu sansārā. 3.

[The hermit continued to explain to the king the meaning of his name. Thus he said—
] 'Oh son<sup>1</sup>, don't be surprised at all about this (that I have not died and thus have been able to live through countless ages with this same body with which I took birth at the beginning of creation as I have told you about myself). For, nothing is impossible by the virtue of the powers granted by doing Tapa (strict spiritual practices such as observing austerity, doing penance and offering self-sacrifices)<sup>2</sup>. (1)

[Elaborating upon the stupendous powers and astounding abilities that are granted by doing Tapa, the hermit said—] The creator Brahma creates this universe on the strength of Tapa; it is on the strength of Tapa that Lord Vishnu is able to take care of this creation and provide for its needs; (2)

Lord Shiva is able to conclude or bring to an end this creation by relying on the powers granted by Tapa.

Verily indeed, there is nothing impossible and there is nothing that can't be done or achieved in this world by relying on the strength of Tapa.<sup>3</sup> (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Earlier the hermit had addressed the king as a 'brother', and now he addresses him as a 'son'. This is an obvious attempt on his part to gain the king's unbridled confidence and faith. The hermit plays subtly on the king's emotions by referring to the king's own submission at the time he accepted the hermit's offer to spend the night at the hermitage when the king had said to the hermit that he was like a 'father' for him—refer: Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 160.

The cunning hermit decided that before he bared his fangs and dug his teeth deep into the victim it is crucial for him that his prey is firmly in his clutches so much so that he would do the hermit's bidding faithfully and obediently like a devoted disciple who carries out his Guru's (preceptor's) orders without asking any questions or expressing any doubts.

<sup>2</sup>When the hermit had said that he has retained the same body ever since the dawn of creation, without dying and taking birth even once, the king was incredulous and absolutely astonished as this seemed to be an outlandish and impractical suggestion that defied the laws of Nature. The clever hermit was closely observing every gesture and expression on the face of the king, so he immediately picked up the signal that the king is not ready to take this bait so easily. Hence, he went on an overdrive to explain why he has managed to retain the same body ever since taking birth at the beginning of civilization.

He gave credit to his doing severe Tapa for this most magical feat. This explanation seemed reasonable and acceptable to the king because he was himself very well-versed in the doctrines of religious practices and knew that anything can be achieved by the force and power of Tapa. He knew that Tapa grants transcendental and supernatural powers to its practitioners.

When the hermit observed that the king seemed satisfied with this explanation, he felt very glad in his heart, because now he could use this ruse of his being able to do the impossible by the powers gained by him due to his Tapa in order to give effect to his nefarious designs to take revenge upon the king, as would be evident shortly.

<sup>3</sup>The hermit wished to be sure that the king is convinced of his reasoning that he has been able to live with the same body for ages after ages on the strength of Tapa. So he cites some of the irrefutable proofs for it—that of Brahma, Vishnu and Shiva. Even the scriptures have endorsed this point that these three Gods of the Trinity gain their powers by doing Tapa.]

udabhava pālana pralaya kahānī. kahēsi amita ācaraja bakhānī. 6.

Hearing these sagacious words of wisdom, the king felt very enamoured of the hermit and developed great admiration for him.

Then the hermit began to tell him many ancient stories and antecedents from the Purans (mythological histories)<sup>1</sup>. (4)

He (the hermit) then gave a lengthy discourse on the principles of Karma and Dharma (the principles governing deeds and righteousness as laid down in the scriptures) along with many stories that would explain these doctrines.

He also gave discourses elaborating on the virtues of Gyan (gnosis; knowledge and spiritual enlightenment) and Vairagya (renunciation and detachment).<sup>2</sup> (5)

He told the king many wonderful and fascinating stories about this creation—about its origin, its sustenance, and its final end, stories that were awe-inspiring and interesting. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It was a usual practice in ancient times that when someone went to a great sage and sought his blessings, the sage would spend some quality time with his guest by talking about the scriptures and spiritual topics. Great sages who had established hermitages would routinely give discourses on ancient scriptures and explain them to the host of other junior sages and disciples who lived with him to acquire knowledge.

<sup>2</sup>The hermit wanted to keep the king engaged in conversation and create an impression on him. He wanted to subtly tell the king that he was no ordinary hermit but was indeed a great and learned sage who is well acquainted with all the scriptures as a sage ought to be, and there is aught nothing that he knows not. That he lives alone and does not have many juniors surrounding him does not mean that he is not highly knowledgeable and wise.

So therefore he gave a long discourse on a wide variety of topics so that the king is fully convinced of his greatness and vast knowledge.]

Hearing all these wise talks, the king was fully convinced of the greatness of this hermit, and he developed full faith in him. The king now trusted the hermit so much that he proceeded to disclose his real name to the latter. (7)

But the hermit interjected, and before the king could divulge his true identity the hermit said, 'Oh king, I know already who you actually are. I very much appreciate your stance that you tried to withhold the truth from me<sup>1</sup>. [In Doha no. 163 herein below the hermit explains why he appreciated the king's deception.] (8)

Observing this wisdom, prudence and sagacity of yours, I have developed great affection and respect for you. [To wit, instead of feeling offended that you have tried to deceive me by telling me an untrue statement about your identity when I asked you about it, I, on the contrary, liked your approach that you followed the principles of kingship by concealing your identity before a stranger like me.]’ (Doha no. 163)

*Oh king! By the grace of my Guru (spiritual preceptor) I know everything, but perceiving that telling the complete truth could bring harm to me I do not wish to tell more<sup>1</sup>.

{*This verse may be read as follows also: ‘Oh king! I know everything by the grace of my Guru. It is alright that you did not tell the truth about yourself to me for fear of harming your self interests as I have already explained that a king is well within his rights to do so.’<sup>2</sup> (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The hermit has given ample hints to the king that there is something amiss. What was there that the hermit feared from the king that prevents him from telling the ‘whole truth’? Surely if the full truth came out, the king would know that this hermit was his enemy!

But it is an irony of fate and a quirk of providence that still the king could not realize that there was something wrong somewhere. Why would a hermit who claims possessing exceptional mystical powers by the virtue of Tapa so much so that he could even defer death and overturn the laws of Nature by remaining alive and retaining the same body ever since the dawn of creation, fear harm from an ordinary mortal such as a human king if he told him the whole truth? Wasn’t there something obviously mysterious in this? Obviously the king was so much influenced by the hermit that he had let down his guard beyond reason.

<sup>2</sup>This interpretation may be okay on the face of it, but since it is a repetition of what has already been said in Doha no. 163, the other explanation—that the hermit did not wish to tell more about what he knew about the king because it may bring harm to him—seems more plausible here. What harm would it bring to the hermit? If told the full truth the king would know that this hermit was actually his arch enemy!]

-- I developed affection and liking for you. That is why I told you about myself when you had asked me about it<sup>1</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The hermit is clearly double-talking. On the one hand he says that he does not want to tell the whole truth as it may harm him, and then he says he has told the king about himself in a truthful manner. If that is the case, then what was that extra information which the hermit did not wish to disclose to the king for fear of inviting harm to his own security or welfare as he has said in Chaupai line no. 2 herein above? Obviously the hermit wished to keep secret his own true identity from the king for it was definitely going to bring harm to him as he was the king's sworn enemy.

We have read that the hermit said that he has retained the same body since he took birth at the beginning of creation, and so there was nothing else to tell except about his present life. To wit, he seems to convey the idea that he has told the 'whole truth' to the king. This is contrary to his own admission that he would not like to tell the whole truth for fear of harm coming his way.]

Now since I am very pleased with you, you can ask for any boon from me that you wish for in your heart.' (5)

When the king heard these pleasant and favourable words, he felt very fortunate and exhilarated. He held the feet of the hermit and prayed to him in many ways (i.e. devotedly and faithfully, to express his gratitude and devotion for his benefactor)<sup>1</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Here we see that the king has totally surrendered himself before the cunning hermit—by his actions, mind and emotions, as is evident in his (i) holding the hermit's feet, (ii) feeling exhilarated, and (iii) praying to him with devotion.]

कृपासिंधु मुनि दरसन तोरें । चारि पदारथ करतल मोरें ॥ ७ ॥

prabhuhi tathāpi prasanna bilōkī. māgi agama bara hō'um̐ asōkī. 8.

The king prayed, 'Oh sage who is an ocean of mercy, kindness and grace! By having had the good fortune of seeing your holiness I feel that all the four fruits that come to meritorious persons<sup>1</sup> have come in my hands. [Say, what more would I want!] (7)

But still oh my lord, since you are so pleased with me I beg your leave to ask for a boon that is very difficult to obtain<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The four great fruits that come to a person for meritorious life are the following—(i) Artha—wealth and prosperity; (ii) Dharma—credit that comes with righteousness and auspiciousness; (iii) Kaam—fulfillment of all desires; and (iv) Moksha—liberation and deliverance of the soul; emancipation and salvation at the time of death.

<sup>2</sup>The king decided that he has got one rare god-sent chance to fulfill his unfulfilled desires which he would express in the next verse, and he did not want to miss this golden opportunity. By all that the hermit told him about himself—about his transcendental knowledge, about his doing great Tapa and about living like an immortal being—the king was convinced that this hermit indeed has the mystical ability to grant him what is virtually impossible to attain. And since the offer of granting boons came from the hermit himself, the king felt sure that he was too willing to grant whatever the king would ask for.

The king thought that he would be foolish for him to let go of this chance.]

दो०. जरा मरन दुख रहित तनु समर जितै जनि कोउ ।

jarā marana dukha rahita tanu samara jitai jani kō'u.
ēkachatra ripuhīna mahi rāja kalapa sata hō'u. 164.

[The king now makes his request in one breath, without a pause.] 'Let my body be free from the pains and misery associated with old age and death; let no one defeat me in battle; let me have sole sovereignty of the whole world (i.e. let my reign be unopposed and unchallenged, and let me be a sole monarch of the whole world); let there be no enemy of mine on this earth; and let my reign last for a hundred Kalpas<sup>1</sup>.'* (Doha no. 164)

[Note—(a) 1 Kalpa = It is equivalent to 1 day in the creator Brahma's total life span of 100 years. Each Kalpa consists of 1000 four-Yug cycles, called the 'Chatur Yugs'. The visible creation's one life-span consisting of this four-Yog cycle called the 'Chatur Yugs' is this one day of Brahma. At the end of this Chatur Yug, there would be dissolution or the so-called 'dooms-day' when everything would be submerged in water. Then the next phase of life consisting of the next four-Yug cycle would start.

Each Kalpa (i.e. 1 day of Brahma's life) is also divided into 14 Manvantars, and each such Manvantars is ruled by one Manu, the first male. Therefore, 1 Manu rules over 71.42 (1000/4) four-Yug cycles.

We are now passing through the 51st year of Brahma's life, and our present Kaliyug belongs to the 7th Manvantar out of the 14 Manvantars, and its Manu is called Vaivasvata, and it is 28th Kaliyug of the four-Yug cycle.

In human years, 1 Kalpa is equivalent to 4.32 billion ( $4.32 \times 10^9$ ) years.

To wit, the king wanted that he should rule for virtually an eternity! When he discovered that his host, the hermit, had himself lived for eternity by the virtue of the great magical powers of Tapa that he said he did, the king became greedy and thought that here was an opportunity for him to acquire 'a life of eternity' without having to undertake the stress of doing Tapa. He must have sat on the edge of his seat and trembling with excitement at this fantastic prospect. And the fraudster hermit must surely have read the expression on the king's face that revealed his eagerness and willingness to do anything the former asked him to do if it would fulfill his outlandish desires. So the preying hermit must have smiled within himself that his trick is working perfectly and having the desired effect on his victim.

*The king was so excited that he asked for so many boons in one breath; he did not want to pause and lose time for the fear that the hermit may say 'granted' even before all that he wanted to say was complete.

The king was very wise. He thought that in case the hermit would say that he can grant only one boon, the king asked for protection from the fear of death and old age as the first request. He guessed that this boon was surely within the reach of the hermit to grant as he himself has conquered death and old age by his own admission—refer: Doha no. 162 herein above.

So in case the hermit refused or was unable to grant the rest of the boons, then at least the king thought that he will be free from death.

Then he did not lose a breath in asking for the boon of invincibility and sovereignty over the whole world almost for eternity. This shows how highly ambitious and greedy-for-power he was.

Another important observation about the king is that completely worldly man and had no element of spiritualism in him even in its rudimentary form, for had he been a spiritually-minded person and a devotee of the Lord God then when he had got the rare opportunity to ask for any boons that he wished to be granted, howsoever difficult they may be, he would have sought for his spiritual welfare, enhancement of his devotion for God, and for liberation, deliverance, emancipation and salvation of his soul. He would never have asked for worldly gains, and would never have lusted for eternal life of his body so that he could enjoy the pleasures and comforts of material things of this gross, mortal world that come in abundance to a mighty emperor that he wanted to become.

This perhaps explains why his downfall was never regretted by anyone, not even by the gods. And this is also the reason why the so-called hermit had no remorse at having misused his holy attire to defraud the king as the latter was not a spiritually inclined man, but a completely selfish and worldly man of great greed and lust for power.]

[The hermit told the king that it would be as he wished, but there was an obstacle in its successful implementation, so the king should know about it.]

The hermit replied to the king, 'Oh king, it could be as you wish, but there is a certain difficult reason why its successful implementation becomes doubtful. (1)

[And what is that reason?] Even Kaal (the god of death) would bow his head before you (i.e. even 'Death' would obey you, and would not be able to harm you). But oh great king, there is one exception—and it is the Brahmins.

[To wit, except the Brahmins no one would be able to harm you in any way and bring about your death. So the only ones who could destroy your dreams to live for eternity and rule over the world as its sole and unopposed emperor who has no enemy to fear from are the Brahmins. Why is it so? The answer is this—] (2)

This is because the Brahmins are always superior to others in this world by the virtue of the natural powers vested in them due their doing Tapa. Hence, there is no one who can protect anyone against their wrath and curse. (3)

[Note—The hermit spoke in a very amiable and convincing way. It is true that Brahmins are deemed to be superior to others in the world by the virtue of their knowledge and spiritual way of life. So the king was all the more sure that the hermit is his guardian and benefactor who though wishing to willingly grant all that he wants also wants to warn him of the only obstacle that stands in the way of fulfillment of his wishes, so that precautionary measures can be taken. And the king felt more thankful for this sagacious advice.

Now the next question was: how to overcome this obstacle? The eager king decided that he must obey what the hermit, whom by this time he had begun to trust unquestionably and completely as his best friend and well-wisher, would advise him to do.

The hermit on his part was taking extra care not to arouse any suspicion in the mind of the king that the hermit is taking him for a ride for what he wants is impossible for even the Creator to grant, so how can a human being do so. Even the Brahmins, who can curse and cause ruin, cannot grant anyone eternity! Besides this, the hermit wished that he alone should not be seen as the one who is to be blamed for the destruction of the career of a great king and cause ruin and suffering to the kingdom and its innocent subjects. So why not devise a device whereby the entire Brahmin community would share the blame, and unless one knows this secret history of the king meeting the hermit in the deep forest no one would ever cast aspersions on the hermit.

So the cunning hermit thought that in case his plan failed and king Pratapbhanu could not be totally ruined but escaped with minor problems caused by Brahmins, then the king would at least not harm the hermit, but would always feel obliged and grateful to him instead.

May be that the king, on his return to his capital, arrange for some huge gift or a large largesse for the hermit as an immediate reward for his benefactor, before his ruin actually happens. So it was a win-win situation for the clever hermit.]

bipra śrāpa binu sunu mahipālā. tōra nāsa nahim̐ kavanēhum̐ kālā. 6.

Therefore oh king, if the Brahmins could be somehow controlled and brought under your wish (i.e. if some device can be devised by which the Brahmins could be subjugated and reined in by you) then it is certain that even the creator Lord Brahma, the protector Lord Vishnu and the concluder of creation Lord Shiva would all be yours. [To wit, if you can make the Brahmins obey you then you can also make the Gods of the Trinity obey your will.] (4)

In all sooth and without gainsay, I raise my two arms to solemnly declare the truth that it is not possible to exert any pressure and compel the Brahmin race to surrender to one's wishes and whims. (5)

So let it be known that without the curse of Brahmins, your ruin cannot happen any time, in any era, and under any circumstance.<sup>1</sup> (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The bait was too alluring for the rapacious king to let go so easily. Why, so thought the ambitious king who was made more greedy by the prospect of ruling over the earth as well as the heaven—now he was on the verge of conquering not only the mortal world but even superseding the three great Gods of the Trinity, what to talk of humbler gods such as the 'god of death' or the 'god of war'! Why not clinch the deal with both hands and do the bidding of this great hermit who was so willing to help, reasoned the gullible king.

And as a consequence, the 'dagger' was being sunk deeper and deeper into the king by his treacherous enemy who was disguised as a 'holy' hermit!]

The overjoyed king was exhilarated when he heard the words of the hermit. He exclaimed, 'Oh lord! My ruin cannot happen now. (7)

Oh the one who is a treasury of mercy and kindness (kṛpānidhānā)! By your grace and blessings, I will have welfare and good fortunes at all the times (and now I have nothing to fear from)<sup>1</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The king thought that it was a matter of 'fate accomplished', so over-confident he was of his authority and powers as he thought that no Brahmin would dare to go against the wishes of their patron king in whose kingdom he lives and on whose charity he survives. A king is worried about an opponent who is a warrior himself for he knows that a true warrior would never kneel down and humble himself and compromise his self-respect before anyone. But Brahmins are by habit docile and malleable persons, and they abhor violence and rough manners. They can be easily pleased by showing a little respect to them, even if it is superficial and temporary, or giving them some gift.

The king had ruled his kingdom with a charitable disposition and he had ensured that the Brahmins were kept in good humour. So now to win them over seemed to be a virtual cake-walk for the king.

The king thought that the battle has already been won! Little did the king know and little did he suspect that he is being egged-on by this treacherous hermit to dig his own grave.]

दो०. एवमस्तु कहि कपटमुनि बोला कुटिल बहोरि ।

milaba hamāra bhulāba nija kahahu ta hamahi na khōri. 165.

The fraudster, the wicked and the deceitful man who was disguised as a hermit (kapaṭamuni) said to the king, 'So shall it be! But if you tell this story of your losing your way and going lost in the forest as well as your meeting with me to anyone, the fault shall not be mine (if this revelation causes you any discomfort or embarrassment, if it harms you in any way and creates a situation whereby your wishes cannot be realized)<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 165)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The hermit was very intelligent, prudent and clever. He guessed that if the king told his ministers about meeting a hermit in the forest who granted him a boon by which he could gain immunity from death as well as an impunity from the consequences of offending the Brahmins only if he could subjugate them in entirety, the ministers, whom the hermit knew from his early days as an erstwhile king to be extremely wise and intelligent, would immediately smell that something was amiss, and they were sure to alert the king, who would then send his army to capture the fictitious hermit and bring him to justice.

So therefore the hermit instilled the fear of ruin and harm should the king divulge anything of his meeting with the hermit.

He also warned the king that it would be very demeaning and insulting for his own reputation, dignity and self-respect to admit that he ‘got lost in the forest’. Say, what his courtiers and subjects would think of his majesty when they learn that their great king could not find his own way back to the capital and needed the help of a hermit to return!

And that, inspite of already being an emperor and ruling over interminable tracts of land on the earth, their king was still not satisfied and wanted more and still more of everything. This would not auger well for the king’s reputation as it would portray him as a greedy, rapacious and selfish man who has no end to his yearnings, especially if it becomes known that he wants to subjugate the Brahmins, whom the whole society respects, so that he can become a virtual demi-god or a despotic dictator who would not tolerate anyone to oppose him.

To wit, the hermit created so much fear in the mind of the king that he would never disclose about his meeting with the hermit to anyone. See Chaupai line no. 2 herein below where the hermit has clearly warned the king of personal harm if this story is leaked.

This veil of secrecy was necessary so that the enemy-hermit could put into effect the plan he had devised in his mind to bring about the fall of king Pratapbhanu.]

[To wit, if you tell anyone about our meeting then it would create an obstacle in the fulfillment of your wishes, and would be against your own good. That is why I have told you earlier that if you disclose anything, then the consequences of such disclosure would be yours. So I pray that you keep quiet and maintain a discreet silence about everything—our meeting and whatever we have discussed here.<sup>1</sup>] (1)

Had the king discussed this event with his trusted ministers upon his return to the capital, it is almost certain that his ruin could have been averted—for the wise ministers would have smelled a rat and started their investigation.]

Listen oh king Bhanupratap. Your ruin will happen if either you reveal anything of this story to anyone, or due to the curse of Brahmins<sup>1</sup>. (3)

Your death would not happen by any other means, even if the Lord Hari (Vishnu, the protector of creation) and Lord Har (Shiva, the concluder of creation) become wrathful at you. [To wit, except the two conditions—viz. (i) your disclosing our meeting to anyone else, and (ii) the Brahmins cursing you—you would be fearless, and no other power in creation could bring about your death.]<sup>2</sup> (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The hermit knew that the king would be scared out of his wits if he is convinced that his ruin can come if he discloses this story to anyone. Earlier the king was told that no one can ruin him except the Brahmins, and the king had joyously exclaimed that now he was certain that no one can harm him as he was sure the Brahmins would not cause his ruin as he was their greatest patron and protector.

So the hermit changed his tactic immediately—because he did not want anyone, especially the Brahmins, to know beforehand what he had planned to do. We shall learn gradually that the hermit had planned a dirty scheme whereby he would get the Brahmins to curse the king to get ruined and become a demon. And to give effect to this plan it was essential that the Brahmins did not know that the horrible mischief that was about to happen was not the creation of the king to defile their religious beliefs or make them do something that is evil and sinful for Brahmins. But if this story was disclosed before the mischief actually happened, then the Brahmins would be alerted as to the real culprit, and then they would curse this hermit instead of the king. Obviously the hermit would not want this to occur. So he virtually threatened the king with ruin if he told anyone about what transpired at the hermitage.

<sup>2</sup>It is to be noted here that the hermit has cleverly omitted 'Brahma, the creator', who is the first of the Trinity of Gods, when he names Vishnu and Shiva who would not be able to harm the king. This is because of two reasons—(i) the Brahmins represent Brahma, and in fact they derive their name from the word 'Brahma', and he has already said that Brahmins can cause the king's ruin and downfall if they so wish and curse him; and (ii) Brahma is the patriarch of creation, the Father of creation, and hence the senior-most God, so his most exalted stature must not be compromised for selfish interests of mortals—for after all, no matter how much the hermit was burning with the fire of revenge upon the king, he himself feared the wrath of the supreme Creator if he dared to insult him by implying that the mortal king was superior to the Creator himself because he would be immune to the Creator's writ.

Since the Brahmins represent the creator Brahma, so it is why there is no one to supersede them. It is said that those who cannot be killed by the fierce weapon of Indra, the king of the Gods, or the death-baton of Kaal, the god of death, or by the discus of Lord Vishnu—even such powerful and invincible ones are reduced ashes by the fire of wrath of Brahmins. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 13-14 that precede Doha no. 109 which expressly endorses this view.]

rākha'i gura jāum kōpa bidhātā. gura birōdha nahim kō'u jaga trātā. 6.

The king reverentially held the feet of the hermit and said, 'Oh lord, what you say is indeed the truth. Who can protect one against the wrath of Brahmins and the Guru (moral preceptor and spiritual guide)<sup>1</sup>. (5)

If the creator Brahma becomes angry at someone then his Guru can provide protection to him against Brahma's wrath. But if the Guru himself becomes angry or annoyed due to some reason, then say who in this creation can provide solace and succour to anyone against his Guru?

[To wit, the Guru can protect his disciple from any harm even if the creator himself becomes angry at him, but if the Guru is offended for any reason then there is no succour or solace to be found from any quarter anywhere in this world.] (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The king was so much awed by the hermit's grandiose talk and got so influenced by him that he regarded the latter as his 'Guru'. This is clearly hinted in the pervious verses where we read that the king has submitted himself unconditionally before the hermit. Refer especially to Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 160; Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 161; Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 162; Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 163; Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 164; and Doha no. 167 along with Chaupai line no. 1 that follows it.]

So therefore, if I do not follow your instructions and do as you tell me, then I shall not regret if any harm or ruin comes to me from any quarter. [To wit, I promise you that will fully obey your commands like a faithful follower.] (7)

But oh lord, there is now but only one fear that is tormenting my heart and mind, and it is that the curse of Brahmins is very fierce.

[To wit, by your grace I have now nothing to fear from anyone because since I have decided to treat you as my Guru, I am sure that even Brahma would not be able to harm me. But my only fear is from the curse of Brahmins, for which there seems to be no remedy.] (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This Doha clearly shows that the king has become completely subdued by the pretentious hermit. He has become subservient to the hermit in his selfishness to rule over the world unopposed. The lesson we get here is often times one's greed and selfish ambitions lands one in such grave and dire situations that one's wisdom and prudence are eclipsed, one lets down one's guard, and allows oneself to fall prey to circumstances that could well have been avoided with a little astuteness, a little alertness and a little application of mind.

To wit, a person whose desires don't end will some day find himself in a difficult situation that would only cause him misery and pain.]

[The hermit now decided that it was the right time to roll out his plan which would bring about ruin of his arch enemy who was now firmly in his grip. So he replied to the king—] ‘Listen king. There are many ways in this world (by which what you desire can be achieved), but while on the one hand they are difficult to implement, it is also not certain whether the desired result can be obtained by pursuing them. (1)

However, there is one simple and easy way out, but even in this device there is one great difficulty. (2)

Oh king! This easy device is known only to me, and it is me alone who can put it into effect. But the only problem is that it is not possible for me to go to your capital city. (3)

The reason is till this day, ever since I was born and have been living in this hermitage, I have never gone out to visit any village or anyone's home. (4)

But if I do not go to your place it would mean that your future good would suffer. It's surely a very piquant situation, and it has left me in a grave dilemma<sup>1</sup>. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The enemy-hermit pretends to be a great friend, well-wisher and benefactor of the unsuspecting king. He in effect tells the king that the only thing that separates the king and the fulfillment of his desires is the reluctance of the hermit, whom by now the king has begun to treat as his Guru and true friend, to go to his capital so that the method by which the king would achieve what he wants can be put into effect. This was a clever ploy to prevail upon the king that things should be managed in such a way that the identity of the hermit could be kept a top secret. The hermit knew that if he accompanied the king to the capital, or even if he went alone after the king had returned and the king showed acquaintance with him, he would certainly draw immense attention from all quarters, and it is almost certain that one of the wise ministers or captains of the king's army would recognize him as an erstwhile king who was defeated once by Pratapbhanu, and who ran away from the battle-field to avoid being captured. Oh no, this risk is not acceptable. So the hermit did not like to go to the capital openly.

First the hermit says that he could help the king achieve his objective of ruling unopposed in the world for eternity and also being able to have sway over the pious Brahmins and make them all obey his wishes. But for that it is necessary that he visit the king's capital as the way to do it was known only to him, and he cannot go as it would make him break his vows of not going to any village or home throughout life like a true ascetic who should not.

Then the hermit immediately realized his error—that should the king decide it would not be proper to compel his Guru to break his vows to achieve selfish ends, then all the planning that the hermit had meticulously done so far would come crumbling like a pack of cards.

Hence the cunning fellow instantly changed track and showed his willingness to help the king, for whom he pretended to have developed a great liking, if some way could be devised by which he can remain incognito and anonymous while implementing the plan by which the king's desires could be fulfilled. This strategy would help the enemy-hermit to escape detection and capture.

He was sure that the king, who was bent to fulfill his wants by any means, would go to any length to realize his dreams, and so he will make sure that the hermit could remain secret during his visit to the capital.]

 jaladhi agādha mauḷi baha phēnū. santata dharani dharata sira rēnū. 8.

[The hermit had guessed it right, for the king now began earnestly beseeching him to endure some sufferance for the welfare of his disciple. It would be a noble deed on the part of the hermit, said the king, as great and pious souls willingly undergo hardship if it brings happiness and good to others. So the hermit should overcome his reluctance and help the king.]

Hearing what the hermit said, the king pleaded with him with a sweet and pleasant voice, 'Oh lord. The Vedas (scriptures) have praised the maxim [6] that those who are senior and great ought to show kindness to those who are junior and subordinate to them. For instance, great and majestic mountains always cheerfully bear countless humble twigs or blades of grass on their summits [7]. (6-7)

Similarly, the vast and fathomless ocean always allows the foam to flow easily over its surface.

The great earth too bears dust particles on its head (i.e. on its surface).' (8)

[Note—The king was alarmed when he felt that the magic pot was slipping from his hand, for if the hermit refused to go to his capital then his dreams of attaining eternal sovereignty over one and all would fail miserably. So he virtually bent over backwards and employed the best of skills at pleading he could muster at the moment to somehow prevail upon the hermit to overcome his reluctance to come to the king's capital and complete the rituals that he alone could do.

So the king was extremely polite because at this juncture he could not force the hermit to do anything against the latter's wishes. The king guessed that if he managed to evoke the natural kindness and graciousness that was present in the hermit's heart then there are fair chances that the hermit would agree to suffer a little for the larger good of his devoted disciple.

This is why the king invoked the Vedas as it would be difficult to contradict what they proclaim. Then he also cited some obvious examples to drive home the point that great men do not hesitate to suffer a bit if this sufferance would bring happiness and good to others. It would be a charitable deed on the part of the hermit to ensure the king's better future.

Saying this, the king fell at the hermit's feet and clasped it so that the hermit wouldn't gather courage to say 'no' as we will read in the following Doha.]

(Doha no. 167)

[Note—We will note how a selfish and rapacious person falls from grace, sacrifices his stature and self-respect, and compromises his dignity and honour in order to achieve his goals and satisfy his never-ending greed.

This king was not an ordinary king—for he was already an emperor who had conquered countless kings and extended his domain to virtually cover the entire length and breadth of the earth; he had all that a king would normally want to have. His kingdom was great; he had renown as being a righteous and meritorious king; his subjects were happy and prosperous; his writ prevailed everywhere. Refer: Doha no. 153—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 156.

But still he was not contented! He now wanted to supersede even the Trinity Gods, to overcome the Laws of Nature, and to attain eternity which even the creator Brahma does not have as his life also has an end. So when the hermit promised the impossible to him the king virtually started salivating. Refer: Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 165.

So therefore, when the king found that as simple an obstacle as a hermit's vows that he would not visit any city or a household—a vow that seemed utterly frivolous, ridiculous and obsolete to the king who was accustomed to material comforts and sensual pleasures of the world, and who was surrounded by submissive priests who lived a comfortable life of material comfort relying solely on the king's largesse, never once talking of renunciation and dispassion—stood between the success and failure of his goals, he was utterly flabbergasted and disgusted. He decided he must somehow prevail upon the hermit to fulfill his wishes, no matter what.

But he also feared the hermit's wrath, so preferred to take a soft approach rather than using a king's usual method of insisting that his orders be carried out either by the fear of punishment or by the bait of a grand reward.]

When the hermit, who was expert in conceit, deceit and pretensions, became absolutely sure that the king had come completely under his influence, he said, --- (1)

‘Listen oh king. I tell you the truth that there is nothing in this world that is not possible for me’<sup>1</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The hermit has already said that he can do the impossible by the virtue of the powers that Tapa has granted him—refer Doha no. 162 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that follow it.

He repeats his stupendous abilities here once again to refresh the king’s memory and make him more submissive and devoted, as well as to prepare the king mentally to believe that the seemingly incredulous magical feat the hermit would propose in a moment can actually be done successfully and desired fruits obtained.]

I (hermit) will certainly do the work for you as you are my devoted follower and an ardent devotee by your Mana (heart and mind), by your body (deeds and actions) and by your words (by what you say; by the words that express your inner feeling for me)<sup>1</sup>. (3)

But mind you—Yoga (meditation), Yukti (clever planning, means and ways, and proper devices employed to achieve success in any secret endeavour), Tapa (austerity and penance) and Mantra (divine esoteric formulas that grant mystical powers) bear fruit only when they are kept secret.

[To wit, if you indeed want success then you must vow to keep secret what I am about to divulge presently, as it involves certain magical charms and esoteric rituals that needed to be done so as to cast a mystical spell upon the objects that are needed to be tamed, in this case the Brahmins.]<sup>2</sup> (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The king had become so overwhelmed by the hermit’s holy attire and pious talk that he had submitted himself completely to the latter and thought himself to be extremely lucky to have discovered a great sage. The clever hermit had adroitly observed this quite early during the meeting: Refer to (i) Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that precede Doha no. 161, and again to (ii) Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 162.

<sup>2</sup>Not wanting to take any risk caused by revelation of his identity and evil designs, and thereby putting to grave peril his own security and life, the evil hermit continues to harp on the importance and the necessity of complete secrecy of the plan and its implementation.]

[And finally the hermit reveals to the king the formidable and monster plan. He said assertively—] If I prepare and cook the meal for a grand feast that you are required to organize for all the Brahmins, and you serve this food yourself to the invited guests (the Brahmins) without anyone knowing that the food has been cooked by me, --- (5)

--- Then all those who partake of this food will become unquestionably obedient to you; they would obey your commands without reservations, become totally subservient to you, and be under your full sovereignty. (6)

Listen oh king. Not only this, but all those who would subsequently eat food in the homes of such guests whom you would have served in the feast too would come under your spell and command, and this chain would go on expanding and getting wider in an exponential manner to eventually cover the entire Brahmin race! (7)

So, oh king, go and make haste to carry out this magical device. And make sure that you take a vow that such feasts would be organized on a regular basis for one full year. (8)

[Note—The credulous king obviously had lost all his wits in his zeal to accomplish the impossible. Couldn't he logically think how a hermit, who has lived all his life in the forest subsisting on forest produce and lean and simple food, would be skilled enough to cook delicious fare for a grand royal feast where thousands of guests would be fed—not for one day but for a whole year.

Would that not mean that the hermit would not be able to attend to his routine of spiritual practices for this long period of time? No matter how nice and obliging the hermit may be, but this proposition of abstaining from his religious practices for one full year just for the sake of a king ought to be absolutely unacceptable and ridiculous for any good hermit to even contemplate. Wasn't there something fishy in the whole matter?

But what to say—destiny's writ is so strong and blinding that the wisest and the cleverest fall in the trap as if a piece of iron is being pulled by an invisible magnet.]

Everyday you must invite a hundred thousand Brahmins with their families! I will personally prepare the food daily that you would serve the guests for one full year. (Doha no. 168)

[Note—The hermit knew fully well that all that he proposes to do is absurd and ridiculous to the extreme. If the number of Brahmins he said the king must feed daily extends for a year then it does not need a mathematician to calculate after all the Brahmins who live on this earth would have partaken of the food in one round would be invited repeatedly again and again. What after all is the use of this futile exercise if one meal is enough to cast a magical spell on the Brahmins, especially if all those who eat in the household of the Brahmin who has already eaten the king's food at the feast would also come under the king's spell?

It seems extraordinarily superfluous and extravagantly unnecessary. But still the greedy and deluded king could not see the trap laid out for him!]

kariyahim bipra hōma makha sēvā. tēhim prasaṅga saha-jēhim basa dēvā. 2.

‘Oh king, in this easy way and with the least of trouble all the Brahmins would come under your spell. (1)

The Gods, in turn, would easily come under your sway by the virtue of the various ‘Sewas’ (services) that these Brahmins offer to them, such as doing ‘Homa’ (offerings meant for the Gods that the Brahmins make to the sacred fire during sacrifices), and ‘Makha’ (fire sacrifice rituals)<sup>1</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The offerings that are made to the sacred fire during sacrifices are meant for the Gods as they derive their nourishment and strength from the food that are offered during such rituals.

It has already been assured by the hermit in Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 168 herein above that “all those who eat in the households of Brahmins who were fed by the king during the grand feast that is being planned in order to cast a spell of magical charm upon the Brahmins and bring them all under the will of the king, would also become obedient to him, and this chain would continue so that ultimately the entire Brahmin race would be under the king's magical charm".

So therefore it is logical that the food which the Brahmins, who have already eaten the magically charmed food at the king's feast and have come under his spell, prepare in their homes and then offer such food to the Gods via the medium of the fire sacrifices that they do would also bring the Gods who partake this magically charmed food to come under its effect, which means that they would also become obedient to the king just like the other Brahmins who happen to eat this food.

It indeed is a fantastically clever idea that is wonderfully planned and proposed to be executed in a masterly fashion aimed to bring both the Brahmins and the Gods under the tutelage of the king at one stroke. No wonder than that the king was awe-struck at the ingenuity of the hermit! Anyone in his place would have marveled at the hermit's stupendous intellect and astounding genius at being able to devise such a flawless device as so short a notice.]

[I shall now tell you another important secret.] (Since) I will never come to your place to accomplish your objective in my present form (as I have already told you that my identity should be kept completely secret), so I give you a sign or a hint (by which you would be able to recognize me). (3)

Oh king, I shall carry-off your family priest by the virtue of my magical powers (nija māyā). (4)

Employing the mystical powers that I possess by the virtue of my Tapa, I shall keep him here in this hermitage disguised as myself during the whole year (while I would be at your place to keep my promise to you and carry on with my obligations of preparing the magical food to be served at the feast). [To wit, by this ruse no one will doubt or become suspicious of anything. Should any secret agent come to enquire here at my hermitage, he will find the dummy hermit here and become assured that everything is alright. And since your priest would be under the spell of my charm he too would be so much deluded that he wouldn't ever know who he actually is or anything about his changed circumstances.] (5)

I will assume his (your priest's) form and fulfill all your desires in every possible way. [The people will think that it is your own family priest who has advised you to undertake this grand and novel exercise. It is now quite late in the night, so go and sleep. Oh king, I shall meet you three days from now<sup>1</sup>. (7)

While you would be asleep, I shall employ the magical powers that I have got by the virtue of my Tapa and convey you and your horse to your home (even without waking you up from your sleep). (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The hermit did not want to show that he was in any great hurry. The king must be given due time to rest and think. After all that had happened during the course of that day, the king would be too upset and weary to act in a proper way if the entire plan was to be rolled out the very next day. It will also create suspicion in the mind of the king's ministers etc. who, in all probability, must be in great anxiety and alarmed beyond measure when they failed to follow the king and had lost track of him as he was running behind the game during the hunt. Surely they would be searching for the king in the forest the entire next day of the hunt.

When the hermit would transport the king back home by some magical means he plans to employ about which we shall read in a moment, the good news that the king has returned unharmed would spread immediately. And by-and-by the search party would come to know of it and return to the capital by the end of the day or the next day.

Everyone will think that after hotly pursuing the game and slaying it in some distant part of the forest, the king had returned home late in the night and sneaked in. It would seem absolutely okay as great kings would often go out in disguise and in a surreptitious manner to find out how the things were going on in the kingdom and what the condition of its citizens was. This is because they wanted to take stock of the situation first hand without relying blindly upon their informers and spies.

So the next one day or two would be spent in this way. By the third day however, the things would settle down to normal. This is why the hermit chose the 'third day' to carry out the plan.]

It will be when the hermit, who would be disguised as the royal priest, tells the king all that had transpired in the hermitage in the forest. Then the king would immediately know who the priest actually was, and then he must obey what is commanded to him to do.]

The king obeyed the hermit's orders and went to sleep, while the deceitful and fraudulent hermit, who pretended to be all-knowing and possessing mystical powers, went and sat down on his seat<sup>1</sup>. (1)

The king was very tired, so he immediately fell asleep. But how could the hermit sleep as his mind was very busy with thoughts<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The false hermit was extra cautious. He thought that the king may pretend to sleep but might be watching what the hermit does for the rest of the night. Since the hermit had given the impression that he does a lot of Tapa, he thought that it would be wise to go and sit on his seat and pretend to be doing meditation.

Besides this, he did not want to sleep just to ensure that the king did not get up quietly and slip away in the dead of night. It would bring every thing that the hermit had planned coming down with a crash. And he also did not want to sleep for the fear that the king might have seen through the veil of deceit and would get up quietly and kill the hermit by his sword.

<sup>2</sup>This is the fourth reason why the hermit did not go to sleep. His mind was too occupied with thoughts and plans that sleep defied him. His arch enemy was right in his front, sleeping soundly and unarmed. Should he stab him here and now? No, that would destroy the bigger plan. He wanted the entire family of king Pratapbhanu to be destroyed, and so if he killed the king alone now then the rest of them will remain alive, and one day they will surely spy him out and then torture him to death.

So the hermit sat and contemplated.]

Meanwhile, Kalketu, a demon who used to roam around during the night (kālakētu nīsicara), arrived there. It was he who had disguised himself as a wild boar to waylay the king (Pratapbhanu) and make him go astray<sup>1</sup>. (3)

This demon had become a fast friend of the hermit, and he was skilled in deceit and carrying out magical feats of delusion. (4)

prathamahiṁ bhūpa samara saba mārē. bipra santa sura dēkhi dukhārē. 6.

He (the demon Kalketu) had seven sons and ten brothers. They had become invincible and used to torment the Gods a lot. (5)

When the great king Pratapbhanu saw the misery and sufferings to which the Brahmins, saints and sages as well as the Gods were subjected to by these demons, he had slayed them in the beginning of his many campaigns. [But somehow this demon Kalketu managed to escape, and he went to the dense forest to hide in it.] (6)

This wicked fellow developed hatred for the king and vowed to take revenge when the opportunity would come in due course. He forged a friendship with the hermit (who was also an enemy of king Pratapbhanu as he had been defeated in a battle and had managed to escape to the forest where he hid in the guise of a hermit).

Both of them (i.e. the demon Kalketu whose family members were killed by Pratapbhanu, and the erstwhile king who was defeated in battle and whose kingdom was snatched by Pratapbhanu, and who now lived in disguise as a hermit) hatched a conspiracy by which a plan was contrived to bring about complete ruin of their common enemy (i.e. king Pratapbhanu).

But unfortunately due to the fiat of fate, the king was totally unaware of this wicked plot and the identity of the perpetrators of this sinister conspiracy. (7-8)

दो०. रिपु तेजसी अकेल अपि लघु करि गनिअ न ताहु ।
अजहुँ देत दुख रबि ससिहि सिर अवसेषित राहु ॥ १७० ॥
dōhā.

ripu tējāsī akēla api laghu kari gani'a na tāhu.
ajahum' dēta dukha rabi sasihi sira avasēṣita rāhu. 170.

[The sagacious and erudite poet-saint Tulsidas, the author of this classic Ram Charit Manas, cites a well established maxim which states that—] One must not underestimate and take lightly a powerful enemy even though he may be alone (at the time due to certain circumstances)<sup>1</sup>.

For instance, the demon Rahu, who has nothing left out of his body except his head, is able to perpetually torment both the Sun and the Moon by devouring them periodically (inspite of being fully aware that he cannot permanently harm them in any way as they would soon emerge from the severed part of his neck)<sup>2</sup>. (Doha no. 170)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>King Pratapbhanu was so over-confident of his own invincibility, of his strength, powers and authority that at the time the defeated king as well as the defeated demon ran away from his clutches he had not searched them out and take them into his custody or had completely eliminated them because he thought that they wouldn't be of any consequence in the future, and they would not dare and would not be able to cause him any harm whatsoever. So he paid no attention to the escapees. Little did he know at the time that these two seemingly impotent enemies who had been completely routed, and hence rendered toothless and harmless as they had no support of arms or an army, would one day prove to be his nemesis and the cause of his ruin.

Had the king been wise he would have hunted them down and put them into a prison. To the message is that even the smallest and seemingly harmless enemy is dangerous and he should never be taken lightly, nor should his sweet words be taken at face value. Even if an enemy can't do much harm to his adversary he can still be a cause of incessant problems and constant harassment that is more irritating than an outright confrontation. It's like something of a skin affection that causes constant irritation and incessant annoyance even if it is not life-threatening.

<sup>2</sup>The demon Rahu had his head severed from his neck by Lord Vishnu's discus when he had tried to cheat on the Gods by disguising himself as one of them and sitting surreptitiously between the Sun God and the Moon God when the Amrit, the nectar of immortality, was being distributed at the time when it was produced by the legendary 'churning of the ocean by the gods and the demons'. The Sun and the Moon discovered his deceit and they warned Lord Vishnu who cut off Rahu's head, but by that time a drop of Amrit had fell in his head. So he couldn't be killed.

The Creator then found a way out so that Rahu may survive inspite of being decapitated. He told him that once in a while he would be able to devour one of the Gods as a retribution for what has been done to him. Since the cause of this misfortune that befell Rahu was the Sun and the Moon gods, he took a pledge that when he felt hungry he would gobble up the rounded ball of the Sun and the Moon as a repast to feed his hunger.

So whenever Rahu feels hungry he lunges at the ball of the Moon and the Sun and swallows them into his open mouth. But soon these balls emerge from the hollow cavity of the neck from where the body of Rahu was severed. According to mythology, these two events—i.e. eating and then discharging of the Sun and the Moon by Rahu are known as the Solar and the Lunar eclipses respectively. The eclipse starts when either of the two enters Rahu's mouth, and the eclipse ends when they emerge from his severed neck.

What is implied here is that the Sun and the Moon Gods took Rahu very lightly when his head was cut off from his neck, as they thought what a decapitated enemy would ever do to them, never realizing that the same enemy, who seemed rendered impotent to cause any harm as his body was cut into two, would continue to torment them till the end of creation.

Similarly, king Pratapbhanu had thought that since he was so mighty that he had conquered all the great kings and valiant warriors of the time, a single king or demon who ran away like an impotent coward from the battle field were of no more importance than a tiny insect, and so he did not bother to waste his energy and time to pay any heed to them for he feared nothing from their quarter. And now this negligence on his part proved to be his own grave.]

Then the hermit told him the entire story (of what had transpired between him and king Pratapbhanu). Hearing everything the demon felt very happy, and he then said—

Now discard all worries and go to sleep. The Creator has become benevolent upon us and he has virtually cured the disease without any medicine! [To wit, it was not an easy thing to bring about our enemy’s destruction so easily. But it seems that the Creator has listened to our prayers as now this destruction of our arch enemy is certain, and that also by an easy method and the least effort. It’s a virtual boon for us!] (4)

After eliminating the enemy and throwing him out (ruining him) from his very roots along with his entire family, I shall come back to meet you on the fourth day.’<sup>1</sup> (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It is obvious by now that this demon, who had great magical powers in him as demons usually had and as proved by his becoming a wild boar earlier, was the one who would do all the nasty tricks that would culminate in king Pratapbhanu’s fall. The hermit-king played the role of laying the bait and trapping the prey, but the actual killing was done by this demon.

The hermit had told king Pratapbhanu that he would meet him on the ‘third day’. So now the demon tells him that everything would be fixed and ended on the third day itself if things go according to plan, and on the fourth day he will return to convey the good news of Pratapbhanu’s destruction to his friend, the hermit. Then it would be time to rejoice!]

After having reassured the hermit in various ways<sup>1</sup>, the angry demon (Kalketu), who was exceptionally cunning, deceitful and wicked, started on his mission with a vengeance. (6)

He (the demon) used his magical powers to convey (transport) the king and his horse to the palace almost in an instant. (7)

The king was placed at his usual place by the queen’s side, and the horse was taken to the stable and tied up properly there in the usual manner<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The hermit was very skeptical if this master scheme of deceit and stab-in-the-back would actually succeed as he knew of the might and the intelligence of king Pratapbhanu as well as his ministers. He was apprehensive that the king may become suspicious in case the demon, who would actually carry out the plan instead of the hermit himself, made any slip or committed some error somewhere, wittingly or unwittingly. That would be disastrous for both of them—for the king would immediately capture the demon and torture him to reveal the truth of his companion, the hermit. And then both of them would be sent to the gallows.

So it was necessary for the demon to reassure his friend, the hermit, not to worry on any count.

<sup>2</sup>It is indeed a great feat of magic that is beyond imagination. Surely the queen was asleep at the time, and the guards of the stable must be dozing. None got the hint that the king and the horse have come back all of a sudden. When we read this story of magical transportation and of the subsequent feast that was organised in the king's capital, then many of the tales from the fables of 'One Thousand and One Arabian Nights' come to the mind.]

The demon carried away the king's royal priest (employing the same magical powers with which he had brought the king and his horse), and after casting a delusory spell upon the abducted priest, he hid him in a cave in the mountain. (Doha no. 171)

He (the demon Kalketu) disguised himself as the royal priest and went to lie down on his wonderful bed. (1)

The king woke up before dawn, and when he found himself inside the palace he was astonished beyond measure<sup>1</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The last thing of which the king was aware of was his being in a hermit's hermitage in the midst of a forest in the night, and of his going to sleep at the hermit's request. Then as he was very tired he immediately sank into deep sleep. But when he woke up he found himself inside his palace and lying on his own bed. It was sure to stun him and befuddle his mind. For a moment he could not bring himself to understand that what he was seeing was actually a fact and not merely a dream. It took him some time to reflect on the developments of the previous night and gather his wits sufficiently enough to have some bearing about himself and his whereabouts.]

मुनि महिमा मन महुँ अनुमानी । उठेउ गवँहिं जेहिं जान न रानी ॥ ३ ॥
कानन गयउ बाजि चढ़ि तेहीं । पुर नर नारि न जानेउ केहीं ॥ ४ ॥

kānana gaya'u bāji caḍhi tēhim̐. pura nara nāri na jānē'u kēhim̐. 4.

Reflecting upon the developments the king concluded that it is due to the hermit's astounding mystical powers that this miracle could happen (that he has been transported so secretly from the hermitage in the deep forest to his palace in the capital, a distance of seventy yojans, so quickly and imperceptibly). [To wit, the awe-inspired king attributed his presence in the palace to the magical powers of the hermit whom he believed could do the most supernatural things one can hardly think of.]

So (to ensure that no one could know what had happened) he got up very quietly in such a way that the queen would have no inkling that he had come there and then gone away, and sneaked out of the palace surreptitiously. (3)

He silently picked up the same horse and secretly rode out to the forest so that no one in the city, not a single male or female citizen, could know anything of the matter<sup>1</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>One would wonder how the king managed to go out of his palace to the stable, collect his horse, and from there go out of the city to the forest without anyone knowing anything about it.

The answer is common sense and it lies in the precautions that kings normally took as a matter of security. In the case of danger, a king had some secret route by which he would escape before the enemy could lay his hand upon him. King Pratapbhanu had gone out of the city by this route.]

ga'ēm̐ jāma juga bhūpati āvā. ghara ghara utsava bāja badhāvā. 5.

When it was noon time, the king returned. When the news spread of his return safely, there was mass celebration in the city as every household rejoiced with playing of music and singing of songs. (5)

When the king saw his priest he was speechless as he immediately recollected the work that was discussed between him and the hermit, and for which this priest was chosen as a medium by which it could be successfully accomplished<sup>1</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The king upon his safe return was met by all his anxious ministers, courtiers, commanders and citizens. Of course the royal priest was one of them. So as soon as the king's eyes fell upon this unfortunate man his mind alerted him about all that the hermit had said the previous night.

Let us not forget that the demon had abducted the original priest and replaced him with his own disguised form—refer: Doha no. 171 herein above. The demon was a master in deceit and magic, so he also knew the art of hypnotism. When the eye of the king met this decoy priest's eyes, the demon cast his deep, penetrating and hypnotic gaze upon the king to bring him under his magical spell. The deluded king thereafter acted like a puppet, meekly dancing to the tune of the crafty puppeteer!

One can very well visualize the scene of the moment—while everyone was exuberant and lively, embracing each other and thanking God for the king's safe return, and all the chief courtiers and ministers joyously milling around the king and expressing their happiness at his coming back with a smile on their cheerful faces, the priest stood quite aloof and almost emotionless even though he also attended the welcoming ceremony for the king and sported a formal smile on his otherwise somber face. No one noticed it as no one could ever doubt, even in their wildest of imaginations, about anything being amiss or any kind of fish-play, chiefly with respect to the royal high priest who was held in high esteem.

But when the eyes of the two met, i.e. of the king and the priest, some unworded and silent message was exchanged between the two of them. Even if the king felt excited for a fleeting moment and blood rushed to his cheeks, he suppressed his emotions consciously as he remembered the word of honour he had given to the hermit—which was to exercise the greatest of restraint and discretion, and keep everything top secret.]

juga sama nr̥pahi ga'e dina tīnī. kapaṭī muni pada raha mati līnī. 7.
samaya jāni uparōhita āvā. nr̥pahi matē saba kahi samujhāvā. 8.

The king remained on tenterhooks for three days that passed (while he waited for the hermit to come and meet him), and these three days seemed to be like three Yugs for him to pass. [To wit, the three days looked like ages for the king, and the time passed so slowly for him as if three cycles of creation and destruction had passed.]

During this time the king's mind was always thinking reverentially of the hermit who pretended to be holy and pious but albeit was full of wickedness, deceit and fraud<sup>1</sup>. (7)

When the appointed time arrived (i.e. the third day), the priest came to the king and told the king about the secret story (to signal him about his identity and to remind him about the job at hand)<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>That is why the word used for the hermit in the text is 'kapaṭī muni'—i.e. a sage or hermit who is full of wickedness, fraud, deceit and pretension.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 169 in this context where the hermit had told the king that when he would come to him and remind him about the work to be done on the third day, then the king must recognize him.]

दो०. नृप हरषेउ पहिचानि गुरु भ्रम बस रहा न चेत ।

nṛpa haraṣē'u pahicāni guru bhrama basa rahā na cēta.
barē turata sata sahasa bara bipra kuṭumba samēta. 172.

The king was jubilant when he recognized his Guru. He was unaware of the reality due to the veil of delusions which had been cast upon him to shroud his wisdom and make his mind and intellect become defunct so much so that even his natural instincts for prudence and self-preservation were undermined<sup>1</sup>.

So he immediately (without due diligence and consulting his advisors) invited a hundred thousand chosen Brahmins along with their families for a meal<sup>2</sup>. (Doha no. 172)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>One very important observation can be made here. The king was driven blind by his ambitions to bring even the learned Brahmins under his sway, and through them to have control over the Gods—this was what was promised to him by the hermit. Refer: Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 168 herein above. This would make him the sole and unchallenged ruler of the whole world as he desired—refer: Doha no. 164 herein above.

In his eagerness to accomplish even the impossible, the greedy king had thrown to the winds the basic principles of caution that should have warned him much early of something being wrong when the hermit had told him that “he would remove his royal priest surreptitiously using his powers of Maya or the ability of creating delusions, and sneak himself in his stead”—refer: Chaupai line nos. 3-7 that precede Doha no. 169.

The king should have thought this matter over carefully: Why would a holy and pious hermit—who is supposed to lead a life of renunciation and detachment from all worldly pursuit—adopt such wrong and deceitful ways to please someone, no matter what the motivation was? Why would a holy man cheat someone, especially when the object of such cheating was himself supposed to be a pious and holy man as the royal priest was expected to be? How can a person who practices cheating and deceit for any reason or cause be a true hermit or sage? But the king was so overwhelmed by his ambitious greed that he did not bother to pay attention to such tell-tale signs of fraud and mischief that seemed to be insignificant or inconsequential to him as long as his wishes could be fulfilled.

<sup>2</sup>On the face of it, things looked perfectly normal. The king had faced some grave misadventure when it appeared that he was all but lost in the un-chartered forest; then he returned safe and sound the next day. It was obviously a time to celebrate. In such good times great kings were accustomed to give a grand feast to feed the Brahmins and others in the kingdom. The citizens and the ministers thought that the priest was within his rights and was doing his duty to advise the king for the grand feast. So no suspicion was raised!]

māyāmaya tēhim kīnhi rasō'ī. binjana bahu gani saka'i na kō'ī. 2.

The royal priest (who was actually the demon Kalketu in a disguised form) supervised the preparation of the food for the grand repast. He prepared the food according to the way prescribed in the Vedas for a grand feast that is organized on such occasions—i.e. the food was of all the four categories, and had all the six kinds of tastes<sup>1</sup>. (1)

He used his magical powers to create a huge illusion that made the food look extraordinarily wonderful and supernaturally good, with a wide variety of viands and sumptuous delicacies that defied imagination and description. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The four classical categories of food are—(a) Bhakshya--that which is eaten raw by tearing and lacerating with the help of teeth, that which requires proper chewing and mastication before it can enter the food pipe, e.g. bread, fruits, vegetables, chewing of sugarcane; (b) Bhojya--that which is cooked and eaten with fingers or spoons, requiring least chewing or masticating and can be easily swallowed down the gullet, e.g. rice, curry; (c) Lehya--that which is licked with the tongue, e.g. eating pickles or honey; and (d) Choshya--that which is sipped or sucked, e.g. water, milk, tea.

The Garbho-panishad of the Krishna Yajur Veda tradition, verse no. 5 however classifies the four basic types of foods as—(i) Lehya: that which is licked; (ii) Peya: that which is drunk; (iii) Khaadya: that which is chewed or masticated; and (iv) Choshya: that which is sucked.

The six classical forms of tastes are the following flavours that the tongue feels—sweet, acidic, bitter, pungent, sour and salty. They are compared to the six seasons in this world. Refer Bhavana Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition, verse no. 2, stanza no 10.

Sometimes, the six tastes are listed as being sweet, salty, sour, bitter, pungent or hot, and astringent. Sometimes acidic (vinegar) and bland are also regarded as separate category of tastes. Refer Garbho-panishad, verse no. 1 of Krishna Yajur Veda tradition. ]

And in this food he mixed meat of different animals as well as that of Brahmins. [To wit, in order to ensure that the food served by the king to the invited guests would be completely defiled and polluted in terms of its sanctity, the wicked demon did not limit himself to mixing animal meat, but he went further to mix even the flesh of dead Brahmins with the food.] (3)

The ignorant king welcomed the invited Brahmins for the repast, and he duly washed their feet as a mark of respect before they were seated. (4) bhūpa bikala mati mōham' bhulānī. bhāvī basa na āva mukha bānī. 8.

As soon as the king started serving the meal to the invited Brahmins, a mysterious voice was heard in the sky which warned the guests<sup>1</sup>—(5)

‘Oh Brahmins! Get up and go back to your homes. To eat this food would be very demeaning and sinful for you all, so don’t eat it even taste a bit of it. (6)

The meal is mixed with the flesh of Brahmins.’

All the assembled Brahmins believed this mysterious voice that warned them, and they got up immediately. (7)

The stunned king was dumbfounded and taken aback. His mind was befuddled by delusory veil that was already cast upon it, so he couldn’t think coherently. He was under the spell of ill-fate that had provisioned for his doom, and so he could not say a word (in self-defense). (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>One may wonder who was he that spoke mysteriously from the sky? Was this some God warning the Brahmins that the food was defiled by meat?

No, it was not the voice of any God, but it was the demon Kalketu himself. How can we deduce this? Well, if it had been some God then the voice would have also told the Brahmins that one demon named Kalketu had mixed meat in the food that was being served.

Not only that, the Gods would have alerted the unsuspecting king at the very beginning that meat was being mixed in the royal kitchen, and he must inspect it immediately.

Therefore in all probability, the meat was actually mixed just at the nick of time when the food was taken from the kitchen and was being served to the Brahmins. This ensured that no alarm was raised and the king alerted, for if the mixing was done in the kitchen itself then at least some of the cooks and assistants who were engaged keeping in mind the vastness of the scale of the enterprise, at least some would have known that meat is being mixed, and it is absolutely sure that the king would have been informed. Obviously no one in his right mind would have ever expected that the king would order meat to be mixed in the food meant for the Brahmins.

That is why he was stunned and stood dazed as he just could not comprehend what was happening.

So it is definitely the voice of the demon Kalketu.

We shall read shortly that this voice is heard again, but the second time it is the Gods who are speaking because they realized that the Brahmins had unwittingly cursed an innocent king whose only fault was that he believed a hermit and also that he was unduly ambitious. But that does not mean that he had planned to defile the religious beliefs of the Brahmins and make them commit such a grave sin as eating meat. So the Gods came to the defense of the king, but by this time the damage was already done and it was too late to rectify it.]

It is by the grace of God that our religion and spiritual practices could be saved, but you will be condemned and destroyed along with all your kith and kin. [To wit, you had tried to make us eat meat, so you too would be turned into meat-eating monster along with your entire family.] (2)

The king was extremely agitated and horrified with fear when he heard the curse.
The voice from the sky spoke once again<sup>1</sup>— (4)

'Oh Brahmins! You had not given due thought before cursing the king, for the king is not at fault at all.' (5)

The first time it was the demon Kalketu who spoke so that the Brahmins would curse the king. But this second time it is the Gods who are speaking because they realized that the Brahmins had unwittingly cursed an innocent king whose only fault was that he believed a hermit and also that he was unduly ambitious. But that does not mean that he had planned to defile the religious beliefs of the Brahmins and make them commit such a grave sin as eating meat. So the Gods came to the defense of the king, but by this time the damage was already done and it was too late to rectify it as the Brahmins regretted for their curse but were unable to do anything now.]

The Brahmins were astonished and speechless when they heard this message from the heaven<sup>1</sup>.

Meanwhile, the vexed king went to the kitchen to inspect the stock of food kept there in preparation for it being served. (6)

There in the kitchen he discovered that neither was there any food nor the Brahmin cook (i.e. the priest who was supposed to be supervising the cooking of the meal)<sup>2</sup>.

Flabbergasted and completely crestfallen by the misfortune that stared on his face, the king returned with a heavy heart and overcome with dark foreboding thoughts crowding his mind. (7)

He came back to where the Brahmins were waiting<sup>3</sup>, told them the entire story, and terrified and out of his wits, he fell down trembling out of fear at their feet (seeking mercy and reprieve). (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The Brahmins could neither imagine nor believe that such a grand event can take place in full public view without the king being in the knowledge of what is actually happening. But since this was proclaimed by the heavenly voice they had to believe its truthfulness.

<sup>2</sup>We have read that the demon Kalketu knew stupendous magical tricks, and he had used his magical abilities to prepare a huge feast with diverse categories of food in such a short span of time as a single day. This feat is not practical and humanly possible even for a great king to pull off. Hence the demon had just created an illusion of prepared food.

<sup>3</sup>Why were the Brahmins waiting? It is because they were themselves confused about what had actually happened and wanted to know the truth. So they waited out of curiosity for the king to go and find out what had actually happened.

Meanwhile their anger abated a little and they began regretting that they had been too hasty in making the curse.]

The Brahmins said to the king, 'Oh king! It is not possible to change what has been written in one's fate by providence, though it is clear that you were not at fault.

A Brahmin's curse is very terrible and it cannot be altered or revoked.<sup>1</sup>' (Doha no. 174)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>If one were to look at this episode dispassionately, one is bound to think that if the Brahmins could curse someone if he is at fault, then they should also show some sort of mercy and compassion when it is proved that the cursed person is not at all at fault. Why is this one-sided approach? If someone is empowered to punish then he is also empowered to give reward, or at least reduce the intensity or severity of the punishment.

If the Brahmins cursed the king to become a flesh-eating ogre when they believed that he was trying them to eat meat and fall into committing a grave sin, then when it was revealed that the king was innocent they could have reduced the gravity of the curse and diluted it with some kind of positive boon even if it was not possible to completely revoke the main curse.

That is possibly why when the king became a demon named Ravana he wrecked havoc on the Brahmins. He was particularly antagonistic with the hermits and others who were attired in a holy garb as it is they and this garb that had cheated him in his previous life.

Why was Ravana not antagonistic with the demons? It is because he was totally unaware that some demon named Kalketu was the chief culprit that brought ruin to him.]

The invited Brahmins went their way, and the citizens heard the news<sup>1</sup>. (1)

All the citizens were extremely distressed, perturbed and perplexed beyond measure. They began to blame Providence for the most unexpected evil turn of events, lamenting that the Creator had begun the process of making a swan but produced a crow instead<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When the large group of Brahmins were going back home it is but natural that they were all animatedly talking and discussing about the events of the day. Besides them, there were countless attendants, waiters and servitors of the king at the feast. So the news of the king being cursed spread like wild-fire all through the length and breadth of not only the city but even to the distant realms of the kingdom.

The citizens loved their king very much as he was a very righteous ruler who ruled judiciously and in accordance with the laws of Dharma (propriety and probity; principles laid down for good governance in the scriptures). If the king became great and strong it was so much the better for the common man as it would deter attack from enemies and herald peace and prosperity.

The happy citizens therefore looked forward to a great future when suddenly this bad turn of events struck them like lightening—for they knew that their own future was intricately and inseparably linked to the future of their king, and so if the king was doomed their own future was doomed too.

As a result, a dark pall of gloom descended upon the capital. What was a bright day of celebrations and rejoicing a moment ago suddenly turned into a gloomy day of mourning and grief.]

Meanwhile, the demon brought the royal priest back home, and then he informed his friend, the hermit, of the news (that the mission has been successfully accomplished). (3)

That rascal (the hermit-king) then immediately sent out letters to other kings (who were defeated and conquered by Pratapbhanu earlier, and had harboured a secret desire for revenge)<sup>1</sup>.

When these kings (who were obviously acquainted with this hermit-king, and so could recognize his signature or handwriting or the language that kings usually use for royal messages) heard the news (which greatly pleased them), all of them made haste, arranging their armies and launching attacks either singly or in groups (to vanquish king Pratapbhanu once and for all)<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The hermit-king was well acquainted with the events of king Pratapbhanu's 'campaign of conquest' when he had fought many battles and had subjugated countless kings by the force of his arms in order to become an emperor. Not a single king was happy at this development, and though they all surrendered to Pratapbhanu but secretly all of them hated him and would welcome a chance to square accounts with him.

The question arises—who was the messenger who took the hermit-king's letters to these kings? The answer is easy—it was his demon friend Kalketu. We have already seen that Kalketu possessed great magical powers, so it was just a sport for him to reach all the kings and deliver the message in a short span of time.

<sup>2</sup>It is quite possible that this hermit-king had been maintaining some sort of secret contact with all like-minded kings. They were all waiting for such an opportunity, so as soon as the message came that their sworn enemy king Pratapbhanu had been cursed to doom by the Brahmins, a curse which is bound to be true no matter how strong Pratapbhanu was, they hurried to grab the chance and get the honour of being the first one to vanquish an all-powerful emperor whom the world praised as being invincible a day ago.

These kings were sure that they will now certainly succeed to bring Pratapbhanu to his knees and force him to bite dust as he was now heavily encumbered with a great mill-stone in the form of the Brahmin's curse around his neck; it was like a shackle from which he can't break free, and which was bound to sink him, and along with him his entire family, into an abyss from which there was no door of recovery.]

These enemy-kings surrounded the capital city from all the sides, playing their battle drums and sounding their trumpets of war. Every day there were fierce battles. (5)

All the greatest of warriors and fighters of the kingdom fought bravely and courageously before all of them fell down in the battle-field one-by-one (to have a dignified death befitting an honourable warrior who is lauded for such a death, instead of running away from the battle-field).

Ultimately even the king (Pratapbhanu) fell down in the battle-field along with his brother (named Arimardan). [Alas, the noble king Pratapbhanu and his brave brother Arimardan too died in the battle.] (6)

सत्यकेतु कुल कोउ नहिं बाँचा । बिप्रश्राप किमि होइ असाँचा ॥ ७ ॥
रिपु जिति सब नृप नगर बसाई । निज पुर गवने जय जसु पाई ॥ ८ ॥ satyakētu kula kō'u nahim bāmācā. bipraśrāpa kimi hō'i asāmācā. 7.

ripu jiti saba nrpa nagara basāī. nija pura gavanē jaya jasu pāī. 8.

Alack, no one in the illustrious family of the great and noble king Satyaketu (i.e. his descendants king Pratapbhanu, his brother Arimardan, and others) survived!

[To wit, all in the family of king Satyaketu died one after another in the battles that raged in the wake of the Brahmins cursing king Pratapbhanu and his entire family.]

Say, how can a curse of Brahmins be false?

[To wit, it was only due to this curse that every single member of the great king Pratapbhanu's family died; no one escaped. His clan was completely annihilated. Had it not been for the curse there was no one on earth who would have dared to defeat the mighty king.] (7)

After having conquered and completely destroying their arch enemy (king Pratapbhahu), all the attacking kings re-established the city, and collecting rich spoils of war and tributes from its citizens they went back to their respective kingdoms, basking in the glory of conquest and feeling exuberant at having had the honour of defeating a seemingly invincible emperor<sup>1</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>As is normally the case in such situations of military campaigns where a number of allied forces unite against a single enemy, when the war is over and the allied forces become victorious, they divide the spoils of war in proportion to their contribution in the war effort, restore and reconstruct the city, reach an agreement whereby the dominant partner or the one who had first entered the besieged city and conquered it is given control over the city, agreeing to appoint a governor who presides over a senate having representatives of all the partners, and then the rest of the partners return home leaving the day-to-day administration of the city to the people chosen by them by common consent.

So was also the case with the capital city of king Pratapbhanu. After the war ended, its citizens were rehabilitated, a new administrative machinery was put into place, the victors exacted their share of tributes and spoils of war, and then they returned jubilant and victorious to their own homelands.]

दो०. भरद्वाज सुनु जाहि जब होइ बिधाता बाम ।

धूरि मेरुसम जनक जम ताहि ब्यालसम दाम ॥ १७५ ॥

dōhā.

bharadvāja sunu jāhi jaba hō'i bidhātā bāma.

dhūri mērusama janaka jama tāhi byālasama dāma. 175.

[This story was narrated by sage Yagyawalkya to sage Bharadvaj. So Yagyawalkya said—]

‘Listen Bharadwaj. When the Creator turns hostile and becomes malevolent towards someone then even an inconsequential particle of dust turns into an insurmountable mountain as huge as Meru<sup>1</sup> for him, his own father becomes a personified form of the god of death for him, and the harmless rope or an ordinary garland becomes like a poisonous snake for him<sup>2</sup>. (Doha no. 175)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Mt. Meru is the huge mountain where Gods are supposed to have their abode on earth.

The first is the instance of “an inconsequential particle of dust turns into an insurmountable mountain as huge as Meru”. The king who was defeated by the mighty king Pratapbhanu and who ran away from the battle-field to hide in the forest disguised as a hermit, was most inconsequential and not worthy of paying any more attention because he had lost his army and all his supporters. He was alone and banished to the forest. For all practical purposes this disenfranchised and defeated hermit-king presented no cause of worry for the mighty king Pratapbhanu. He was virtually like a speck of dust against the might of an emperor. But as it happened, this seemingly harmless and hapless hermit turned to be the nemesis of Pratapbhanu. So in effect, ‘the miniscule dust became like a huge mountain which crushed Pratapbhanu underfoot’.

The second instance of “father becoming a personified form of the god of death” is made true also as Pratapbhanu himself calls the hermit ‘father-like’ in Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 160 herein above, but this same fellow mercifully plotted the ruin of a person whom he accepted as his ‘son’—refer: Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 163 herein above.

In the third instance of “the harmless rope or an ordinary garland becoming like a poisonous snake” we find that the large number of Brahmins whom the king had always shown respect and who had always benefited from the king’s charities and patronage now did not hesitate to bite him viciously by cursing him to utter doom].

चौ०. काल पाइ मुनि सुनु सोइ राजा । भयउ निसाचर सहित समाजा ॥ १ ॥

दस सिर ताहि बीस भुजदंडा । रावन नाम बीर बरिबंडा ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

kāla pā'i muni sunu sō'i rājā. bhaya'u nisācara sahita samājā. 1.
dasa sira tāhi bīsa bhujaḍaṇḍā. rāvana nāma bīra baribaṇḍā. 2.

[Sage Yagyawalkya told sage Bharadwaj—] ‘Listen oh sage! In due course of time the same king (Pratapbhanu) became a demon along with his whole clan.

[To wit, all the members of his near and extended family as well as his close associates such as ministers and courtiers and commanders and servitors and other members of the royal entourage became demons in their next births<sup>1</sup>.] (1)

He had twenty arms and ten heads, and his name was ‘Ravana’<sup>2</sup>. He was extraordinarily strong and brave, and had long and sturdy arms that were like huge maces or clubs. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It is not clearly said here if the citizens of his capital and the subjects of his kingdom too became demons. In the previous Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 175 it is mentioned that the victorious kings ‘re-established the capital before returning back home’.

This question is answered below in Chaupai line no. 6 which says that king Pratapbhanu’s servitors, his attendants, servants, ministers, courtiers, commanders of the army, governors of his kingdom and all others who served him directly or indirectly, along with their own family members such as their sons etc, had become demon in the next birth.

We can visualise two scenes here as follows:

(i) It may be that only those who were close to king Pratapbhanu and fought for him in the battles to die in the battle-field were the ones who ‘were reborn as demons’. The ordinary citizens did not participate in the actual battles, and so they escaped death. Hence there was no question of their being ‘born again or taking a rebirth’ as either demons or anyone else.

(ii) The other possibility is that everyone, including the citizens, became demons. But then it would mean that every single person was slaughtered in the war. This was obviously not the case as then who would live in the reconstructed city. Even during modern wars when the army defending a city surrenders, its inhabitants are spared death. The only casualties are the ones that occur while the battle rages, and not after the defending army surrenders. In this case therefore, after king Pratapbhanu was killed the war automatically ended, and with it ended further bloodshed.

So in all probabilities, and logically also, only those who died during the duration of the battles and who were close to king Pratapbhanu became demons. The rest of the subjects, who were not directly serving the king or who had managed to flee the city, survived, only to come back when the war ended and the victors were rehabilitating it.

The Atharva Veda’s Ram Purva Tapini Upanishad, Canto 3, verse no. 18 describes the meaning of the word ‘Ravana’ as follows—

“Since the demon had abducted Ram’s consort (Sita) from a ‘Van’ (pronounced as won or one; meaning a dense forest), he was called ‘Ravana’<sup>1</sup>. [The first letter of the word Ram and the word Van are combined to form the name of the demon as ‘Ra+van = Ravana’.]

There is another interpretation. ‘Ravana’ also means—‘the one who makes others weep, cry, lament and wail due to the severe pain, misery, torments, terror and sorrows inflicted upon them’ (for Ravana’s actions had made Sita suffer, weep and wail). Refer: Valmiki Ramayan, Uttar Kand, Canto 7, verse no. 16.

Further, he made a lot of noise or false claims, or he used to brag haughtily about his achievements, his strength and powers as well as of his invincibility and lordship over even the heavens. Wherever he went, he behaved most wildly and acted like a savage, making a lot of din and clamour to spread fear and terror.

So, the first part of his name Ravana comes from the word Rav for ‘fuss, noise, chatter, clamour, nuisance and din’<sup>2</sup>. Thus, he became famous as ‘Ravana’ because he made a lot of noise and false claims.

Meanwhile, Lord Ram and Laxman began their search for Sita (18).

[Note—<sup>1</sup>There is an interesting connotation of the word ‘Ravana’. Since his name includes the Beej Mantra for Lord Ram which incidentally is also the Beej Mantra for the eternal fire element, i.e. the letter ‘Ra’, it implies that Ravana was not an ordinary soul but a highly learned and scholarly one. Then, the word ‘Van’, meaning a forest, implies that he was a ‘treasury’ of scriptural knowledge and learning. The fact that he became a ‘demon’ instead of a living being behooving of his high standard of scriptural scholarship, knowledge, learning and erudition as well as his birth in the Brahmin race shows how merely literal knowledge and expertise in the scriptures would not necessarily mean that a person is exalted, worthy of honour and reverence, and spiritually liberated if he has not actually understood the hidden meaning of the doctrines and philosophy of the scriptures, and if he has not actually implemented them in practice in his life and deeds.

Ravana had become extremely haughty and arrogant because of his knowledge and acquisition of mystical powers that come naturally to them who do severe Tapa (penances, austerities, religious exercises), and Ravana had scored high on this count. He had done exemplary Tapa so much so that it had pleased Brahma the creator as well as Shiva the concluder. There are numerous instances in the story of the Ramayana when he has told those who had tried to persuade him to abandon his stubbornness and make peace with Lord Ram that he knows fully well that Ram is not an ordinary prince but the Supreme Being himself, and that Sita is not an ordinary woman but Shakti herself. He had stressed to them that he has purposely created this situation of animosity with the Lord by stealing Sita with full knowledge that this would lead to his getting slayed at the hands of the Lord, and that this was the only once-in-a-lifetime opportunity that he has got for his spiritual liberation from the prison of the evil body of a demon that he had acquired for himself due to his own follies and misdeeds. He would not let go of this golden chance by any means. When we take this point of view of Ravana into account, the whole story of Ramayana assumes a divine hue as the story of a highly learned and realised soul who has committed some mistakes in the past due to arrogance and lack of wisdom as to what his deeds would amount to, but realises and acknowledges later on that he is a sinful man. All the deplorable actions of Ravana around which the story of the epic Ramayana is woven are actually the attempt of a soul to find redemption for its past sins, and find emancipation and salvation once and for all.

Besides this point of his scriptural knowledge, it is also well established that he was the greatest devotee of Lord Shiva at that time. Shiva is the Lord who is honoured by the title of being a ‘Maha-Deva’—the great Lord God. Shiva is also the patron God of ascetics and hermits, and he is the wisest and most enlightened God in the pantheon of Gods. So, the point is—how can one expect an ardent and faithful devotee of such a great God as actually being as sinful and unholy internally as Ravana’s external behaviour and life has made him appear to be?

<sup>2</sup>In this regard there is a legend that when Ravana lifted Mount Kailash, where Lord Shiva has his abode, in order to transplant it in his own kingdom of Lanka, Lord Shiva had exerted immense pressure on this mountain so as to make it exceedingly heavy and difficult to be shifted and moved over to Lanka by Ravana. At that time, Ravana had made a lot of fuss and created a lot of nuisance. Hence he came to be known as ‘Ravana’.]”

The ‘ten’ heads of Ravana has a symbolic meaning. Usually the demons had only one head like all living beings. They were called ‘demons’ because of their evil and sinful deeds, corrupt and pervert mind and intellect, cruelty of behaviour, reckless and ruthlessness tendencies, and despicable general demeanours. The demons had a preponderance of the Tama Guna, and a negative nature marked by horribly violent and intolerably volatile temperament. They had contempt for ethics and morality; they paid no heed to the principles of Dharma (righteousness, probity, propriety, nobility and auspiciousness).

The numeral 'ten' simply means that their king Ravana was ten times more sinful and ten times more powerful than the rest of them. It also means that negativity and evil nature of Ravana was ten times more than other demons of his race. So the Lord decided to get rid of this great menace for creation first, and then treat the ten-headed Ravana's killing as a warning to the rest of the demon race to mend their selves or face the same punishment. The Lord wished to give the rest of the demons a chance to mend their ways out of fear for their lives, if for nothing else. In fact, this is what exactly happened. Not all the demons were killed and eliminated from the surface of earth during the epic war at Lanka—and the surviving ones were ruled by Vibhishan who was the younger brother of Ravana and who had taken sides with Lord Ram in the epic war at Lanka in which his elder brother Ravana was killed.

This proves one more very important and pertinent point—merely possessing a gross body like that of a demon does not mean that a Jiva is condemned if his Atma, his inner being is not demonic or sinful, and instead is holy and pious like other wise and realized souls in this creation. Further, merely Gyan or knowledge of the scriptures does not ensure that the creature would be provided with Mukti or spiritual liberation and deliverance—this is proved by the fact that though Ravana was an expert in the knowledge of the Vedas and other scriptures, and though he was a Brahmin by birth, he still was the most evil Jiva alive at that time. Therefore, it is how a Jiva (living being, a creature) puts his body and knowledge to practical use that is of paramount importance rather than merely possessing a certain type of gross body or being able to have an access to knowledge and scriptures.

Hence, while the Lord felt it necessary to eliminate the demon king Ravana, the same Lord made his brother Vibhishan as the king of the remaining demon race.

There is another interpretation of depicting Ravana with ten heads. He was not an ordinary demon or villain, for Ravana was an expert in the four Vedas (Rig, Sam, Yajur and Atharva), the four Up-Vedas or sub-Vedas (Dhanur Veda pertaining to the science of warfare, Aurveda pertaining to herbal medicines, Arthashastra pertaining to economics and public administration, and Gandharva-veda related to music, song and dance-drama), the Purans (mythological histories) and the Dharmashastras (other scriptures relating to the philosophy of Dharma or the laws of probity, propriety and righteousness). But inspite of having thoroughly studied all the Vedas and scriptures, inspite of being an expert in their tenets, and inspite of having this huge body of knowledge at his disposal, Ravana still became extremely pervert and sinful because of his vanity, passions, lust for power, ego, haughtiness and arrogance. He did not understand the spiritual message and meaning of the scriptures, and he did not utilise this knowledge for his spiritual welfare, most probably because he limited himself to their literal knowledge only, a knowledge that gave him immense temporal powers and fame but proved to be his unmaking.

This has the message for all spiritual aspirants and seekers of Mukti that mere knowledge of the scriptures is not sufficient for one's salvation; one must implement them in practice. By killing Ravana the Lord has sent a strong message to such people who are proud of their overpowering control over the literal versions of the scriptures that salvation is not theirs if they are not careful in how they utilise this knowledge and skill intelligently with proper wisdom. The Lord would not excuse them even if they are Brahmins (Ravana was a Brahmin by birth) and learned (Ravana was matchless in his knowledge of the scriptures) if they become sinful and fall from their path.

Why is he known as 'Ravana'? According to one story, once Ravana got on his chariot and flew above Kailash, the mountain abode of Lord Shiva. Nandi, the mount of Shiva, told him to stop, but the arrogant Ravana did not pay any heed. So Nandi blocked his path in the sky. Peeved and feeling insulted, Ravana scooped up the entire mountain and put it on his shoulder to throw it somewhere. Lord Shiva used his might and pressed the mountain with his big toe. This crushed Ravana under the weight and the pressure, and he began to yell. He remained for a thousand years crushed under the weight of the mountain and continued to pray to Lord Shiva to free him. At that time Shiva cursed him—'you have been wailing for so long under the weight of the mountain and you are in the habit of making others wail by your cruelty, so your name will be Ravana, or 'the one who wails himself and make others wail too'.' This story is narrated in Anand Ramayan, Saar Kand, Sarga 13, verse nos. 84-85.

His ten heads—Ravana had pleased Lord Shiva by offering his own head. As soon as he offered one head, another came up on his shoulder. He continued to offer them ten times, and each time a new head was created.

Once, the monkey king of Kishkindha, Vaali (or Baali), had put Ravana under his armpit for many days while the latter had gone to challenge the former when he was doing some worship. Peeved by Ravana's arrogance and impertinence, Vaali had tucked him under his arms to stop him from annoying him any further. When his worship was finished and he had returned back to his capital at Kishkindha, he realised that Ravana was still squeezed under his armpit. So he released the latter and made a pact of friendship with him. Angad, the emissary of Lord Ram, refers to that incident when Ravana had tried his best to escape from Vaali but could not do so, and remained clamped and squeezed under his armpit for a long time in Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Doha no. 24. This story is narrated in Valmiki Ramayan, Uttar Kand, Sarga 34; Veda Vyas' Adhyatma Ramayan, Uttar Kand, Canto 2, verse nos. 58-59; and in Anand Ramayan, Sarkand, Canto 13, verse nos. 96-101.

There is another legend associated with Ravana. Once, he had asked Lord Shiva to come and stay at Lanka, the demon capital. But the Lord refused. So, determined to fulfill his wish, Ravana had scooped up the entire mountain Kailash where Shiva lives in the upper reaches of the Himalayas in his bid to plant the whole mountain at Lanka. The Gods were flabbergasted and shocked at this, so they devised a device whereby the Wind God and the Water God entered Ravana's abdomen, which resulted in a strong urge in him to urinate somewhere between the original location of Kailash and Lanka.

Now it so happened that at the time of lifting the mountain, Ravana had pledged that he will not place Mt. Kailash on the ground before reaching Lanka, and should he do so then he would not be able to lift it again. Taking advantage of this pre-condition, the two Gods, the Wind and Water Gods, created a situation whereby Ravana could no longer hold his urine, and putting Kailash at a secure place he went to relieve himself. But when he came back, the great mountain refused to budge. This immensely annoyed Ravana and in disgust he pushed the Shiva's Lingam with his big toe so hard that it sunk into the ground. It is believed that this insult that Ravana did to Shiva was the root cause of his fall and final death—because Shiva's eleventh form known as 'Rudra', the God of wrath and annihilation, assumed the form of Hanuman, the monkey warrior who led the charge of Lord Ram's army on Lanka that culminated in Ravana's death and defeat of the entire demon army.]

 nāma bibhīṣana jēhi jaga jānā. biṣṇubhagata bigyāna nidhānā. 5.

The king's younger brother named Arimardan became a demon named Kumbhakaran in the new birth. He was a virtual treasury of strength and valour.

[To wit, Kumbhakaran became Ravana's younger brother, and he was exceptionally strong, possessing immense strength and valour.] (3)

The king's chief minister who took interest in the principles of 'Dharma' (righteousness, probity, propriety, nobility in thought and conduct) became his younger step-brother<sup>1</sup>. (4)

His name was Vibhishan. The world knows him as one who was a devotee of Lord Vishnu, and as one who was well endowed with the virtues of wisdom, sagacity, prudence and intelligence<sup>2</sup>. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>King Pratapbhanu must have had many ministers like other great kings. But one of them was very close to him and the chief amongst all the ministers. He was the king's main advisor. This chief minister became Ravana's step-brother named Vibhishan.

This minister was not directly related to the king by blood, but since he was so nice and sagacious the king treated him like his own brother. So in the next birth too they were brothers but separated by blood—Vibhishan became Ravana's step-brother instead of being his direct blood-related sibling like Kumbhakaran who was Pratapbhanu's direct younger brother in the previous life.

According to Mahabharat, Vanparva, Chapter 275, Vibhishan is said to be a step-brother of Ravana. Briefly this story is as follows:-

Kuber, the treasurer of Gods, had appointed three young maidens of the demon race to serve sage Visrawa who happened also to be Kuber's father. Their names were Pushpotkataa, Raakaa and Maalini. They were experts in music and dance, and they used to keep the sage entertained. The sage was eventually pleased by their service and blessed them with boons that they would have three sons who would be as powerful and glorious as the three Lokpals, the three custodians of the three divisions of the world. By-and-by, Pushpotkataa gave birth to two sons—Ravana and Kumbhakaran, and Malini gave birth to a son named Vibhishan. The third woman named Raakaa gave birth to a daughter named Supernakha. Refer: Mahabharat, Vanparva, Chapter 275, verse nos. 7-8.

<sup>2</sup>It was expected of Vibhishan because in his previous life also he was a noble chief minister of king Pratapbhanu, and had always taken interest in following the principles of Dharma. That is why he was honoured with the name of 'Dharmaruchi'—one who takes interest in matters related to Dharma.]

All the sons of the king (Pratapbhanu) as well as those who were serving him, along with their own kith and kin, became demons in their next birth. These demons were extremely ferocious and vicious, and countless in numbers. (6)

All of them were personified forms of passion and lust, and they had magical powers by which they could assume any form they wished<sup>1</sup>. They were of many classes and orders. All were however highly wicked and deceitful, were fierce and terrible by all means, had no wisdom worth the name, and lacked all sense of propriety and probity. (7)

They had no trace of mercy or compassion in them. They were all sinful, cruel, vicious and ferocious to the extreme. It is not possible to narrate the way they ruthlessly tormented the whole world with virtual impunity. (8)

Though the demons were born in the worthy and honourable clan of sage Pulsatya which was held in great esteem, a family that was revered, free from taints, and deemed to be pious and holy, yet by the virtue of the curse of Brahmins the monstrous off-springs of the same clan became loathsome and degraded to the extreme, reaching the nadir of spiritual depravation and sinfulness, and transformed into embodiments of every sort of vice, evil, cruelty and wickedness that can be thought of. (Doha no. 176)

[Note—So far we have read about the life of Ravana in his previous birth. As a result of the Brahmins' curse all the members of king Pratapbhanu's family, either close or distant, as well as all his ministers, courtiers, servitors, commanders of the army, and all others who directly or indirectly served him or were related to him, became demons in their next birth.

Now we shall commence reading this fascinating part of the story of Ravana as narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 177—to Doha no. 180 as follows herein below:-]

All the three brothers (Ravana, Kumbhakarna and Vibhishan) did severe Tapa (penance) with all sincerity and diligence, employing all means within their reach to attain success in it. Their Tapa was so harsh, strict and intense that it is beyond words to describe it<sup>1</sup>. (1)

The Creator (Brahma) was pleased when he observed their Tapa, and he went to them and said, 'Dear, I am very pleased with you. Ask any boon that you desire from me.' (2)

[The Creator had first approached the eldest of the three brothers, Ravana.] The 10-headed one (Ravana) bowed to the Creator most reverentially and caught hold of his feet. Then he said prayerfully, 'Listen, oh the lord of the world. (3) ----

I must not be killed by anyone, except monkeys and human beings<sup>2</sup>.' (4)

Brahma replied, 'So shall it be. You have done severe Tapa by the virtue of it you have met me, Brahma the Creator. So I bless you with this boon that you desire.' (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In Adhyatma Ramayan, Uttar Kand, Canto 2 we read about the severity of their Tapa. Ravana fasted for one thousand years, at the end of which he offered one of his heads to the sacrificial fire. Then he fasted for another thousand years, offering his second head at the end of this period. He continued with this practice for ten thousand years, and when he was ready to offer his last head, Brahma appeared before him. (Refer: verse nos. 10-11.)

Kumbhakarna did Tapa for ten thousand years, and Vibhishan for five thousand years while standing on the toe of one foot. (Refer: verse nos. 8-9.)

A similar version is found in Anand Ramayan, Sarkand, Canto 13, verse nos. 47-50.

<sup>2</sup>In Adhyatma Ramayan, Uttar Kand, Canto 2, verse no. 13, Ravana has been specific in seeking immunity from Garud (the mount of Lord Vishnu, representing all sky-borne creatures), Serpents (representing all subterranean creatures and reptiles), Yaksha (demi-gods and spirits), Gods (residents of heaven), Demons (residents of nether world as well as members of his own race who may oppose and challenge his authority).

He thought that if he is granted fearlessness from such powerful forces, then humble monkeys and humans would be like dust for him, for they would never dare to stand before him. This loophole was later used to derive the maximum benefit by the Gods and Lord Vishnu when Ravana went berserk, killing, plundering and ravaging the creation merciless, because the Gods assumed the form of monkeys and Lord Vishnu of a human prince called Lord Ram to finally slay Ravana and eliminate the scourge of the cruel demons.]

sārada prēri tāsū mati phērī. māgēsī nīda māsa ṣaṭa kērī. 8.

[Then the Lord (Brahma) went to Kumbhakarna. As he saw his colossal form he was confounded and alarmed, wondering what would happen to this creation if all these wicked demons got absolute immunity from punishment and death, because then they will unleash a horrible torrent of torments with impunity, causing untold misery, grief and pain to all the creatures of the creation. This was not acceptable to the Creator, as it was his moral duty to protect the creation and its inhabitants he had himself created; being the great forefather of this creation he was also its patron caretaker and protector, responsible for its security and well-being. He cannot allow his discretionary powers to grant boons to come in the way of fulfilling his larger duties and responsibilities in this creation. So he was alarmed when he saw Kumbhakarna.

He thought for a while and decided that since he has already granted boons to Ravana and it cannot be reverted, the best he can do now was to limit the damage already done by stopping it from getting doubled by granting unbridled powers to Kumbhakarna. To wit, if he manages Kumbhakarna into asking some inconsequential boon, something nonsense and idiotic, then at least the horrors that the world would face would be reduced by half, as it then would only be limited to Ravana's whims.

Therefore, Brahma signaled Saraswati, the goddess of speech and wisdom, to act swiftly and delude Kumbhakarna's mind so that he asks something foolish and harmless.]

The Lord then went to Kumbhakarna, and seeing him he was filled with dismay. (6)

He thought to himself, “If this colossus fellow eats to his fill every day, the world would starve and there would be famine all around; the earth would become barren and ravished. [To wit, he will eat everything, and there would be nothing left for the rest of the creatures to survive on.]” (7)

So the wise and prudent Creator signaled Saraswati to delude Kumbhakarna’s mind, as a result of which he asked for a stupid and ridiculous boon of ‘sleeping uninterrupted for a period of six months at a time’<sup>1</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>On the single day when he woke up and ate, there was a virtual famine in the whole world, for he ate up everything that was available that day. Refer also: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 180.

What did Kumbhakarna eat? Well, a glimpse is available in Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 64 which says he gobbled up entire buffalos and drank huge cans of wine. The demons in general feasted on all living beings, such as humans, including sages, animals of all denominations, such as the cows and the buffaloes to mention only a few—refer: Ram Charit Manas, (i) Sundar Kand, Chanda line no. 10 that precedes Doha no. 3; and (ii) Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 45.

And how huge was he? He was like a living God of Death, and colossus as a mountain. (Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 62; and Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 65 respectively.)

It was not only ‘food’ that Brahma had in mind when he inspired Saraswati to prevail upon Kumbhakarna to ask for this absurd boon. As has been noted in the introductory paragraphs, Brahma reasoned that if Kumbhakarna was knocked out into deep slumber, then Ravana would be left alone. He won’t be able to cause much nuisance single-handed as he would be able to do if he had an active support of his equally wicked brother Kumbhakarna. So the expected horrors would at least be reduced by half. The physical dimensions of Kumbhakarna’s body were exceptionally huge, for he was as colossal as a great mountain. This meant that his physical strength and powers much surpassed that of Ravana.

So therefore, if the two, Ravana and Kumbhakarna, had joined hands in running around berserk, recklessly killing and spreading mayhem in this world, then whatever managed to survive from Ravana’s cruelty would also have perished. To wit, Brahma’s clever wit in provoking Kumbhakarna into asking a stupid boon of ‘sleep’ helped the world to survive for a longer period of time than it would have if both the brothers were actively involved in spreading the horrifying reign of the demons marked by cruelty, terror and dread in this world.]

Brahma went to his abode after granting them their desired boons. Then they (the three brothers) came back home elated and happy. (1)

A demon named 'Maye' (who was the architect of the demon race) had a most beautiful and charming daughter named Mandodari. (2)

He brought her and gave her in marriage to Ravana as he realized that soon the latter would be the ruler of the demon race (and the most powerful one in the whole world). (3)

Ravana was very pleased to get a nice wife for himself. By-and-by he also got his other two brothers married. (4)

In the middle of the ocean was a wonderful mountain with three lofty summits. It was called 'Trikut'; it was extensive in dimensions and most difficult to access. (5)

The demon Maye (who was the architect of the demon race) re-constructed and renovated it wonderfully, with full majesty, splendour and glamour. The newly refurbished city had countless majestic gilded palaces that were decorated with priceless gems. (6)

This city was as wondrous and beautiful as the legendary city of the serpents in the subterranean world, known as Bhogawati, as well as the city of Indra, the king of gods, that is known as Amravati. (7)

Nay, this newly founded city of the demons actually much surpassed these two legendary capitals (of the serpents and the demons) in its majesty, splendour and glamour; it was more charming, wondrous, beautiful and glamorous than the two of them. It was impenetrable and most awe-inspiring. Its name was 'Lanka'<sup>1</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This city was earlier the residents of the demons, but they had abandoned it out of fear of Lord Vishnu. They went and started living in the nether world. For some time it was left in ruins, but it was re-build by Kuber, the treasurer of gods, with the help of Vishwakarma. When Ravana assaulted and sacked it, it was once again reduced to rubble. Then Maye re-constructed it much better than what it previously was to convert it into a permanent dwelling place and the capital of the demon race after Ravana ascended to power. In an earlier time there lived in that city (of Lanka) great demon warriors who were brave and valiant. All of them were defeated or killed in battle by the Gods. (1)

At the behest of Indra (the king of Gods—"sakra"), who had conquered the city, many thousand warriors of Kuber (the Gods' treasurer—"jacchapati") lived in that place at the moment. (2)

Ravana heard of it somehow. So he gathered an army of his demon warriors and launched an assault, besieging the city. (3)

The victorious Ravana entered the city in triumph. He went around it to inspect it. Observing its magnificence, splendour and majesty, he felt extremely glad. (5)

Realising that it was not only beautiful and pleasant but very secure and safe from intrusion as it was inaccessible from any side (being surrounded by the ocean which formed a deep and huge moat around it), Ravana decided to establish his capital there. (6)

He distributed the buildings of the city amongst his demon warriors in accordance to their rank and status, and their eligibility. This was welcomed by one and all, making all the demons feel happy and contented.

[Note—Ravana only lifted Mt. Kailash, but he soon placed it back. With this single feat he sent a signal to the Gods and to everyone else in this creation to be careful with him—for he is extremely strong and powerful inasmuch as he could easily lift Mt. There were excellent valiant warriors there (in Lanka); some of the names of such great warriors were Durmukha (literally meaning one with an ugly face), Akampan (literally meaning one who never shook in fear), Vajradanta (literally meaning one with teeth that were as strong as Vajra, the strong weapon of Indra, the king of gods), Dhumketu (literally meaning who was like a comet), Atikaye (literally meaning one with a colossus body), etc.

These are but only a few names, for there were countless other matchless warriors like them in Lanka. Every one of them was competent to win the world single-handedly, without assistance. (Doha no. 180)

[Note—We have read how the demons, led by their king Ravana, established their kingdom with its capital at Lanka, a magnificent city situated on an island in the middle of the ocean. Initial resounding successes that were compounded by the boons Ravana had received from the Creator made him excessively arrogant and haughty beyond reason. He thought that the time of the demons had arrived, and fate was in their favour after a long time. Confident of his own strength and powers and invincibility, he became belligerent and determined to settle old scores with the Gods and also with the Brahmins due to whose curse he had to become a demon in the first place.

He also decided to go after the blood of sages and all other holy men as he feared that they have such great mystical powers that if he left them alone unharmed then they would team with the Brahmins and Gods, the deemed arch enemies of the demons, and the result would be a formidable force that may obstruct his plans to become the sole sovereign of the world and restore the lost glory of the demon race. A prudent king does not allow even a single seed of dissent or discontent or opposition to remain uncrushed, because a single, seemingly harmless seed might produce a thorny, poisonous plant that would one day prick and kill the same person who had had mercy on it and had spared it from being smothered earlier.

So therefore, Ravana decided to vanquish all Brahmins and Gods, as well as all sages and saintly persons, instilling such fear in their mind and heart that they would dare not raise their heads against him. The demons had always thought that the Brahmins, the Gods and the sages were their greatest enemies, so now that they had a powerful king in the person of Ravana it was the right time for them to assert their authority and reclaim their lost glory and powers.

Like a person who is long deprived of food and longs for even a morsel suddenly gets free access to a larder full of delectable delicacies, at which he lunges greedily and with full force, the demons, who were emboldened by Ravana's extraordinary prowess and powers that were bolstered by the boons of Brahma, and who felt that for far too long they had been subjected to harsh treatment, injustice and unfair deal at the hands of Gods and Brahmins, went amok with full vigour, going on a recklessly spree spreading dread, terror and havoc on all the corners of the earth, killing, plundering and tormenting all and sundry without exception. They wanted to wreak vengeance with full punch and force upon those whom they perceived as their hereditary arch enemies.

In the larger scheme of things, however, the demons' unbridled reign of terror and endless cycle of crimes and vices, excessive sinfulness, decadence and turpitude et al, suited well the Creator, because only when the balloon is full of gas, and when more and more of it is pumped into the balloon till it can't hold any more of this gas that it would finally burst, the Creator waited patiently and bid for time till all the limits of tolerance and forbearance and forgiveness were crossed by the demons, which was when the Creator would have an excuse to find a way to neutralize or rescind on his own boons without anyone accusing him of any wrong-doing. And so, in due course of time, it did happen that way, because the demons, finding no opposition to them and having acquired immense powers and strength, virtually sledge-hammered and bludgeoned their way through this world, reducing Dharma (religion and noble principles) to rubble, and making all the horrified creatures wail and grieve in excess of pain and misery.

We shall read all about the way the demons, led by their invincible and haughty king Ravana, had spread terror and dread throughout the creation. Ravana had become a big Hector and Achilles of his time; a big bully and tormentor, a merciless brute, a ruthless and unbridled warrior, a haughty, arrogant and egoist ruler of the world, but at the same time matchlessly brave, bold, valorous, courageous, strong, fearless and mighty, someone invincible and immune to death except for one weakness in his body which made him vulnerable, his Navel, for if someone hit him here with a sharp weapon, such as an arrow, it was destined that Ravana would die, very much like Achilles' Heels.

The narration of the demons' reign of terror, and the dread and havoc they created in this world has been narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 181—to Doha no. 183 as follows herein below:-]

All the demons were personified forms of worldly passion and lust; they also had the magical ability to assume any form they wished (kāmarūpa)<sup>1</sup>.

Besides this, they knew all sorts of wicked tricks, and were experts in the art of creating delusions and hallucinations (jānahim̐ saba māyā).

One day, while sitting in his royal court, the 10-headed Ravana looked around proudly and saw his huge family consisting of a countless number of demons. (2)

His extensive family consisted of his sons, attendants, kith and kin, and other relatives that were close to him, as well as the innumerable subjects of the demon kingdom that were divided into many other clans, sects and denominations having countless members. (3)

When he observed his huge army, he felt a natural sense of pride. Emboldened by this sight, his ego was stoked; he said very angrily and haughtily, ---- (4)

[Ravana addressed his generals and courtiers, speaking with a strong hint of vengeance in his voice. He instructed his army, saying in an angry tone marked with vengefulness—] ‘Listen all of you demon warriors. The Gods and their followers are our natural enemies’<sup>1</sup>. (5)

They are so cowardly that they don’t fight face to face with their enemies, and as soon as they discover that their adversary is strong, they flee from the place. (6)

There is one way by which they can be annihilated. I shall now tell all of you how to go about it. Listen carefully. (7)

Go and prevent the Brahmins from feeding themselves and making offerings to these Gods through fire sacrifices. Stop them from doing religious practices and performing rituals such as offering oblations, doing ablutions and performing fire sacrifices, as well as other ceremonies such as offering food and water to the spirits of dead ancestors.

[To wit, force the Brahmins and the Gods and the Spirits to starve. These Brahmins are deemed to be representatives of the Gods on earth, so if they starve they will become weak and ultimately die. The offering that these Brahmins make to the fire during the sacrifice provide nourishment to the Gods in heaven; so if you stop these religious practices the Gods too will die of hunger. Just like the Gods, the Spirits too will die of hunger and thirst if no one offers them food and water during ceremonies to mark the dead. So therefore, if we, the demons, wish to eliminate all opposition to our rule and well-being then it is absolutely essential to weaken the Gods and the Brahmins by making them starve.] (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The Gods and the Demons had been natural enemies from the very beginning. The simple reason, without going into the mythological history, is that they represent two absolutely opposite and inimical aspects and virtues in this creation. It is just like the case of day and night; though both form an integral part of life on earth but they can't exist simultaneously—for if it is day then there cannot be night, and if it is night then daylight is out of the picture. It's a natural phenomenon. So, while the Gods represent all that is good, righteous, noble, holy and auspicious in this world, the Demons symbolize just the opposite—i.e. everything that stands for evil, sin and wickedness.

Coming specifically to the case of Ravana and his clan of demons, the special reason for his aggravated hate and spiked antagonism for the Gods, the Brahmins and the holy people attired like the hermits, the sages and the ascetics lie in the history of his previous life when he was king Pratapbhanu, the story which we have already read earlier in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 153—to Doha no. 176.

It was a person disguised as a 'hermit' who had cheated him and maneuvered things in such a wicked way that Pratapbhanu, who was otherwise a noble and righteous king, was cursed to become a demon with his entire family and subjects of his kingdom. Who cursed him? It were the 'Brahmins' who had cursed him, without verifying facts and without determining if he was actually at fault or not. Further, when these proud Brahmins learnt a little while later that the king had no role to play in the circumstances that led them to curse him, they did not make any effort to amend their curse or reduce its intensity so that some soothing balm could be applied over the severe harm that was caused to Pratapbhanu due to the unjust curse that they had so hastily cast upon him. Say, if they could be in such a hurry to give a curse of condemnation on an innocent person, albeit out of misunderstanding or misinformation, why couldn't they ameliorate the suffering of the accursed by giving him a boon to counter the pain and injury caused by the unmerited curse?

Then come the role of the 'Gods'. Though it is true that they had informed the Brahmins that the curse which they had cast on king Pratapbhanu was unjust and unwarranted as the king was at no fault, but the Gods could have told this fact to the Brahmins earlier also—at the time when there was an invisible voice from the sky warning the Brahmins that meat had been mixed in their food, that had made them so angry that they cursed the king to become a mean-eating demon—so that the Brahmins would not have become angry at the king, but instead would have cursed the wicked hermit and his equally wicked friend, the demon, who actually were behind the whole conspiracy.

These developments had an immense psychological impact on Pratapbhanu which shook him to the core, and he determined to teach, when the proper time comes, all these three categories—the Brahmins, the Gods, and all those who were attired as hermits, ascetics and sages—a bitter lesson which they will remember for countless generations to come!

So once Pratapbhanu's soul entered the body of a demon to become Ravana, and Ravana acquired boons of invincibility and unparallel strength from the creator Brahma, he went ahead with his 'teaching' project with unbridled vehemence and excessive wrath known only to a person who seeks retribution with a vengeance as he feels that some great injustice had suddenly been heaped upon him at a time when he had no wherewithal to protect himself, nor had he been given a chance to stand trial and explain himself.

Ravana's actions and deeds are reminiscent of a volcano suppressed over a long period of time, and then it suddenly bursts forth with a force of intense fury when it finds a crevice or a vent on the surface of the earth to pour out scorching lava that can wipe out entire civilisations, reduce earth to a barren landscape of lifeless rocks, and also boil the cold water of the ocean to where it flows in streams that are bubbling hot like oil spluttering on a pan over the fire place. Like this lava, there was no stopping of Ravana!]

He (Ravana) summoned Meghnad (his son), encouraging and motivating him by praising his abilities, valour and strength. Then Ravana advised his son [1], ‘All those Gods who pride themselves as being steady and invincible in battle, who are proud of their strength and courage and privileges [2], you must go and defeat them in the battle-field, and then having conquered them and crushed their pride, you must tie them up and bring them here in captivity as trophies of war.’

When his son heard these instructions of his father, he got up immediately to carry them out outright with diligence and vehemence [3]. (1-3)

In this way, after having given appropriate instructions to everyone (i.e. to all his family members, all his commanders, as well as the countless other chiefs of the demon race), Ravana himself got up with a formidable mace in his hand. (4)

When the ten-headed Ravana stoutly set out on his mission of conquest of the world, the whole earth shook under his commanding feet (even as he stomped and stamped angrily on the earth while moving ahead briskly to seek and destroy any opposition that he may encounter on the way).

When he roared, yelled and thundered, those spouses of the Gods in the heaven who happened to be pregnant at the time, they miscarried<sup>1</sup>. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A similar thing is reported when Hanuman launched himself, with a great sound of thunder and blast in the skies of Lanka, when he was on his way back to the other side of the ocean where his companions were waiting for his arrival. At that time also, the pregnant women folks of the demons had aborted out of terror. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 28.]

When the Gods heard that Ravana is coming their way angrily, they were terrified out of their wits and scampered for cover, quickly hiding themselves in the many grottos

(caves and catacombs) in Mt. Meru (the great mountain in the heaven on the summit of which the Gods had their capital). (6)

When the ten-headed Ravana reached the wonderfully charming and exceedingly pleasant capital city of the 'custodians of the world' (i.e. the God; "digapāla"), he found it abandoned. (7)

He repeatedly roared victoriously like a lion, profusely and vehemently abusing the Gods again and again, shaming them contemptuously, and challenging them for a duel.

[To wit, when Ravana found that the Gods had already run away before his arrival in the heaven, he felt very proud of his own strength and powers as now he was certain that none of them had the stomach to face him. To further humiliate the Gods, who were eternal enemies of the demons, and to demoralize them, to crush their self-respect, and to smother their dignity further, he abused them and taunted them in the most insinuating way he could devise.] (8)

He ran amok and went wild in this world, running briskly from one of its three corners to the other (i.e. to all the parts of the heaven, the earth and the nether world) to find anyone who would dare challenge him, as he was intensely itching for a fight and was maddened with a burning desire for a duel that would spill blood.

But to his dismay, and satisfaction at the same time<sup>1</sup>, he did not find one single challenger to his might, anywhere.

[<sup>1</sup>He was dismayed because his itch for a battle was irritating him, and he could not find someone against whom he could rub himself to ease this annoying irritation. At the same time he was immensely satisfied to discover that he was the mightiest and the strongest one in the whole creation, someone who has sent even the Gods, who otherwise are very proud of their own powers, authority and strength, shivering for cover out of fear of him, with their wives aborting their embryos! It surely must have granted sadistic comfort to Ravana.] (9)

All the prominent Gods such as the Sun, the Moon, Pawan (Wind-God), Varun (Water-God), Kuber (the treasurer of Gods), Agni (Fire-God), Kaal (God of Death and Time), Yamraj (the God of Hell)—all these higher authorities and senior custodians of their respective realms [10], as well as the Kinnars (heavenly dancers), the Siddhas (mystics), human beings, and all the other remaining junior or demi-gods, as well as the Nagas (serpents; the custodians of the nether and subterranean worlds)—Ravana pursued them all relentlessly, without exception [11]. All the demons, individually as well as in groups, were of colossus sizes, very sinful and exceedingly evil, and were inveterate tormentors of the Gods. (3)

Huge hordes of demons unleashed an uncontrolled reign of terror and mayhem all around. They were able to assume magical forms in the way they liked (to carry out their schemes). (4)

They did everything that was against the principles of Dharma (probity, propriety, righteousness and noble thought and conduct) and the Vedas (ancient scriptures) to ensure that they were completely ruined and utterly defiled. (5)

In whichever city, town or village they found Brahmins and cows (symbolizing domesticated animals), they relentlessly set the whole habitations on fire to burn everything down. [To wit, they behaved like an invading army of savages and fiends who kill and plunder and burn just for the sadistic pleasure of it.] (6)

सुभ आचरन कतहुँ नहिं होई । देव बिप्र गुरु मान न कोई ॥ ७ ॥

nahim haribhagati jagya tapa gyānā. sapanēhum' suni'a na bēda purānā. 8.

As a consequence, there was no morality, righteousness, propriety and probity left anywhere in the world; no one behaved rightly and all traces of goodness vanished.

No one paid heed to or respected the Gods, the Brahmins or their Guru (teachers; preceptors; guides), treating them with utter disrespect and neglect. (7)

There was no devotion for Lord Hari (the Supreme Being; the Lord God), and neither were there any Yagyas (fire sacrifices), Tapa (penance and austerity) or Gyan (spiritual wisdom and gnosis; learning and knowledge of the scriptures and other metaphysical branches of knowledge).

No one even dreamt of hearing any of the scriptures such as the Vedas and the Purans. (8)

[Note—There was a complete breakdown of law and order; goodness, righteousness and all other virtues evaporated, and these were replaced by sins, vices, evil and perversion that metaphorically turned the green earth into a barren desert.

There were two obvious reasons for this sorry state of affairs to come about. One of course was the direct action of the demons, and the other was an indirect affect. The people realized that if they had to survive and live in reasonable peace then they ought to do the demons' bidding, for otherwise these cruel and remorseless demons would not only kill them but also burn everything down. Hence, as a measure of survival the general populace did what pleased the demons, as in the present frame of time they were the realm's rulers. To do anything that Ravana and his followers did not want was inviting death and destruction voluntarily. Who in his right mind would want it?]

If the ten-headed Ravana happened to hear that someone was engaged in doing Japa (repetition of Mantras and Lord God's holy name), Yoga (meditation, contemplation), Vairagya (renunciation), Tapa (penance and austerity), or Yagya (fire sacrifice) and offering oblations to the Gods during the process—he would get up instantly himself, rush to that place, and lay to waste everything around, killing or arresting all those who were engaged in these religious activities, and generally plundering the place. (Chanda line nos. 1-2)

In this way, the whole world was rife with widespread evil and sinful deeds; no one bothered to hear anything pertaining to Dharma (righteousness, goodness, probity and propriety).

If anyone said or heard the scriptures, such as the Vedas and the Purans, he (Ravana) would terrorize him in many ways, and forced him out of his country (i.e. snatched his home and sent him to the wilderness to suffer and die). (Chanda line nos. 3-4)

Indeed, it is not possible to describe the extent and intensity of sins and evil deeds that the demons were recklessly perpetrating in this world.

Verily, those who have no morality and sense of propriety worth the name left in them, those who have no conscience left in them at all, say what is the use of talking about the extent of decadence and degradation to which they can fall, and the nadir of evilness and sinfulness to which they could stoop? [To wit, there is no limit or end to it.] (Sortha no. 183)

[Note—We have read till now how the demons led by their invincible king Ravana had spread a ferocious and vicious reign of excessive of terror and mayhem, horrifying the entire creation and causing havoc and torment all around. All good virtues were trampled underfoot, and everything that stood for evil, sin, vice, perversion, decadence and outright immorality took the front stage.

Beyond a certain limit everything is bad. When a certain threshold was crossed, when the things reached a nadir and became simply and absolutely intolerable, when the very existence was in question, then the Gods and Mother Earth decided to approach the Supreme Being to do something to save them from further horrors, grief, torments and humiliation, and to protect this creation from complete annihilation.

So the Lord promised them that he will come down to earth himself in the form of Lord Ram, and do what is necessary to eliminate the scourge of the evil Ravana and his clan of cruel, vicious and ferocious demons. On their part the Gods decided to help the Lord by coming down to the earth by assuming the forms of monkeys and bears, and then join the Lord in his campaign to eliminate the demons and free everyone of their fear.

This part of the story has been narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 184—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 188 as follows herein below:-]

चौ०. बाढ़े खल बहु चोर जुआरा । जे लंपट परधन परदारा ॥ १ ॥

During the period when the demons' had established sovereignty over the world and their power and authority were in the ascendance, there was an exponential increase in the number of villains and scoundrels who were unabashedly wicked, thieves and gamblers, and who greedily coveted the wealth and women of others. (1)

They paid no heed or showed respect to either their own parents or to the Gods; they made saintly people serve them like slaves or servants.

[To wit, these demons had no scruples or morality. They feared none, and treated all with utter disdain.] (2)

[Lord Shiva said to Parvati to whom he is narrating this story—] Oh Bhavani! All those who exhibit the traits briefly outlined in the foregoing verses<sup>1</sup> should be regarded as 'demons'.

[To wit, even if the concerned creature is not in the physical form that is usually identified with an ugly, hideous, fearsome and horrifying form of a demon, even if the creature has a pleasant countenance and a attractive visage that seems sweet to the eye, but if that creature's acts and deeds are anywhere close to the way demons have been described in these verses, then let it be known for sure that that particular creature is a demon in disguise.] (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The notorious character of demons, their despicable nature and the evil deeds that define them have been outlined briefly in the verses of Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1, 8 that precede Doha no. 181; (ii) from Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 183—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 184.]

When Mother Earth observed that there was an extreme decline of morality, ethics and righteousness, when she was alarmed at the level of decadence to which the society had stooped, and when all the parameters of Dharma (principles of righteousness, auspiciousness, probity, propriety, nobility and goodness) were violated and trampled upon (by the demons and their followers), she felt sore affright and became extremely restless<sup>1</sup>.

[<sup>1</sup>The Earth was terrified as she did not know what to do and how to get rid of the scourge symbolized by the demons. She was agitated because she is like a 'mother' for this creation; for it is in the symbolic womb of the Earth that all living beings have their origin, and it is Earth that nourishes and sustains them all from their cradle to their grave. Even for the trees and the organisms low down in the hierarchy of creation, Earth is not only their dwelling place but also their sustainer and nourisher. So therefore, even as a mother feels extremely annoyed, sorry and agitated if her children go out of her hands to cause unwarranted and intolerable nuisance and mischief everywhere, when Mother Earth saw the kind of mayhem and chaos that the demons unleashed in this world, and utter disregard for any principles and scruples that they exhibited, creating extreme torment, suffering and hardship for the rest of the inhabitants of the Earth, she was gravely hurt and remorseful. Mother Earth could not cope with this sort of suffering any longer; the sinfulness and evilness and cruelty and horror that prevailed on her surface was unbearable for her. The demons were like a poisonous thorn stuck deep into her bosom, bleeding her, tormenting her and constantly rubbing salt over her sore wounds, day in and day out.] (4)

Mother Earth thought to herself, 'I do not regard the mighty mountains, the great rivers and the endless ocean as any kind of weight on my self, and I do not feel inconvenienced or oppressed by them, but someone who is malevolent towards others, someone who torments and causes suffering and pain to others, is a weight that I can't bear, for I feel suffocated by such creatures' presence.' (5)

Earth observed that all the principles of Dharma had been corrupted so much so that not even a trace of any of the principles of goodness, righteousness and probity remained in their primal form.

[The situation had become so serious and alarming that—] Everyone (i.e. even the sages and seers, the mystics and the gods et al) was so terrified of Ravana that no one dared speak a word (against him, nor raise any objection or opposition to his misdeeds). [To wit, the whole world was so terrified of Ravana's wrath that they thought it better to keep quiet. Even the so-called keepers of Dharma, such as the sages, seers and the gods, too preferred to keep mum.] (6)

After contemplating over the matter a lot, Earth decided to assume the form of a cow. Then she went to a place where other great sages and the gods had already assembled<sup>1</sup>. (7)

She wept bitterly and narrated her tale of woes. But no one had any solution or and answer for her predicaments; everyone, the great sages as well as the mighty gods, listened to Earth helplessly, and none could or would offer a solution to her (because they were in the same state of confusion and consternation as the Earth)<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When Earth saw that she had no hope from anyone else because no one would stand up against Ravana and the demons to invite their cruel wrath, she decided to do something herself. So she assumed the form of a ‘cow’ and went to place where all the great sages and gods had got together in a huddle. They too were worried, and so they secretly assembled at some out-of-sight place at which the demons had yet not paid any attention. These sages and gods were discussing the same matter that had created so much consternation for the Earth, and it was of finding a way to get rid of this problem of the demons led by Ravana.

<sup>2</sup>Earth did not know that these powerful sages, seers and gods were as helpless as her. In fact, they had assembled at a place precisely for discussing this problem of Ravana, and how to find a way out it. So when she wept and sought their help, they kept quiet and pleaded helplessness. It has already been said that Ravana had forcefully subjugated sages and gods after getting boons from Brahma. Refer: (i) Doha no. 181 along with Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede it; (ii) Doha no. 182 along with Chaupai line nos. 2-3, 6-13 that precede it; and (iii) Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 183.]

All those who had assembled to discuss the matter—such as the Gods, the learned Munis (sages) and the Gandharvas (demi-gods)—went together to the abode of Brahma, the creator. [The immediate matter that concerned them all was Ravana and his army of demons who had spread their atrocious rule of horror and grief which had made life hell for all living beings. The gods were representatives for all those who were suffering at the hands of the cruel and wicked demons, and they went to the Creator to seek his help and advice to find out a way of their predicament.] (Chanda line no. 1)

They were accompanied by earth which was extremely terrified, worried and sad; she was in the form of a 'cow'. (Chanda line no. 2)

When Brahma learnt everything about the gravity of the matter, he felt that the situation was beyond his ability and power to either mend or control; he was dismayed that he has to concede his helplessness in being able to render any help in this matter. (Chanda line no. 3)

[Brahma's attention was drawn specially to the pitiable condition of earth who was in the form of a cow. He felt extremely sorry and worried for her, but though he had great sympathy and empathy he was distressed that he could not help her in the least. However, being wise and elderly in creation, Brahma had great experience of similar situations from the past. Upon deep contemplation he felt that inspite of all odds there was still a ray of hope left. So he turned to earth and advised her as follows—]

Brahma advised earth, which was in the form of a cow, 'He who is immortal and eternal, and whom you serve as a maid (i.e. the Supreme Lord whose command you obey most faithfully)—well, that (merciful and gracious) Lord will surely be of help to you, as well as for us. [To wit therefore, let us all join hands to pray to that Lord and seek his blessing and intervention. I tell you all truly that it is the only feasible solution for our predicament.]' (Chanda line no. 4)

Brahma the creator (birañci) told earth, 'Oh Earth! Have patience and courage; contemplate upon and remember the holy feet of Lord Hari (the Supreme Being; Lord Vishnu).

The gracious and merciful Lord understands the pain and grief in the heart of his devotees. So he will immediately take cognizance of your prayers and initiate steps to eliminate the very cause that is tormenting you so much and giving you such extreme misery.' (Sortha no. 184)

[Note—It ought to be noted here that Brahma has addressed Mother Earth specifically, and makes no mention of others who were with her, such as the Gods, the sages and the Gandharvas. It clearly means that he was much moved by her pitiful condition. Since earth is the dwelling place of all living beings in this world, her miserable condition represented the horrors and torments faced by every single creature of Brahma's creation.

Brahma is the 'creator' and the 'grandfather' of this creation, and he had himself assigned Mother Earth the duty to take care of the day-to-day sustenance of his creation. So it is but natural that when he saw Mother Earth, who is his own representative, coming to him in utter distress with her grievances and complain to him that his creation is being subjected to immense torture, he will be duty-bound to give her a special audience.

This episode also shows that the Creator is more concerned about the welfare and well-being of the humble subjects of his creation than he is for those who highly placed in the hierarchy of creation. To wit, Brahma is very worried about the suffering of ordinary creatures who live an ordinary life on earth, creatures who have no high contacts and who are not high-profile individuals like the gods, the sages and the gandharvas who had accompanied mother earth. Brahma knew very well that these gods, sages and gandharvas etc. are capable of taking care of themselves, but the poor creatures whom earth represents are absolutely helpless and hapless, and therefore they need special attention.

That is why Brahma paid special attention to the complaint of Mother Earth, and addressed her personally. Obviously all the Gods, Munis and Ghandharvas who were with Earth too heard what Brahma said, and everyone decided to jointly pray to the Supreme Being to intervene and save them from more horrors and sufferings.]

[Now the crucial thing was to find out where the Supreme Lord was, how to find him, so that a request can be made to him to save the world from the horrors of Ravana and his race of demons.]

All the Gods and others who were with them (i.e. the sages, the Gandharvas, Brahma the creator, Shiva the concluder etc.) sat down to ponder over the matter of how and where to find the Supreme Lord so that they can plead before him and request him for help. (1)

Someone in the assembly advised that the Lord resides in the heaven known as Vaikuntha so they must make haste to go there, while someone else said that the Lord lives in the middle of the celestial Ocean (called the “payanidhi”, literally the endless treasury of water, where Lord Vishnu reclines on the coiled body of Seshnath, the celestial serpent, as the latter floats on the surface of this vast ocean). (2)

The fact is that it is an established principle that the Lord always reveals himself in response to devotion and the extent of affection and faith that a devotee has in his heart.

[To wit, there is no need to go anywhere in search of the Supreme Being, for he is omnipresent and all-pervading. The only single requirement to make the Lord reveal himself is to have high level of devotion, affection and faith in him. The term 'extent' indicates that the greater is the intensity of devotion, affection and faith that the devotee has in his heart, the easier it is for him to make the Lord manifest himself.] (3)

[Lord Shiva, who was also present during the confabulation, told Parvati to whom he is narrating this episode—] "Listen Girija (Shiva's consort)! I was also present in that assembly. When I found an opportunity, I spoke up and gave them an advice. (4)

[Lord Shiva said—] I told them that Lord Hari (Vishnu) is omnipresent, immanent and all-pervading in this creation; he is present everywhere in an even manner. I (Shiva) know for certain (by my personal experience) that he reveals himself in response of the affection of his devotees. (5)

Tell me if there is a single place, time, direction and quarter of this creation where the Lord is not present. In all sooth and without gainsay, the Lord is present everywhere, at all times, and in every imaginable situation in this creation. (6)

The Lord pervades this creation from the within and the without, for he is revealed in the form of the animate as well as the inanimate components of this creation. In spite of this, he is separate and detached from this creation<sup>1</sup>.

[<sup>1</sup>This is the great paradox with the Supreme Being—that though on the one hand it is said that every single entity in this creation is a revelation of the Lord in its individual form, that the creation itself is an image of the Supreme Being who is also known as 'Brahm', yet on the other hand the Lord himself is distinct and different from any one or all the entities of creation taken together.]

The Lord manifests himself everywhere as if by magic if there is devotion and affection for him just fire that can be ignited with the firewood anywhere if the conditions are right<sup>2</sup>.

[<sup>2</sup>The 'fire element' is inherently present in the firewood in a latent form, for it ordinarily remains invisible and dormant. When the right conditions prevail, such as when the firewood is vigorously rubbed and a little air is available, this hidden fire suddenly emerges in a visible form. Likewise, the Supreme Being is present in an invisible form everywhere in this creation. It simply requires devotion, faith and affection for the Lord to make him reveal himself instantly.]' (7)

These words (advice) of mine were well-received by one and all. Brahma praised me and welcomed this advice by an applause, saying ‘well said, well said indeed’.” (8)

[Brahma offered his prayers to the Supreme Being with these words—]

‘Glory to the Supreme Lord<sup>1</sup> who is the Lord of all the Gods, who gives joy and comfort to his devotees, and who grants unquestioned protection to all those who come to him to surrender and seek refuge! Glory to him; glory to such a Supreme Being! (Chanda line no. 1)

[<sup>1</sup>In the next stanza we will read that the Supreme Being to whom this prayer is being offered is Lord Vishnu, the husband of Laxmi—“sindhusutā priya kantā”.]

You are a benevolent benefactor of the cows (representing all humble and harmless creatures), the Brahmins (representing the elderly, learned and wise ones in the society).

Glory to the Lord who is an enemy of the demons (representing the evil, sinful, cruel and dark forces of creation), and who is the dear husband of the daughter-of-the-ocean (i.e. goddess Laxmi)! [This last statement means that the ‘Lord’ and the ‘Supreme Being’ to whom Brahma and the other Gods are offering their prayers is Lord Vishnu as he is the consort of Laxmi, the goddess of wealth and prosperity. She is called the ‘daughter-of-the-ocean’ because she had her origin in the ocean when it was being churned by the Gods and the Demons in search of Amrit, the ambrosia of immortality.] (Chanda line no. 2)

You are the sustainer and the protector of the gods and the earth. No one can know your mysteries or the secret behind your wonderful maverick deeds. [To wit, the ways of the Lord are beyond the understanding of ordinary mortals. Nay, even the gods fail to understand them.] (Chanda line no. 3)

Oh Lord, who by his very nature and habit most gracious, compassionate and benevolent, please be kind upon us (the gods and the earth with all its inhabitants). [Oh Lord, we are suffering horribly under the atrocities unleashed by Ravana and his army of demons. So we most humbly plead with you to save us and grant us your protection.] (Chanda line no. 4)

Glory to the Lord who is imperishable and eternal, who dwells in the inner-self of all living beings in the form of their Atma (which is pure consciousness), who is all-pervading, omnipresent and immanent, and who is an embodiment of supreme bliss, felicity and beatitude. (Chanda line no. 5)

The Lord is beyond comprehension; no one knows or understands either who he is or his mysterious ways. He is beyond the perception or reach of the sense organs<sup>1</sup> (and none of these sense organs of perception are able to perceive anything about the Lord).

The deeds and actions as well as the stories that are related to his different manifestations—all of them are holy and divine.

The Lord is free from all Maya (delusions and its affect), and so he is the one who grants the nectar of immortal bliss and happiness<sup>2</sup>.

[<sup>1</sup>There are five gross organs of perception in the body: ears that hear, eyes that see, tongue that tastes, skin that feels, and nose that smells. A person knows anything about the world with the help of one or more of these organs. This stanza affirms that the Supreme Being cannot be understood by employing any of these gross instruments. Besides these five gross organs of perception, there is the mind and the intellect which also act as organs of perception, but at a subtler level. The Lord is beyond their reach too.

<sup>2</sup>This stanza clearly means that ‘Maya’, or the different kinds of worldly delusions and infatuations, is the root cause of all sorts of unhappiness and sorrow that torment a living being. Since the Lord is unaffected by Maya, he is therefore an eternal source of happiness and bliss.] (Chanda line no. 6)

It is for the love of the Lord and his sake that those who wise and enlightened renounce the gross world and its material temptations, and then they sincerely strive to develop deep and unwavering devotion and affection for him within their heart. (Chanda line no. 7)

Such wise and enlightened sages, hermits and ascetics pursue the Lord; they always think of him, remember him, constantly contemplate and meditate upon him, and sing his glories and invoke his divine name, day and night.

Glory to this honourable and great Lord who is Truth and eternal Consciousness personified, and who is truly an embodiment of infinite bliss, felicity and beatitude. (Chanda line no. 8)

The Supreme Lord who created this three dimensional world<sup>1</sup> all by himself, without anyone to help him at all [line no. 9] ---

---Let this Lord, who is a destroyer of sins and evil forces of creation, also listen to our humble prayers offered with the greatest supplication by us, and relieve us of all our worries and fears (for we are humble and we do not even know how to offer worship or prayers to him in the proper way; so let the Lord forgive us for our incompetence in the manner in which we offer this prayer to him) [line no. 10]<sup>2</sup>. (Chanda line nos. 9-10)

[<sup>1</sup>This creation is said to be of 'three dimensions' because it has three basic types of Gunas or qualities in it: viz. the Sata Guna, the Raja Guna and the Tama Guna. The 'Sata Guna' represents the positive qualities of virtuousness, righteousness and goodness in their best forms; the 'Tama Guna' is the opposite of the Sata Guna and represents everything that is dark, negative, evil and sinful; the 'Raja Guna' stands for those qualities that are combinations of these two, and therefore the median quality that acts as a balancing force. In some way or the other, these three qualities are represented by the three basic types of inhabitants of this world—the 'gods' and the 'demons' at the two extremities, and the 'humans' somewhere in the middle.

<sup>2</sup>Brahma wishes to request the Supreme Lord that he should not pay any attention to the words which are being used in the prayer that the former is saying, for no one is so skilled that he can boast of saying a prayer that is perfect and of the highest mark. It pleases the Lord to be humble and unpretentious before him, and so even Brahma—who had created the Vedas, the primary scriptures, and as such cannot be regarded as unlettered or unskilled—decided to become humble and unpretentious before the Supreme Being.]

The Supreme Lord who destroys the fetters represented by this gross mortal world and its many delusions and miseries, the Lord who provides joy and bliss to the Mana (mind and heart) of sages, seers and hermits, the Lord who destroys troubles and ill-fortunes [line no. 11]---

---We the Gods have come to take shelter in the holy feet of such a Lord with all humility in our command, without any pretension or right to privileges of any kind in any of our thoughts, words and deeds (i.e. we are extremely honest in our prayers of supplication and in our request for protection from the Lord) [line no. 12]. No one has ever known or understood the mysteries of the Lord—not even Sarada (goddess Saraswati who is the patron of knowledge, wisdom and intelligence), the Srutis (Vedas, the most ancient scriptures that are repositories of knowledge), Seshnath (the legendary serpent-god who is said to be very close to Lord Vishnu, and who has thousand hoods symbolizing someone who has a thousand-fold knowledge of any thing), the Rishis (great sages and seers) and the Ashesas (the remaining sages such as the mystics, hermits, ascetics etc.) are able to know the Lord. (Chanda line no. 13)

Oh the Supreme God whom the Vedas proclaim as the one who loves all those who are humble, distressed, downtrodden and lowly—please be kind to have pity on us and take merciful cognizance of our precarious situation. (Chanda line no. 14)

You are metaphorically like the great Mt. Mandrachal<sup>1</sup> for the purpose of overcoming the fear arising out of this vast ocean-like mortal world of transmigration; you are charming and appealing in all possible ways; you are a treasure-trove of all the excellent virtues and the best of qualities; and you are a fountain-head of eternal bliss, joy and peace.

[<sup>1</sup>Mt. Mandrachal was used as a churning rod by the Gods and the Demons to churn the celestial ocean in the beginning of creation to produce the ambrosia of immortality. This ambrosia was called 'Amrit', and it removed the fear of death. This metaphor is used to imply that the Lord can remove all sorts of fears that the creature has in this mortal world.] (Chanda line no. 15)

All of us—all the sages and seers and hermits, all the mystics as well as the gods who are extremely terrified and sore with fright—bow and surrender ourselves at your holy lotus-like feet<sup>2</sup>.

[<sup>2</sup>Though the gods and the sages have not expressly said that they are terrified of Ravana and are being tormented by the demons for which purpose they have come to the Supreme Being to ask him to protect them from this scourge and eliminate the demons, but it is understood and expected from the Lord that he knows everything even without telling him clearly. So the gods and sages thought it wiser and more prudent to limit themselves to just offering their obeisance and prayers, and leave the rest of the things to the Supreme Being himself.

Another reason for not specifically mentioning Ravana and the demons was to avoid provoking them openly because there were chances that some spy might be watching them and he would go and report everything to Ravana. If that happens then Ravana would either kill all of them outright for complaining against him, or at least make life a burning hell for them by hounding them and subjecting them to endless tortures even before the Supreme Being can find time to put into effect his promises. So the gods and sages decided to maintain secrecy and show discretion while offering their prayers.] (Chanda line no. 16)

Realising that the Gods and the Earth were sore affright, terrorized and extremely distressed, and hearing their prayerful entreaties made with the greatest of affection and reverence, an invisible Being spoke from the sky (heaven) in a deep-sounding and resonating voice that removed their grief, worries and doubts. (Doha no. 186)

[Note—This was the Supreme Being known as ‘Brahm’ speaking himself—refer Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 187 herein below.

Earlier too, when we have read about Manu and Satrupa doing severe Tapa, and the Supreme Being revealing himself before them, it is said that “a voice was heard in the sky as if someone with no physical body was speaking from above, because the sound filled the entire space of the dome of the firmament above the earth, and it was exceptionally deep, grave and reverberating like the rumble of a fast approaching rain-cloud during a thunderstorm.” {Apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 145.}

The Lord’s voice was grave, deep and resounding like the distant rumble of thunder, and as it reverberated all over the place it sent cheers in the rank of the gods and made earth smile in joy. It is because when the gods and the earth heard this voice they felt reassured as it clearly indicated that their prayers have been answered by the Supreme Lord, and the Lord wants to be responsive to their pleas. This was half battle won for the gods and the earth, for they were sure that if the Lord has chosen to respond to them and reply to their prayers then he will also make sure that their prayers are answered in an adequate way, that their requests are satisfactorily attended to, and they don't have to go empty-handed and rejected from his doorstep.]

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The Lord has addressed the sages, the mystics and the then the gods in that order. It is because this is the order in which these exalted ones had mentioned themselves to the Supreme Lord while concluding their prayers—refer: Chanda line no. 16 herein above.

<sup>2</sup>When the Lord says that he will come down to earth accompanied by his fractional parts it simply means that he will be accompanied by his assistants or close associates to help him fulfill the promises he has made to the gods, sages and earth.

Had the Lord so wished he could have come alone and slay the demons and their leader Ravana by his mere wish, for there is nothing in this creation which is impossible for him or beyond his abilities, but that would have gone against the boons granted to Ravana by Brahma—that he would only be killed at the hands of a human being. In deference to this boon the Lord was obliged to act like an ordinary human being in order to keep the sanctity of Brahma's words, and so he needed assistance. He could not act like some super-man having some super-natural power to slay Ravana.

It is the way of the world that even the mightiest and ablest of kings need assistance of many ministers and administrators to run his kingdom, as well as commanders and a huge garrison of soldiers to maintain peace and order in his kingdom; the king is not a magician who can do things by swinging a magic wand! So therefore, if the Lord were to act like a human being in order to slay Ravana and keep his words to the gods etc. then he had to refrain from doing anything that is beyond any man to do.

Besides this, it was imperative for the Supreme Being to maintain top secrecy in putting his plans into practice lest Ravana would get a hint and quickly undo everything before the Lord can even initiate any action. Hence, the Lord had to act perfectly like an ordinary human being, not giving any single hint about who he actually was. When we read the story of the Ramayana we will realize that the Lord had taken strict precautions in this matter—never for even once did he let anyone know that he was the Supreme Being and possesses supernatural powers.

That said, the Supreme Being had to consciously delegate some of his own powers and authority to entities that appeared to be separate and distinct from him, but were actually the Lord's own fractional forms that were his own image, in order to play his role as a human to perfection. It was done with the express purpose to maintain utmost secrecy of the project. It was done so as to make it appear, at least on the surface that the Lord's powers and abilities were limited like an ordinary man, and that his ultimate slaying of Ravana and elimination of the cruel demons were the natural culmination of a long sequence of events that started when Lord Ram was sent to the forest due to family intrigue over the crown of the kingdom, and which went on to the point when Sita, Ram's wife, was kidnapped by Ravana, compelling Lord Ram to go to Lanka in an effort to free his wife, which is something any other honourable man would have done himself, and which led to the fierce war of Lanka and the slaying of Ravana and other cruel demons who had been tormenting the gods, sages and earth.

So now, the question arises 'who were these fractional forms of the Supreme Being who had accompanied him when he manifested himself as a human being'?

This question can be answered at two levels, viz. the metaphysical and the mythological. We shall briefly glance at both of them.

At the time creation, when Brahm, the personified form of the cosmic super Consciousness, decided to initiate the process of creation, it metamorphosed into three cosmic forms to carry out this gigantic task smoothly. It was the first instance of the principle of 'delegation of authority' when some Superior Authority decides to do something great and extraordinary, and in order to attain success in this enterprise this Authority divides the main task into its smaller components, assigning one component to one of the many junior authorities that are appointed by it to specifically carry out a specific job.

This mechanism helped Brahm to regulate the entire process and also maintain self-discipline because though the three forms into which Brahm transformed itself were in fact the same Brahm operating at different levels and carrying out different tasks. It helped Brahm to easily maintain control over the developments, as for all practical purposes these three forms were distinct from Brahm and independent Authorities in their own right, and so a close watch could be kept on their functioning. In case one of these forms failed to function properly then remedial methods could be initiated, leaving the others to carry out their duties in the normal way.

Since the three primary forms into which the supreme Brahm metamorphosed himself, albeit different and distinct from Brahm, were however the same Supreme Being operating through these forms, and so therefore it is said that these three forms or Authorities of creation were the 'fractional parts' of Brahm.

And who were these three Authorities? The stupendous task of 'creation of this world' had three basic steps—viz. first was creation, then came its sustenance and protection, and finally its conclusion. The form of Brahm responsible for the first step, i.e. 'creation', was called Brahma, the creator. The form of Brahm responsible for the second step, i.e. 'sustenance and protection of the creation', was called Vishnu, the sustainer and protector. And finally, the form of Brahm responsible for the third step, i.e. 'conclusion of creation', was called Shiva, the concluder. Thus came into being the 'Trinity of Gods'.

The Supreme Being now wished to devise a device by which this creation could be created from nothing, because in the beginning there was nothing but pure cosmic Consciousness. Brahm had to ‘imagine’ in his mind that there is something called ‘creation’, because actually there was nothing. Hence the Upanishads say that ‘this world is merely an image, that it is an imagination of the mind’.

To wit, the supreme Brahm employed his ‘Shakti’, or his dynamic power, to create an imaginary thing in order to give shape to this world. This Shakti was called ‘Maya’, meaning delusion, as it created an illusion of reality when there was none!

The supreme Brahm used this Maya for another reason too. He wished his creation to be self-sustaining and keep on rolling on its own account, without his day-to-day role. So he created ‘Maya’ and its associated components. What then do stand for? They represent worldly delusions, ignorance, temptations, infatuations, desires, greed, and all other such negativities that are associated with this gross mundane world. This ensured that the creatures that would be produced in the course of evolvement of creation would be able to keep themselves so engrossed in a make-belief world in which that they would procreate themselves in the erroneous belief that they are masters of their own destiny and are the ones who can create, sustain and destroy at their own free will—till of course the time comes when the Supreme Authority decides that his creation has become a monster, a Frankenstein, at which time he assumes the role of the ‘concluder’ to bring an end to the grand drama.

So the fourth component that was also a fraction of Brahm was ‘Maya Shakti’, the dynamic power to create delusions at the cosmic level, because without this Shakti nothing could be achieved.

With this primary background understanding we conclude that when Brahm, the Supreme Being, assured the gods, the sages and the earth that he would come to help them with his fractions to assist him, he meant that he himself would assume the form of Lord Ram, the one who would play the main role in the elimination of Ravana and the demons, and his other subtle forms such as Brahma, Vishnu and Shiva along with Maya too would come in different forms to assist him.

So therefore it was the Supreme Being known as Brahm who became Lord Ram. He had three brothers—Bharat, Laxman and Shatrughan. ‘Bharat’ was the one who took care of the welfare of the world, and therefore he stood for Lord Vishnu; ‘Laxman’ was the one who was an embodiment of all excellent virtues, and so he stood for Lord Shiva, and like Shiva, Laxman was also very dear to Lord Ram; and ‘Shatrughan’ was a destroyer of enemies symbolizing ignorance and delusions, and since knowledge helps to eliminate these negative factors, he stood for Brahma, the creator of the Vedas. {Refer: (a) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 193, and (ii) Doha no. 197 along with Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede it; and (b) Adhyatma Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 3, verse nos. 40-41.

Then there was Sita, the wife of Lord Ram. She was the other assistant of the Lord and who played a pivotal role in helping the Lord fulfill his divine mission. It was Sita’s abduction by Ravana which became the excuse for Lord Ram to eliminate Ravana. Who then was she? From the metaphysical perspective she represented Maya, the cosmic Shakti that enabled Brahm to carry out his wishes as outlined herein above.

The supreme Brahm succeeded in his mission of creation with the help of his Maya Shakti, and in a similar way his human incarnation Lord Ram succeeded in his mission of eliminating Ravana by employing the services of Sita—because Sita had played a dynamic and central role in the fulfillment of this mission, as it was Sita’s abduction by Ravana that set in motion a chain of events that ended with his slaying by Lord Ram.

There is another view about the form in which the Supreme Being revealed himself along with his fractional parts as indicated in this verse. According to Adhyatma Ramayan, Uttar Kand, Canto 9, verse nos. 55-58, (a) Lord Vishnu, the sustainer and protector of this creation, became Lord Ram; (b) the Seshnath, who is the celestial serpent on whose coiled body Vishnu reclines on the surface of the primordial ocean and who supports the earth on his thousand hoods, became Laxman; (c) Vishnu's weapon called Chakra, the serrated discus he hold, became Bharat; and (d) Vishnu's conch became Shatrughan. Meanwhile, 'earth' herself became Sita—refer: Adhyatma Ramayan, (a) Baal Kand, Canto 6, verse nos. 58-72; and (b) Uttar Kand, Canto 7, verse nos. 41-44.

<sup>3</sup>The Solar Race of Ayodhya is honoured as being very charitable and liberal because it had countless kings who became famous for their graciousness and merciful disposition as well as for liberal attitude towards charity, magnanimity and benevolence.

Lord Ram taking birth in the 'Sun' race is a metaphoric way of saying that the Lord's glories and virtues were as splendid and radiant as the sun itself. It also means that even as the sun removes all darkness by its mere presence, the advent of Lord Ram removed all darkness symbolized by the wicked, evil and sinful forces in this creation that the demons represented. Even as sunrise immediately dispels fear of ghosts and phantoms that lurk in the darkness of the night, the presence of Lord Ram in this world eliminated all the fear from the dark forces that create delusions, ignorance and all other such negative factors that cause immense horror, grief, misery and consternation in the mind and heart of creatures of this world.]

Sage Kashyap and his wife Aditi had done severe Tapa (penance and austerity) in some ancient time, and at that time I had already given them a word to become their son<sup>1</sup>. (3)

They (Kashyap and Aditi) have appeared as king Dasrath and his queen Kaushalya in the kingdom of 'Kaushal Puri' (Ayodhya). (4)

I shall go and take birth in their royal household in the form of his four sons who would be the glory of the race of king Raghu<sup>2</sup> (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It ought to be remembered here that the wheel of creation continues to rotate in a cyclic form and in a rhythmic manner. The measurement of time at the cosmic scale is mind-boggling. It would suffice for our purpose here to say that in every cycle of creation there is a manifestation of Lord Ram, and in each generation there is a unique reason for it. This fact is reiterated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 122.

In Ram Charit Manas, we read about two instances when the Supreme Being has blessed two pious couples that he would manifest himself as the couple's son in order to fulfil their wish. One is the promise made to Manu and Satrupa*, and the other to Kashyap and Aditi#. {Apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, *Doha no. 149 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that follow it; and #Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 123.}

From the wordings of the present verse it appears that the story of Lord Ram which we are about to read in the forthcoming verses pertains to the Kalpa when the Lord had blessed Kashyap and Aditi, but upon close analysis we are left in doubt, for a little later the poet Tulsidas (who had written this book Ram Charit Manas) says “now I shall pick up the story from the point I had ‘paused’ it earlier to describe some other related episodes”—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 188 herein below.

This ‘pause’ refers to the end of episode when Tulsidas had described how Manu and Satrupa were blessed by the Lord that he would become their son, and then began describing another story of king Pratapbhanu and how he became a demon named Ravana*, followed by how the Supreme Being promised the gods and mother earth that he would come down to earth as Lord Ram to eliminate the cruel demons as we are presently reading. {Apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 152—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 153.}

So if we take into consideration these above mentioned facts then it can also be said that the story which we are about to commence reading pertains to the Kalpa of Manu and Satrupa.

Scholars are of two views: one school of thought says that the story of Lord Ram as narrated in ‘Ram Charit Manas’ pertains to the Kalpa in which Manu and Satrupa were blessed by the Lord, while the other group says that it belongs to the Kalpa of Kashyap and Aditi. Hence, it cannot be said conclusively to which era the story actually belongs.

Nevertheless, just like so many rivers having different origins finally become one when they fall into the ocean and become one vast uniform body of water, one part of which is indistinguishable from the other, thereby making these diverse rivers lose their individual characters and identities, as well as from where they originated and through which land they travelled before falling into the ocean and merging with it and becoming one it, so likewise it matters little from where the divine story of Lord Ram as narrated in Ram Charit Manas had originated, or what were the different causes of its origin, for it is only of an academic value, but what really matters is its spiritual value and divine nature, the fact that it paves the way for a seeker to access the nectar of spiritual bliss and joy very easily, for this story is rich in its spiritual and metaphysical message of Bhakti (devotion and love for Lord God) and Gyan (gnosis; true wisdom and knowledge pertaining to the Supreme Being who represents cosmic Consciousness, a realisation that leads to deliverance, emancipation and salvation of the creature).

A concordant idea is found in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Sortha no. 90-b, where what sage Kaagbhusund tells Garud can be interpreted in the present context as meaning that a wise person with a steady mind is he who is focused on his target, and such an enlightened, erudite and sagacious person would not get unnecessarily involved or entangled in futile debates and harbour unwarranted doubts regarding Lord Ram as are normally caused by the many variations in the Lord's story and their sources of origin, for he would instead concentrate on having devotion and love for the Lord, and in worshipping the Lord who is an ocean of mercy, compassion and grace, because this latter approach would give him immense internal happiness and peace, as well as spiritual bliss, rather than creating more and more vexation in his mind and robbing him of whatever peace he has if he allows himself to get unnecessarily dragged into debates and discussions that are nothing but futile mental exercises of mere academic value, because they lead to no conclusion.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 121 which explicitly asserts that Lord Ram is a transcendental Being who cannot be a subject matter of debates and application of worldly logic that one applies to understand other things in this mortal creation, for the Lord is beyond comprehension and reach of the mind.

It is like the case of a thirsty person coming to a water body to quench his thirst. If he is wise then he would be more interested in quenching his thirst first and foremost rather than standing by the side of the water and contemplating on its history, the geography and geology of the place, the astrological chart, the time of the day, the position of the sun and the moon et al, to decide whether or not he should drink the nectar-like water that beckons him to come and remove his thirst first and protect his life instead of making a clown of himself by getting involved in such senseless contemplations while dying for want of water. A similar idea is expressed in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 43.

In the context of this divergent view on the actual period to which our story belongs, the esteemed reader is advised to also refer to a detailed note appended earlier to Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 152 to get a more comprehensive understanding of the point of view expressed herein above.

<sup>2</sup>Earlier it was said that the Lord took birth in the Solar Race, and now it is said that he took birth in the Raghu Race. The idea is that originally this race descended from the Sun God, and hence got its name. But in due course and with the passage of time a great king by the name of Raghu was born in it; this particular king was so great and glorious and his rule so magnificent that the world henceforth began to identify the Solar Race after the name of this king in order to honour his memory and name. So it came to be that the Solar Race became the Race of king Raghu, or the 'Raghu-Race'.

The four sons of king Dasrath were Lord Ram, and his three brothers Bharat, Laxman and Shatrughan.]

I shall also be able to prove true the words of sage Narad<sup>1</sup>. I shall manifest myself with my cosmic powers (so that I can successfully eliminate the powerful demons led by Ravana). (6)

Oh Gods, be reassured and feel freed from fear, for I shall surely eliminate (remove, take away—"hariha'um")<sup>2</sup> all that is burdensome for earth and free her from all such encumbrances that are bothering her. (7)'

[Note—<sup>1</sup>'Narad's words': Once sage Narad had cursed Lord Vishnu to become a human being. The Lord now wishes to fulfill that curse so that the sanctity of Narad's words is upheld. This story is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 124—to Doha no. 139.

When the gods thus heard Brahm's words of reassurance thus spoken from the sky (heaven), they were immensely relieved in their hearts, and being now confident of salvation and protection from their horrors, they immediately turned back. (8)

Then the creator Brahma addressed earth and explained to her the ramifications and implications of words of Brahm, advising her to feel fearless from now onwards. At this assurance from Brahma the earth felt free from the burden of fear and terror that had made her suffer her till now. (9)

Then Brahma went back to his abode after advising all the Gods that they should all assume the forms of monkeys and go down to live on earth so that they can serve the holy feet of Lord Hari (Vishnu) when he manifests himself there. (Doha no. 187)

[Note—This Doha clearly establishes that the 'monkeys' who formed the formidable army that helped Lord Ram in his campaign of Lanka in which the Lord eliminated Ravana and the rest of the cruel demons were none others than these Gods themselves.]

After being assured by Brahm that the Lord would come down personally to eliminate the cause of their sufferings, all the Gods went back to their respective abodes. Together with Mother Earth, all the Gods found peace in their hearts, and their minds became calm. (1)

The Gods were very happy to implement the advice given to them by Brahma, and they did not waste time in doing what they were told to do. [And what did Brahma advice them? In Doha no. 187 we read that Brahma had advised the Gods to assume the form of monkeys and go down to earth to help the Supreme Lord when he goes there in the form of a human being to eliminate the demons.] (2) giri kānana jaham' taham' bhari pūrī. rahē nija nija anīka raci rūrī. 5.

The Gods assumed the forms of countless 'forest dwellers' (monkeys, bears) and came to live on earth<sup>1</sup>. These creatures had stupendous strength and astounding valour. (3)

All of them were brave warriors. Their weapons consisted of mountains (huge rocks and boulders), trees, and their own nails (that were long and sharp).

After descending upon earth they waited patiently, keeping an eager watch on the path and bidding for the time when Lord Hari (Lord Vishnu in the form of Lord Ram) would come that way. (4)

All of them spread over the earth, living on mountains and in forests, wherever they liked, and in whatever way they fancied. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>There is a very remarkable point that is to be noted here in the context of the Gods being asked by Brahma, the creator, to assume the forms of monkeys and bears and come down to earth to help the Supreme Being when he manifests himself as Lord Ram. These are the same so-called all-powerful Gods who were unable to stand against the might of Ravana even when they had used their combined strength to face the demon king, yet when they became humble creatures such as monkeys and bears, and submitted themselves to the command of the Supreme Being in his form as Lord Ram, they could easily defeat the same demon king Ravana and vanquish his invincible army.

So therefore, what is that remarkable point that is to be noted here? It is this: As long as the Gods were proud of, and relied upon, their own strengths and abilities, they were chased away by Ravana like stray paper blown away in a fierce storm. But when the same Gods became humble and put themselves in the care of the almighty Lord God, Lord Ram who represented the Supreme Being, these Gods had a field day in defeating the same ferocious demons and their powerful king Ravana from whom they had fled in the heaven. What's more, in the fight in the heaven with Ravana the Gods had access to so many powerful weapons, but as monkeys and bears they had none, for they relied on their nails, teeth, rocks and boulders, and other such primitive means of warfare to win a powerful force represented by the demon army.

So the message is loud and clear: If we submit ourselves to the grace of the Lord God and become humble, if we shake off our arrogance, ego and haughtiness, if we realize that what we are able to achieve in this life is not of our own making but a divine grace of the Lord God upon us that has made it possible, if we thank the Lord for the smallest of things we are given by him, then it is certain we can do the unimaginable, we can reach lofty heights of success in our lives which would otherwise elude us.

It is very interesting to note here that the actual word used in the text is “banacara”. This word clearly means ‘those who move around in the forest’, ‘the forest dwellers’. It is not said at all that the gods became ‘monkeys or bears’. The word “banacara” could also mean forest dwelling tribes who were expected to be naturally fierce, ruthless and brave because of the harsh and tough environ of the wilds in which they lived all their lives.

But the convention is that the forest dwellers, the “banacaras”, who helped Lord Ram and formed his army were ‘monkeys and bears’, i.e. that they ‘were not humans’. Why is it so; what led our ancient chroniclers to decide that the gods had assumed the form of ‘monkeys and bears’?

Well, the simple and straightforward answer is this: Ravana had been granted a boon that he can be killed only by a human being and monkeys, and no one else would ever be able to cause his death. So it was determined that besides Lord Ram, who was in the physical form of a human being, all the others who played a pivotal role in causing Ravana's death must have been monkeys, and their close companions the bears, and no one else. Hence, it was concluded by ancient narrators that the word ‘banacara’ indeed referred to the forest dwelling creatures such as monkeys and bears alone, and not to any others.

But in reality these ‘banacaras’ were forest tribes. Their physical features, body-hair, countenance, manners, language, habits, dwelling places, custom and culture were so strikingly different from those who lived in the north of the Vindya mountains that when the latter came in contact with the former they called them monkeys and bears because of their unconventional life-style and visage. But I doubt very much that they were actually animals called monkeys and bears.]

Now, after this interlude, listen to the rest of the original story which I had paused for a while earlier<sup>2</sup>. (6)

In the capital city of the kingdom of Avadh, also known as Ayodhya<sup>3</sup>, there was a king named Dasrath<sup>4</sup>. He was like a jewel in the line of kings descending from the great ancient King named Raghu, and he was famous so much that his glory has been recounted by the Vedas too. (7)

He (Dasrath) was an ardent upholder of the laws of Dharma (righteousness, auspiciousness, probity, propriety, ethics, and goodness of thought and conduct), was a treasury of Guna (excellent virtues and character), was a Gyani (well versed in all sorts of knowledge), and had the glorious virtue of Bhakti (devotion and love for Lord God) firmly established in his heart, with a firm conviction that the Lord who holds the bow called ‘Saarang’ (i.e. Lord Vishnu)<sup>4</sup> is the Supreme Being (Brahm) himself personified in that form. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This refers to the episode of king Pratapbhanu and his becoming the demon king Ravana, and the subsequent developments which compelled the gods and mother earth to pray to the Supreme Being to protect them against his cruelty. These two episodes are the interlude between the end of the episode of Manu and Satrupa*, and the resumption of the main story of Lord Ram as is being done now. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 152—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 153.}

<sup>2</sup>In this context, the honourable reader of this wonderful Book ‘Ram Charit Manas’ is advised to refer to notes of this humble author that have been appended to the following set of verses of Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, earlier: (a) Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 152; and (b) Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 187.

<sup>3</sup>The grandeur, magnificence and the beauty of the city of Ayodhya has been described in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 27—to Doha no. 29.

<sup>4</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Doha no. 151 (as the Lord promised Manu and Satrupa); and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 187 (as the Lord told the gods and mother earth) as well as (iii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 123 (as said by Lord Shiva to Parvati earlier).

The word ‘Dasrath’ means one whose chariot (Ratha) could go in all the ten directions (Dasa = 10) of the known world. To wit, king Dasrath had access to all parts of the world, all the corners of earth, as well as to the heaven above and the nether world below. These “ten directions” are the following: north, north-east, east, south-east, south, south-west, west, north-west (i.e. all the directions of the earth), zenith (heaven) and nadir (nether world).

<sup>4</sup>Lord Vishnu's Bow is called 'Saarang', and the Lord is therefore called 'Saarang-Paani', one who holds a bow called Saarang in his hands.]

The King (Dasrath) had Kaushalya and others as his consort (queens); they were of a righteous character and immaculate in every way. These queens were faithful and loyal to their husband, and they had steady affection for the holy lotus-like feet of Lord Hari to whom they were submissive and devoted. (Doha no. 188)

[Note—King Dasrath had three chief queens, viz. Kaushalya, Sumitra and Kaikeyi. Of the three, Kaushalya was the chief queen. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 190.]

During the point of time this story is related to, it was not improper or odd for great kings to have more than one wife. Amongst the many reasons for the prevalence of this system in ancient times was that matrimonial relationships between two great kingdoms was usually done to establish diplomatic alliances and military pacts, that not only came in handy during frequent wars fought during those times for expansion of kingdoms and empires, but also enabled the king who would marry another king's daughter to expand his influence in a peaceful manner without bloodshed.

Sometimes the marriage was done as part of a military truce to end current wars, or even pre-empt an impending war.

Such matrimonial alliances had many other backgrounds also—such as the routine marriage of a king's daughter to another king, preferably to one who would be more powerful and influential than the bride's father, or marriages solemnized during 'Swayambars' which was an ancient system of marriage whereby the girl had the right to choose her groom, or her father set a condition for her marriage and whosoever fulfilled that condition would marry the princess (as it happened in the case of Lord Ram's marriage with Sita).

Meanwhile, it ought to be noted that (a) Kaushalya was the princess of the kingdom of south Kaushal whose king was called Bhaanumanta; (b) Sumitra was the princess of the kingdom of Magadha (in the present day state of Bihar in India) and the daughter of its king named Sursen; and (c) Kaikeyi was the daughter of king Ashwapati, who was a descendent of king Kaikaye after whom his kingdom was named as 'Kaikaye Desh'.]

Once upon a time, the king (Dasrath) felt very sad and regretted that he had no son (to become an heir of his kingdom after his death). (1)

So, he immediately went to the home of his royal Guru (i.e. sage Vasistha<sup>1</sup>, also pronounced as 'Vasistha'; he was the chief priest of the kingdom of Ayodhya), and after paying his obeisance at the Guru's holy feet, the king prayed most humbly and earnestly (as follows). (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Who was sage Vasistha? The answer is found in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 48—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 50.

In these verses, Vasistha has himself said that he is the son of the creator Brahma. When he was reluctant to become a priest of a kingdom, as he deemed this a lowly job for an exalted sage of his stature, his father Brahma told him that in spite of the truth that this job is not to his liking, yet there is a great reward attached to it, and it was that Vasistha would be able to have a close and personal interaction with the Supreme Being when he manifests as Lord Ram in the same kingdom. This motivated Vasistha to accept the job of a priest of the kingdom of Ayodhya. His wife was Arundhati.]

The king (Dasrath) confided in his Guru and shared with him everything that was in his mind, both regarding his joys as well as the reason for his sorrows.

[To wit, king Dasrath told Vasistha that by the latter's blessings he had no other problem or pain or grief in his life, except that he had no son would become his heir upon his death. This was a great vacuum in his otherwise prosperous, contented and happy life.]

After patiently listening to the king, sage Vasistha assured him in various ways (that there is a solution for every problem, and the king ought not to worry so much about the issue that is nagging at him). (3)

Sage Vasistha told king Dasrath: 'Oh King; have patience. You will be blessed with four noble sons. They will gain fame in all the three parts of the world (i.e. in the heaven, the earth and the nether world), and attain acclaim as they would be able to eliminate the fears of devotees<sup>1</sup>. Sage Vasistha sent for sage Sringi<sup>1</sup>, and when he arrived he was requested to perform a fire sacrifice with aim that the chief patron of the ritual (i.e. king Dasrath) would be blessed with sons. (5)

When the sage (i.e. Sringi) made offerings to the sacred fire with full devotion and faith, the Fire God revealed himself with a cup full of a sweet pudding or porridge<sup>2</sup> in his hands. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Sage Sringi was the son of sage Vibhaanda. Once upon a time, sage Vibhaanda was doing meditation in a pond, while an Apsara, a female courtesan of the court of Indra, the king of gods, named Urvashi passed that way. Seeing her beauty, the story goes, that sage Vibhaanda could not restrain himself and he ejaculated his sperms. A female deer was drinking water at that time, and it gulped down that sperm with the water. Sage Sringi was produced as a result, and hence he was named ‘Sringi’, meaning one born from a mother having horns. That is why his father, sage Vibhaanda, named his son ‘Sringi’, for he was born with small horn-like rudimentary protuberances on his head.

Once it so happened that in a kingdom known as Anga there was a severe drought. The wise sages of that period advised the king named Rompaad that if sage Sringi, who was a celibate since birth (i.e. a Brahmachari), was called to the kingdom, then his mere arrival there would be so auspicious that it might cause rainfall. On this advice, the king somehow managed to request sage Sringi to bless his kingdom. When the sage arrived, there was abundant rainfall, ending the prolonged drought. The king was so grateful and awed by the sage’s mystical powers that he married his daughter named Shaanta (pronounced ‘Shanntaa’) to him.

According to some versions of ancient mythology, Shaanta was a daughter of king Dasrath of Ayodhya, and the king had later on given her in adoption to king Rompaad.

In the story of the Ramayana, sage Sringi was called by king Dasrath to perform a fire sacrifice so that the king could be blessed with sons. It is on the successful performance of this sacrifice in which sage Sringi was the chief priest, the Fire God had revealed himself to give a cup of sweet pudding or porridge to Dasrath, asking the king to distribute it to his queens as he deemed fit. So Dasrath called his three chief queens, Kaushalya, Sumitra and Kaikeyi, who shared portions of this sanctified sweet dish. This resulted in the birth of Lord Ram and his three brothers, Laxman, Bharat and Shtrugan. Refer: (a) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 189—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 190; and (b) Adhyatma Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 3, verse nos. 1-12.

<sup>2</sup>The word used in the text is “carū”. It is an Indian dish prepared by boiling rice in sweetened milk.]

यह हबि बाँटि देहु नृप जाई । जथा जोग जेहि भाग बनाई ॥ ८ ॥

jō basiṣṭha kachu hr̥dayam̐ bicārā. sakala kāju bhā sid'dha tumhārā. 7.
yaha habi bām̐ṭi dēhu nr̥pa jā'ī. jathā jōga jēhi bhāga banā'ī. 8.

The Fire God said to king Dasrath: 'What sage Vasistha had thought of in his heart has been successful, and all your desires would be fulfilled<sup>1</sup>.' (7)

Oh King! Take this porridge and distribute it to your queens in the way you deem proper and fit.<sup>2</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>What did Vasistha think of in his heart to which the Fire God is now referring, and what was king Dasrath's wish that would be fulfilled now?

Well, king Dasrath had no sons, and it was a great void in his life which robbed him of his peace of mind and emotional comfort because he was worried that there would be no heir to his kingdom after his death. Further, he could not enjoy the pleasures and happiness that a father naturally gets when he has young sons or daughters playing around in his home. So, Dasrath had approached sage Vasistha with a prayer to find out a practical solution so that his desire to have sons as his heirs could be fulfilled. The sage thought over the matter and contemplated upon solutions that can be found to resolve this issue. After exploring various options he finally resolved that the best and the surest way of fulfilling Dasrath's desires was to invite sage Sringi and get a son-begetting fire sacrifice done with the invited sage as its chief priest. Now that plan had succeeded, because the Fire God has himself appeared with a magical potion, duly sanctified and potent enough to enable the queens to conceive. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 189.}

<sup>2</sup>It ought to be noted here that the Fire God has not specified how the porridge is to be shared between the queens; he left it on Dasrath to decide which queen gets what portion of the porridge. So, how did the king distribute this blessed and sanctified dish that would fulfill his desire to have sons? The answer is found in the verses that follow immediately herein below.]

परमानंद मगन नृप हरष न हृदयँ समाइ ॥ १८९ ॥

dōhā.

taba adr̥śya bha'ē pāvaka sakala sabhahi samujhā'i.
paramānanda magana nr̥pa haraṣa na hr̥dayam̐ samā'i. 189.

Then the Fire God vanished from sight after explaining everything to the assembly<sup>1</sup>.

Meanwhile, the king was overjoyed and felt ecstatic so much that his happiness overflowed his heart as he could not restrain himself from exhibiting profound sense of joy and unbound exhilaration. (Doha no. 189)

[Note—The earlier conversation between Dasrath and Vasistha was held in private. No one else knew why this grand fire sacrifice was being organized. Soon the queens would conceive, and in due time they will have sons. The whole kingdom would be highly astonished at this development, as everyone knew that the king had remained child-less for all his life, and a sudden conception by the queens could be the cause of a mighty scandal and nasty gossip amongst the citizens. So to prevent any adverse situation from developing and casting a taint on the noble king's reputation, the Fire God deemed it necessary and fit to declare everything in full public view as to how the queens would conceive and how the king would get sons.

Another reason was to advice the priests who were performing the rituals as to how to conclude it in the proper way so that no harm befalls upon the unsuspecting king, because it is well known that while fire sacrifices had the power to grant great boons and fulfill the desire of the patron, they could also prove disastrous if done in the wrong way. It is like the case of modern medicine; the same drug would cure a disease in a person if given correctly according to the disease for which it is meant, but given to a patient with a different disease the same medicine would kill him.]

Then the king (Dasrath) called his queens who were dear to him<sup>1</sup>, and so Kaushalya and others came to meet him. (1)

The king gave a half-portion of the porridge to her, and divided the remaining half into two parts. (2)

Out of these two parts of the second half, the king gave one to Kaikeyi<sup>2</sup>. Then he split the last part (which was the fourth quarter of the whole porridge) again into two parts. (3)

Then the king put each of these two final portions in the hands of Kaushalya and Kaikeyi respectively, and asked them individually to give these parts to Sumitra to please the king<sup>3</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It ought to be remarked here that Dasrath had many wives. Amongst them, there were three who were the king's favourite queens: Kaushalya, who was the eldest and the chief queen, Sumitra, the second queen, and Kaikeyi who was the youngest but the most preferred one. The reader is requested to refer to a note appended earlier which explains why kings of that era used to have more than one queens. Refer to Doha no. 188 herein above and the note appended to it.

<sup>2</sup>Dasrath was passionately in love with Kaikeyi*; this weakness in his character would be exploited by her later on in the story to prevail upon him to promise to make her son Bharat the next king of Ayodhya, and send the eldest son, Lord Ram, who had the right to the crown and could pose a hindrance in her son's ascension, to the forest#. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, *Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 25—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 28 (that show how smitten the king was by Kaikeyi's charms); #Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 29 (where we read how she asked the unsuspecting king to appoint her son Bharat to the throne and send Lord Ram to the forest.)}

<sup>3</sup>Let us see how the porridge was divided. First it was divided into two parts, and one half was given by the king to Kaushalya. Then he divided the second half into two equal parts. Out of these two, he gave one, which meant a quarter of the whole potion, to Kaikeyi. The last quarter was divided again into two equal parts. These two smaller parts, which together formed the last quarter of the porridge, were first given to Kaushalya and Kaikeyi, each holding one part of these two final parts, and then the king asked them to give these last portions to Sumitra in order to please her as well as him.

This in effect means that Kaushalya got the largest portion of the holy porridge, i.e. the first half of it, while Kaikeyi and Sumitra received a quarter of the porridge each, with the difference that while Kaikeyi got it directly from the king in one portion, Sumitra received it through her sister-queens in two portions, each being a half of a quarter of the whole porridge.

What would be the result of this way of distribution of this sanctified porridge? Kaushalya had one son, Lord Ram, the eldest of the brothers. Kaikeyi too had one son, Bharat, who was younger to Lord Ram. And Sumitra had two sons, Laxman and Shatrughan—because she had two parts given to her separately, one by Kaushalya and the other by Kaikeyi.

The same sequence of distribution of the porridge and conception of the queens has also been described in (i) Skanda Puran, Nagar Khand, Canto 98, verse nos. 19-22; and (ii) Padma Puran, Uttar Khand, Canto 242, verse nos. 59-61.

In sage Veda Vyas' Adhyatma Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 3, verse nos. 10-12, a different version is given regarding the distribution of this holy porridge. It was divided into two equal halves by Dasrath, and he gave one each to Kaushalya and Kaikeyi. At that time Sumitra also came in, so to please her, the two queens, i.e. Kaushalya and Kaikeyi, divided their own shares into two equal halves, and then both of them gave one such part to Sumitra. So therefore, Kaushalya and Kaikeyi ate a quarter part of the whole porridge each, and Sumitra had the privilege of eating two such quarters given to her by her two sister-queens, i.e. Sumitra actually had half of the entire porridge, albeit in two quarter portions.]

ēhi bidhi garbhasahita saba nārī. bha'īm hṛdayam' haraṣita sukha bhārī. 5.
jā dina tēm hari garbhahim ā'ē. sakala lōka sukha sampati chā'ē. 6.

In this way, the three queens became pregnant. This made everyone joyful in their hearts, and all felt very happy by this development. (5)

From the very first day Lord Hari<sup>1</sup> entered the womb of the mother<sup>2</sup>, joy, happiness and prosperity spread in all parts of the world<sup>3</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The use of the word “Hari” for the Divine Being, the Supreme Lord, who came down to earth as Lord Ram, is very clever and significant here. The word ‘Hari’ has many connotations: it means someone who takes away, removes, steals, eliminates and dispels, and all these apply to the Lord. He takes away sorrows of his devotees and removes the cause of their miseries and grief, replacing them with joy, happiness and well-being. He steals the different negativities that the devotee might have unintentionally or inadvertently accumulating over the years, and replaces it with positive virtues. He dispels fears and instills fearlessness; He eliminates sorrows and pains, replacing them with cheer and joy.

It is remarkable that the word ‘Hari’ has been used by the Supreme Being with an eye on all the above meanings when he assured the gods and mother earth that he would come down to earth to take care of all their problems arising out of the tyranny unleashed by the demons—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 187. The Lord has said—‘hariha'um’ (hari + ha'um) i.e. ‘I will (ha'um) remove, take away and eliminate (hari) all the burden of earth, so oh gods, become fearless’.

<sup>2</sup>Remember: The conception of the queens was an unusual affair; they had not conceived by any physical intercourse like done by other human beings, but by eating a sanctified porridge given to them by none else but the Fire God himself. The ‘fire’ is one element famed for its purification powers; the fire can burn impurities and leave untouched the pure thing. This is how gold is said to be purified by putting it into the fire. So therefore, this conception was an immaculate form of conception: achieved not through physical intercourse, but by divine intervention.

Soon we would read what is meant here by saying “Hari entering the womb of the mother”. The correct interpretation of this verse would be as follows: “Lord Hari revealed himself in a spontaneous manner, but in order to conform to the rule of Mother Nature with respect to how creatures who have a body are born on this earth, as well as to honour the promise the Lord had made earlier to the pious couple that he would become their son, the Lord immediately transformed himself to assume the form of a human child, and made it appear that he was born in the same way as it normally happens when a mother gives birth to her son.”

<sup>3</sup>The arrival of the Lord was marked by all-round cheer and joy in the world. There were auspicious signs and good omens everywhere. It is just like the case of the sun rising on the eastern horizon: even before the sun is actually visible in the sky, its arrival is marked by the fading of the darkness of the night and the sky getting gradually illuminated much before the sun makes its physical appearance.] bhaya'ū. 8.

All the queens looked glorious in the royal palace, and they were exceptionally happy, full of enthusiasm, energy and radiance. (7)

In this way, some time passed with joy and happiness abounding everywhere, till the time came when the Lord had to finally reveal himself<sup>1</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>How much time passed between the fire sacrifice and the queens eating the porridge, and the actual birth of the four brothers?

According to Adhyatma Ramayan, it was nine months*, and according to Valmiki's Ramayan, it was twelve months#. {Refer: *Adhyatma Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 3, verse no. 13; and #Valmiki Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 18, verse no. 8.}]

दो०. जोग लगन ग्रह बार तिथि सकल भए अनुकूल ।

चर अरु अचर हर्षजुत राम जनम सुखमूल ॥ १९० ॥

dōhā.

jōga lagana graha bāra tithi sakala bha'e anukūla.
cara aru acara harṣajuta rāma janama sukhamūla. 190.

During those moments of that day of the week of that month when the Supreme Being had manifested himself, the position of the sun and the moon, as well as the stars and the planets and other zodiacal signs of the astrological chart were all aligned in such a way that every circumstance had become favourable and auspicious for this divine revelation.

The entire world, consisting of animate beings (creatures) as well as inanimate things (such as plants), was exhilarated because the advent of the Supreme Being on this earth in the form of the birth of Lord Ram was an occasion to celebrate as it was the root of all auspiciousness and joy for this world and its inhabitants<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 190)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Just as a great tree grows up from its root and reaches high up towards the sky while spreading its branches, with their rich foliage, in all the directions to provide shelter, shade, fruits, flowers and wood to the world, so would the birth of Lord Ram provide the fruits of happiness, joy, fearlessness and spiritual bliss in abundance to the world; the Lord would remove the burden of the earth that the demons had become for it, and the divine story of the Lord during his sojourn on earth would be remembered, recounted and retold over generations and generations to come, granting everyone a divine experience of bliss and ecstasy, showing them the path of devotion and love for the Lord God, as well as paving the way for their deliverance, emancipation and salvation from this mortal world of transmigration.

It ought to be noted here that once the Fire God had declared that four noble princes would be born in the royal household of king Dasrath, grand preparations for the great occasion must naturally have commenced forthwith on a large scale—because the word of the Fire God could not go in vain. An heir to the throne was coming after what seemed to be an eternal wait bordering on hopelessness and helplessness. The time when the Fire God had made this prophesy, and the actual birth of the four princes was the natural time a human child takes to come into this world, a time of roughly nine months, take or give a few days either way, which was surely enough to make grand preparations and be ready for the Great Moment. There was expectation in the air; every citizen as well as members of the royal household were anxious and eager to hear the good news, when finally that ‘Great Moment’ arrived.

That auspicious moment is being described in the following verses now.]

चौ०. नौमी तिथि मधु मास पुनीता । सुकल पच्छ अभिजित हरिप्रीता ॥ १ ॥

मध्यदिवस अति सीत न घामा । पावन काल लोक बिश्रामा ॥ २ ॥

naumī tithi madhu māsa punītā. sukala paccha abhijita hariprītā. 1.
madhyadivasa ati sīta na ghāmā. pāvana kāla lōka biśrāmā. 2.

*It was the ninth day of the bright half of the lunar month during the sacred month of Chaitra (according to the Hindu calendar)<sup>1</sup>. The moon had entered the asterism called Abhijit<sup>2</sup>, a constellation which is very dear to Lord Hari (i.e. Lord Vishnu)<sup>3</sup>. (1)

It was mid-day and the sun was at its meridian<sup>4</sup>; and the weather was very pleasant and relaxing, for it was neither too cold nor too hot<sup>5</sup>. The time and the season were such that it gave pleasure and comfort to everyone (obviously because it was neither hot nor cold).

[To wit, it was a balmy and pleasant day, with bright sunshine, a cool breeze that was fragrant and caressed the skin, and an atmosphere electrified by eager expectation and ardent hope that usually precedes the occurrence of a great historic event that is of profound importance for an entire civilization, as that would be an epoch making occurrence which would be the turning point for good for an entire era.] (2)

[Note—*One relevant thing to note here is that the significance of the moment when Lord Ram was born, and what his birth chart predicted about him has been elaborately explained by sage Bhrigu in his Sanghita, during the course of a conversation between sage Bhrigu and sage Shukra, as narrated in Bhrigu Sanghita, Vedasaagar-Stava, Canto 36, verse nos. 1-30.

Refer to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 34 which is very specific in this context.

<sup>2</sup>The word “Abhijit” means victory; to be invincible. It is believed that if a son is born during the presence of this constellation, then the child would become an invincible king in his realm. Any enterprise he enters into would be successful. This constellation occurs right at mid-day, and consists of three stars forming a triangle.

<sup>3</sup>Since Lord Vishnu is responsible for protection and taking care of this creation, this Abhijit asterism is favoured by him as it would help him fulfill his divine mandate without much of a problem.

<sup>4</sup>The significance of the sun being at its meridian and the time of the day being noon is that this is the brightest time of the day, and it symbolizes that the glory of Lord Ram would shine brightly and brilliantly in this world, and his presence would remove the darkness associated with gloom, pain, grief and all other sorts of misery of life in this mortal world.

<sup>5</sup>Further, the presence of Lord Ram will have a soothing effect on the world and its inhabitants. This aspect is repeatedly verified in the story of the Ramayan because we shall read by-and-by that wherever the Lord went during his journey in the forest, which we can take as a sample, he spread cheer and joy all around. It were not only persons whom the Lord met who had felt blessed by his presence, even the trees, the mountains, the rivers and the earth over which he walked had felt thoroughly blessed. {Apropos: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Ayodhya Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 109; (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 113—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precede Doha no. 114; (iii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 122; (iv) Doha no. 123 along with Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes it; (v) Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 134; (vi) Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 136; (vii) Doha no. 137 along with Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede it; (b) Kishkindha Kand, (viii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 13—to Doha no. 17.}

Great sages such as Bharadwaj*1, Valmiki*2, Atri*3, Sutikshan*4, Agastya*5—all had felt extremely blessed by meeting Lord Ram. {Refer: (a) Ayodhya Kand, *1=Doha no. 107 along with Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede it (Bharadwaj); *2= Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 125 (Valmiki); (b) Aranya Kand, *3= Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede Doha no. 3 (Atri); *4= Chaupai line nos. 1-16 that precede Doha no. 10 (Sutikshan); *5= Chaupai line no. 9 that precedes Doha no. 12 (Agastya).

There were many other un-named sages, hermits and ascetics, as well as the different forms that Mother Nature had taken, such as rivers, mountains, animals, trees etc.—all had felt blessed by the presence of Lord Ram in their midst as is clearly indicated in Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 14.]

There was a breeze blowing that was cool, soft and fragrant. The Gods were exhilarated, and the hearts of pious souls were brimming over with joy and enthusiasm<sup>1</sup>. (3)

The forests and gardens were lush with greenery, and mountains had abundance of gems embedded in them. The rivers and streams flowed with nectarine water in them<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The gods were happy as now the time had come when their prayers would be answered, and the pious sages, saints and others were happy because now they will get an opportunity to have a direct communication and communion with the supreme Lord.

Though these above verses describe the heavenly atmosphere of the forest around Chitrakoot where Lord Ram had abided for a while during his stay in the forest, yet it gives a general idea of the sort of auspiciousness and pleasant environment that prevailed all over the earth at the time of Lord Ram's presence in the mortal world.

Another such instance of the beauty and richness of Nature is found at the time when the Lord stried on Mt. Prabarshan near Kiskindha—refer to: Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, Doha no. 12—to Doha no. 17.]

gagana bimala saṅkula sura jūthā. gāvahiṁ guna gandharba barūthā. 6.

When Biranchi (i.e. the creator Brahma) realized that the time for the birth of the Lord was at hand, he and other Gods assembled, and they boarded their respective aerial vehicles, that were especially decorated for the occasion, as they proceeded to the venue of the Lord's birth in Ayodhya (to witness the auspicious occasion, and participate in the celebrations). (5)

The whole space of the otherwise clear sky was filled chock-a-block by vehicles of gods, even as groups of celestial damsels called Apsaras added glamour to the procession by dancing and singing along the way as they too accompanied the gods to participate in the celebrations marking the birth of the Lord. (6)

बरषहिं सुमन सुअंजुलि साजी । गहगहि गगन दुंदुभी बाजी ॥ ७ ॥

They (the gods and the celestial damsels) held flowers in their cupped palms and showered them from the sky on the earth below. The sound of kettle-drums and other musical instruments, that were played enthusiastically, reverberated in the sky. (7)

Other divine beings, such as the Nagas (celestial serpents), sages and mystics (who had the mystical power that enabled their consciousness to leave their physical body and assume a spirit form to roam freely in the sky), and the gods themselves were offering various kinds of prayers and doing whatever services they thought fit for the auspicious occasion<sup>1</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, there was immense enthusiasm and abounding zest in the rank and file of the Gods, Nagas, Munis (sages and mystics) and Apsaras as they jostled and merrily crowded around each other to bless the happy occasion and thank their own good fortunes, while holding animated discussions on the various ways they would serve the Lord when their services would be needed. Some said they would sing hymns, others said they would participate in celebratory songs, some said they would arrange for fireworks on display, some said they would carry baskets full of flowers and sweets and other gifts, others promised that they would use their skills in decorating the city in myriad hues of colours, with flowers, buntings, hangings, arches, gateways etc., some had clothes as gifts for the four princes, some had toys for them, some had little ornaments befitting little children, and so on and so forth—with cheer and warmth bubbling all over as the grand procession of the Gods' chariots and dancing-and-singing Apsaras moved ahead majestically in the sky in the direction of Ayodhya, the venue of the birth of Lord Ram.

जगनिवास प्रभु प्रगटे अखिल लोक बिश्राम ॥ १९१ ॥

dōhā.

sura samūha binatī kari pahumcē nija nija dhāma.
jaganivāsa prabhu pragaṭē akhila lōka biśrāma. 191.

These groups of gods offered their prayers to the Supreme Being and then went back to their respective abodes in the heaven<sup>1</sup>.

Then, the Lord who is the cause of this whole creation, who lives everywhere in this creation as he is all-pervading and immanent, and in whom this creation finds its ultimate rest (jaganivāsa; akhila lōka biśrāma)<sup>2</sup>, finally manifested himself. (Doha no. 191)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The Supreme Being had not manifested himself till this point of time; he was still in his primary form as the cosmic Being who has no physical form, who was invisible, all-pervading and immanent in this creation, in his primary form as cosmic Consciousness.

The creator Brahma knew the secrets, so he advised the gods to come along quickly to pay their obeisance to the Lord first before preparing for the next things to be done, as there was no time to lose.

What were these ‘next set of things’ that the gods would prepare to do after first paying their obeisance to the Lord? Well, to begin with, they would assume human forms and participate in the grand celebrations that would take place in Ayodhya to mark the birth of Lord Ram and his three brothers—this would be evident soon in (i) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 194; and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 2-6 that precede Doha no. 196 herein below. This fact has been reiterated earlier too in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 34 which are very specific in this context.

Then, the gods would assume the forms of monkeys and bears to stay for a while in the forest, waiting for the arrival of Lord Ram whom they would help to fight Ravana and eliminate the cruelty of the demon race. This is exactly what Brahma had advised them to do earlier—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 187.

Since Brahma had made the announcement of the time of the Supreme Being’s revelation as Lord Ram so suddenly that the gods had no time to make elaborate preparations, and they had to go in haste, scrambling as fast as they could. So therefore, they came back to their abodes after this initial offering of prayers etc., made proper arrangements, and proceeded once again to Ayodhya to participate in the Lord’s birth celebrations, and then later on to join the Lord as monkeys and bears to help him in his mission of eliminating the demons, as the next phase of their plan.

To wit, the sequence of events is an easy flow of events—viz. first the gods came to thank the Supreme Being for finally taking the trouble to come down to earth as Lord Ram to fulfill the promise he made to the gods and mother earth; then they go back home to prepare to attend the Lord’s birth celebrations when they would come to Ayodhya and participate in it; and finally they would take a long leave from their respective abodes in the heaven to become monkeys and bears as ordered by Brahma, in order to serve Lord Ram while the Lord goes on the mission of eliminating the demons.

The kind and merciful Lord (Vishnu), who is gracious and compassionate towards the lowly and the humble as well as the benefactor of mother Kaushalya, revealed himself before her (in the form of a child who will be later on named Lord Ram). (1)

The mother was exceedingly thrilled and overwhelmed as she observed the Lord's marvelous and most astounding form that was so extremely beautiful as to be able to steal the mind and heart of even the sages and hermits (who are usually immune to physical charms and attractions). (2)

His delightful form was dark as the (rain-bearing) clouds, and it provided joy, happiness and comfort to the eyes of the beholder. He held in his four hands his characteristic emblems (or equipments—"āyudha"). [These are—a conch-shell, a discus, a mace and a lotus.]<sup>1</sup> (3)

He was wearing fine ornaments and excellent garments, and was adorned with a garland of sylvan flowers (called the "banamālā"). His eyes were large (like the lotus flower). To wit, this was how the Lord, who is an ocean of beauty and charm, and is a destroyer or slayer of the demon named Khar, revealed himself (before mother Kaushalya). (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>There are three instances in the story of Ram Charit Manas where we get a direct hint that Lord Ram was a manifestation of Lord Vishnu who is distinguished by having four arms. The first is the one we are currently reading, where the Lord appeared before mother Kaushalya in his form with four arms, a divine form that is unique to Lord Vishnu.

The second instance is that of sage Sarbhanga to whom also Lord Ram showed his divine form as Lord Vishnu who has four arms—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 18 that precedes Doha no. 10.

And the third instance is when sage Narad approaches Lord Ram and asks the latter why he had not allowed the sage to marry the girl of his choice. This incident is directly related to Lord Vishnu who had prevented Narad from marrying, which had angered the sage so much that he had cursed the Lord that he would have to become a human being. We have already read all about it earlier, in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 125—to Doha no. 139.

Hence, Narad asking Lord Ram this question directly, using the pronouns 'you' and 'me' when he asked Lord Ram "why did you not allow me to marry", and the Lord replying by using the pronouns 'I' and 'you' when he said "I did not allow you to marry because ---", clearly implies that both Lord Ram and Lord Vishnu are the same Lord in two forms. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 43—to Doha no. 44.]

The mother joined her two palms (hands—"du'i kara jōrī") together and said, 'Oh Lord Anant (i.e. the Lord who has no end; who is without a beginning or end; who is infinite and eternal)! Say, how and with what words can I say a prayer to you to praise you, or show my earnest respect to you (for I am absolutely incompetent to do so, and am stunned by your august presence). (5)

Verily, the Vedas and the Purans (primary and ancient scriptures) hold and declare unequivocally that you are beyond the reach of Maya (delusions), free from the various the Gunas (attributes of creation) and transcend Gyan (knowledge), as well as are measureless and beyond comprehension. (6)

You are lauded by the exalted saints and sages as well as the scriptures as being an ocean of mercy, compassion and kindness, and as being a repository of bliss, happiness and joy, as well as of all the excellent virtues. (7)

Oh! The same Lord known as 'Srikanta' (i.e. Lord Vishnu who is dear to goddess Laxmi, also known as "Sri" because she is the patron goddess of prosperity, wealth and well-being), who loves his devotees and is gracious towards them, has revealed himself for my sake and good. (8)

The Vedas assert that in each of the pores of your divine cosmic body, there are multitudes of universes (brahmāṇḍa) that have been brought forth by the creative power of Maya<sup>1</sup>. (9)

That such a Great Lord of the Cosmos would stay in my womb—this is so wonderful a thing and amusing that when learned and wise sages and seers hear of it, they are absolutely confounded and awe-struck; their mind and intellect fail to comprehend this phenomenon.' (10)

When the mother came to grasp with the profundity of the occasion and its stupendous significance, when she realised the import of what she was observing before her own eyes, the Lord smiled, for he wished to do many fantastic things and perform many mysterious deeds<sup>2</sup>. (11)

[The Lord wished to do some worldly sports or deeds, and so—] He explained the situation to her (as to why he had revealed himself) by telling her the pleasant story (or event) of her previous life when she had desired to experience the joy and exhilaration of uninhibited closeness with the Lord as a mother has with her own child, and so be able to offer her love and affection to the Lord with the freedom she would have then.<sup>3</sup> (12)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This is the Lord's "Viraat Purush" form, the cosmic form of the Supreme Being. In this context, refer to: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, (i) Chanda line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 51 (Shiva tells Parvati); (ii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 116 (Shiva tells Parvati); (iii) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 141; (iv) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 150 (Satrupa reiterates this fact); (b) Lanka Kand, (v) Doha no. 14—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 15 (Mandodari, wife of Ravana); (vi) Chanda line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 111 (Brahma, the creator); (c) Uttar Kand, (vii) Chanda line nos. 5-6, and 21 that precede Doha no. 13 (Vedas); (viii) Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede Doha no. 72 (Kaagbhusund tells Garud).

The power of Maya that has been the cause of this creation is described in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 44; (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 72.

<sup>2</sup>To wit, the Lord was amused by the mother's submissions now when she talked as if she was a highly erudite woman who knew the reality and truth of the Lord like the back of her hands, for soon she would forget all this momentary talk of wisdom and enlightenment and start treating him as 'her' son'. This would be evident later on in an incident when the mother had placed her child in a cradle to sleep and went to her worship-room to offer worship to the family deity. There she found the same child partaking of the offerings meant for the deity. Astonished and confounded, she rushed back to the cradle, only to find the child comfortably sleeping in it. She rushed back to the worship-room and found the child enjoying himself there with the sweets. The mother ran back and forth as she was completely dazed by this magical sight of seeing the child simultaneously at two places! She feared for some spell being cast either on her self or on the child. It was then Lord Ram once again revealed his cosmic form as the four-armed Lord Vishnu to dispel all her doubts and misgivings. This story is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 201—to Doha no. 202.

Hence presently, this is the reason why the Lord wryly smiled at her now with great humour. He hinted to her that it is good that she has, at least for once, realised who her child is, for soon she would be so overcome by the Lord's delusion-creating powers that she would forget who the child she called as her son actually was.

Briefly, the story is that king Manu and his queen Satrupa did severe Tapa or penance with a desire to have a divine glimpse of Lord Vishnu, the Supreme Being. When the Lord manifested himself before them, the couple sought the boon that the Lord would become their child so they would love him and shower their affection upon him in an uninhibited form, as well as enjoy the bliss and happiness of being so close to the Lord if he would graciously agree to become their child. Of course the Lord obliged, and he wanted to inform Kaushalya that it is one of the many reasons why he has now revealed himself before her—for she was Satrupa in her previous life.]

माता पुनि बोली सो मति डोली तजहु तात यह रूपा । १३ ।
 कीजै सिसुलीला अति प्रियसीला यह सुख परम अनूपा ॥ १४ ॥

 yaha carita jē gāvahiṁ haripada pāvahiṁ tē na parahiṁ bhavakūpā. 16.

The mother changed her mind as she was so dazed and overwhelmed by the Lord's cosmic and almighty form that she could not afford any longer to experience its presence and closeness, though, nonetheless, she felt exceptionally blessed and privileged and wished to enjoy the bliss and beatitude that comes with closeness with the Lord. So, she requested the Lord as follows: 'Oh my dear Lord! Please be kind to discard this superhuman and cosmic form (as it has overwhelmed me, and I am utterly confounded and dazed by it). (13)

Instead, please assume a more acceptable and pleasing form of a lovable child, and do act like one. Your deeds and acts in this pleasant form of a child would be very endearing, nice and pleasing for me.' (14)

Upon hearing her request, the Lord who is the 'God Superior amongst all the Gods', or who is the 'King of all the Gods' (surabhūpā), immediately assumed the pleasant form of a little child, and began to cry aloud in the likeness of a newly born infant. (15)

[Tulsidas says that—] Anyone who sings (with devotion) this glorious event (when the 'Lord of the universe' transformed himself into a 'human child') is sure to attain the exalted abode of the Lord and never again, as a consequence, fall in the dark well of transmigration symbolised by this mortal world. (16)

Verily indeed, in all sooth and without gainsay, the Supreme Lord manifested himself as a human for the good and welfare of the Vipras (literally the ‘Brahmins’, but implying all noble and learned people), the cows (representing all humble and docile creatures), the Gods (representing all exalted souls), and the saints and sages and other humble and pious people<sup>1</sup>.

The Lord who is beyond the purview of Maya (delusions) and the different Gunas, which are characteristic features that are naturally associated with Maya, revealed himself out of his own free will.

He assumed a physical form that appeared to be gross like ordinary humans—but was actually subtle in essence and divine in its reality, for it was a form that transcended Maya with its associated Gunas<sup>2</sup>. (Doha no.192)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 72-a where the saintly crow Kaagbhusund tells the same thing to Garud.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 121; (ii) Doha no. 198.

<sup>2</sup>What are the associated Gunas of Maya. They have been described in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 70—to Doha no. 70. Sage Kaagbhusund tells Garud that this Maya is so powerful and fearless that even Lord Shiva and Brahma are in affright of it, so what to talk of ordinary creatures. But this all-powerful Maya is but a humble maid of Lord Ram, and she cannot disobey the Lord’s command. Further, she is scared of ‘Bhakti’, or the virtue of devotion and love for the Lord, and does not disturb anyone who has Bhakti on his side, because Bhakti is very dear to Lord Ram—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 78—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 79; (ii) Doha no. 85—to Sortha no. 87; and (iii) Chaupai line nos. 3-8 that precede Doha no. 116.]

Hearing the cry of the new-born babies, a sound that appeared very dear to all who heard it, the queens of the royal household dashed excitedly to the rooms from where the sound came<sup>1</sup>. (1)

The maid servants of the palace ran hither and thither in excitement, and as the news spread, all the citizens of Ayodhya were overwhelmed with surging joy and a feeling of ecstasy<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>As has been said previously, king Dasrath had three chief wives, queens Kaushalya, Sumitra and Kaikeyi, while others were juniors, and though they were members of the royal household, yet had no special role as royal consorts in any official ceremony.

<sup>2</sup>Again, as has been observed earlier, ever since the time the Fire God had prophesized that four noble princes would be born in the royal household of king Dasrath, cheer had prevailed over the entire city of Ayodhya as well as the rest of the kingdom. Up until now there was no heir to the throne of Ayodhya, and the subjects were worried about their fate in the eventuality of Dasrath's death. So, the birth of not one but four sons was a mighty good and welcome news for the whole populace. Everyone waited with expectation in their hearts, and the atmosphere was full of suspense and eagerness. The news of the birth of the four princes was imminent, but till it actually happened, the suspense remained.

So, as soon as the sound of the newly born babies was heard, the news spread like wildfire, both within the wall of the palace and without it too, and therefore, sooner than would have been expected under normal circumstances, the whole city of Ayodhya was aware of this good news. And as we shall soon read in the verses that follow herein below, it erupted wildly in a burst of spontaneous joy.]

parama prēma mana pulaka sarīrā. cāhata uṭhana karata mati dhīrā. 4.

When king Dasrath heard of the birth of sons, this good news was received by him with exceptional joy and made him ecstatic so much that he was in a state of total bliss like the one obtained by a person when he reaches the higher state of existence of consciousness that transcends this gross material world. This blissful state is called 'Brahmanand'—the joy of Brahm-realisation. (3)

The excess of joy and ecstasy made his body thrilled, and he was so overwhelmed with happiness that he found it difficult to restrain his joy, and sufficiently control his mind and compose himself so that he can get up and go to see the newly born princes<sup>1</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, the excellent news virtually numbed his senses. For a few moments Dasrath could not move, as he felt literally transfixed and paralysed with joy so much so that his legs gave way. When he attempted to stand, he floundered and sat down. It took sometime for him to gather his wits together and compose himself sufficiently enough to be able to do the next thing that needed to be done.

In this context, we find a concordant verse in Adhyatma Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 3, verse no. 36.

He thought to himself: 'The Lord whose holy name is so divine and sacred that if one as much as simply hears it then all auspiciousness come to him, it is so great an honour for me, and a rarest of rare privilege indeed, that the same Lord has come himself to (visit) my household (to become my son)!' (5)

The King's Mana (mind and heart) were overwhelmed with supreme joy and bliss.

He summoned his attendants and ordered them to play musical instruments to mark the auspicious occasion. (6)

Then, accompanied by his guru sage Vasistha and other learned Brahmins, the king went to see the newly born princes who were personified forms of beauty and charm, and had so many virtues that they cannot be listed<sup>1</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The king called sage Vasistha to thank him and show due reverence to him because it was the sage's advice that had borne fruit now in the form of the birth of these four sons. Further, the presence of the sage and other Brahmins was necessary in order to perform the various rites that are done at the time a son is born in the household.]

Then, the king cheerfully made a lot of charity by way of donating gold, cows, clothes, and precious gems to Brahmins (and other alms seekers). (Doha no. 193)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The “nandīmukha sarādhā” is a ritual when food offering is made to the sacred Bull, called Nandi, as well as to the Spirits of ancestors as part of a ritual to worship them to invoke their blessings at the time of child birth in a family.]

Groups of females in the city, who were attired in their natural finery, streamed enthusiastically towards the royal palace. (3)

They held in their hands golden pots and plates containing auspicious paraphernalia that are traditionally used to celebrate such occasions marking the births of princes as they jubilantly entered the gates of the royal palace (to felicitate the king and bless the princes). (4)

When they reached the inner part of the palace, they performed Aarti<sup>1</sup> and made offering of gifts to the princes (to bless them), and repeatedly fell down at the children's feet (as a gesture of paying obeisance and vowing allegiance to their future king). (5)

Royal singers, minstrels and bards sang glories of the great Lord who would lead the in the family of the legendary kings descending from the ancient king Raghu (raghunāyaka)<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Aarti is a traditional Hindu ritual whereby small lighted earthen lamps, that are usually arranged on a plate, are waved slowly in a clock-wise circular movement before someone who is being honoured or shown special respect. Simultaneously, flowers and gifts are given to the person shown honour, or such gifts are distributed amongst those who are witnessing the event.

<sup>2</sup>The term “raghunāyaka”, as defined here, is invariably used for Lord Ram throughout the book ‘Ram Charit Manas’. Since the child, who would be named ‘Ram’ soon, was the eldest of the four princes, it was natural for the citizens to show greater respect to him, as he would be the one who would one day become their future king, because the eldest son of a king usually ascended the throne upon his father’s death.]

Everyone was exceedingly liberal in giving gifts and making charities on this happy occasion, and those who willingly received them would themselves give away these things immediately to others in their turn<sup>1</sup>. (7)

The festivities and celebrations were so enthusiastically engaged into by the citizens that throughout the city, in all its lanes and streets, there spread a layer of a mixture of powdered musk, sandalwood and saffron (because this mixture was liberally sprinkled on the ground and cheerfully sprayed by the people over one another to mark this auspicious occasion). (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, no one kept anything that he received as gift and largesse on that auspicious occasion. All wished to share the joy with others. If some did keep some token gift with themselves, it was more in the form of a memorabilia or a memento for future generations in the family, rather than keeping it because either they longed for it owing to its value or because they would need it for some personal use. Remember: Ayodhya was a prosperous state, and every citizen was fully provided for, with no poverty or want anywhere.]

There were celebrations galore and playing of musical instruments as well as singing of felicitous songs in great abundance in every household of the city in order to mark the birth of the Lord (Ram representing the Supreme Being, the Lord who was the Saviour, Protector and the Redeemer of the world) who is an embodiment of all auspiciousness and beauty.

In every nook and corner of the city there were bands of exhilarant citizens, both males and females, thoroughly enjoying the time of their lives<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 194)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Geetawali Ramayan of Tulsidas, in its Baal Kand, verse nos. 1-5, vividly describes the elaborate ceremonies, grand festivities and mass rejoicings in the city of Ayodhya that marked the birth of Lord Ram. An English version of Geetawali has been published by this humble author separately.

As has been noted earlier, there was ample time to decorate the city of Ayodhya elaborately, from the time of the fire sacrifice when the Fire God had prophesized the birth of the four princes, to the actual moment of their birth.

The whole city was decked up gorgeously, with a fastidious eye on each detail, like a bride in her natural pristine beauty. It was painted gaily; beautiful ceremonial gates and arches were erected with intricate designs and decorated by coloured paper and gems; multi-coloured flags and royal standards fluttered from atop buildings and gateways and arches and royal palaces; banners, buntings and festoons of all shapes, sizes and hues of colours, made from the finest of satin and silk, with fringes of velvet, were strung across streets, lanes and squares, as well as in courtyards and porticos of private homes and public houses, as well as in market places; gorgeous stages were put up where many kinds of artists would display their skills in music, dance and singing with a great deal of flourish; scented water was sprinkled throughout the city, and the avenues and parks were washed clean; flowers and trees were planted everywhere, along the sides of streets, in public parks, along boundary walls of homes and every nook and corner of the city; a rainbow of colours formed in the sky with the spraying of different kinds of powder made from herbs and flowers that got mixed with the dense smoke arising from incense burning here and there all over the city; a sweet fragrance permeated everywhere as powdered saffron, musk and sandalwood were liberally sprayed in the city; clusters of jubilant citizens, all attired in their finest of embroidered clothes and glittering ornaments, stood in large or small groups here and there discussing the auspicious events of the day, or walked around cheerfully in the city exchanging pleasantries and greetings; band-stands were erected where musical bands would start playing as soon as the good news of the birth of the four princes was announced, and in similar stages elsewhere bards, poets and minstrels would sing the glories of the royal family which has an ancient ancestry, being descendants of the great legendary kings named Ikshwaku and Raghu, as well as of the princes who are newly born, princes whose glories would shine eternally for all times to come, for as long as the sun and the moon shine in the sky.

To wit, the general atmosphere was one of great festivity and ceremony, not only because an heir to the throne was coming along, but more so because that heir was not an ordinary prince but the Redeemer, the Saviour and the Protector of the world himself. It was surely an occasion to rejoice and celebrate by the citizens of Ayodhya who felt so singularly honoured and extremely blessed that the Lord had chosen them to be his subjects, to come and live amongst them as one of them, and give these humble people the rarest of rare privilege of being able to directly interact with the Lord of the World, for in all sooth and without gainsay it was 'He' who would manifest himself as Lord Ram, a lovable prince of the realm, a dear friend of one and all, a prince who would be a fountainhead of all auspicious virtues known to mankind. Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 296—to Doha no. 297 in this context, though the occasion was the arrival of news of Lord Ram's marriage with Sita. The city of Ayodhya was elaborately decorated at that time too, in the same fashion as it was done during the Lord's birth.

The esteemed reader would get an idea of what has been narrated herein above when he or she reads the verses that follow herein below.]

चौ०. कैकयसुता सुमित्रा दोऊ । सुंदर सुत जनमत भैं ओऊ ॥ १ ॥

kaikayasutā sumitrā dō'ū. sundara suta janamata bhairṁ ō'ū. 1.

vaha sukha sampati samaya samājā. kahi na saka'i sārada ahirājā. 2.

Queen Kaikeyi, who was the daughter of king Kaikaye, and queen Sumitra too gave birth to beautiful princes<sup>1</sup>. (1)

The atmosphere of abundant joy, happiness and exhilaration, the environment of excess of cheer and the feeling of intense ecstasy that prevailed at that time were so profound and beyond measurement that even the goddess of speech known as Sarada (i.e. goddess Saraswati) as well as the king of serpents, known as Lord Seshnath (who has a thousand tongues because he has an equal number of heads), were unable to describe them<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Kaikeyi had one son named Bharat, while Sumitra had two sons named Laxman and Shatrughan. The eldest of the four brothers was Lord Ram whose mother was the chief queen Kaushalya. We shall soon read about this when the four princes were given their names by the priest of the kingdom, sage Vasistha. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 197 along with Chaupai line nos. 2-8 that precede it.}]

<sup>2</sup>A similar idea is expressed in Ram Charit Manas when we read about the celebrations marking the return of Lord Ram, Laxman and Sita from the forest. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 9.}]

अवधपुरी सोहड़ एहि भाँती । प्रभुहि मिलन आई जनु राती ॥ ३ ॥

देखि भानु जनु मन सकुचानी । तदपि बनी संध्या अनुमानी ॥ ४ ॥

avadhapurī sōha'i ēhi bhāmṭī. prabhuhi milana ā'ī janu rātī. 3.
dēkhi bhānu janu mana sakucānī. tadapi banī sandhyā anumānī. 4.

On that auspicious occasion, the city of Ayodhya looked so glamorous and magnificent that it gave the impression that the goddess of night had come personally to visit and pay her homage to the Lord (i.e. to Lord Ram), --- (3)

--- But finding that it was noon time, and the splendorous sun was shining with all its brilliance in the sky, she hesitated to come forward, but at the same time was reluctant to go back without seeing the Lord, so she transformed herself as dusk and stayed on in the city<sup>1</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This is a classic case of imagery by a brilliant poet, as Tulsidas surely was. We shall read below that colourful powder made of herbs, flowers, saffron, musk and sandalwood was liberally sprayed all over the city, and it formed a cloud in the sky—apropos: Chaupai line no. 5 herein below.

Besides the above, there were other factors that contributed to the formation of an artificial twilight. In the city there were many public fountains spewing water from their spouts with such force that sprays of water rose up high in the air, and similarly, scented water was sprayed manually throughout the city, so that these two factors together caused a mist to form all over the city due to moisture that hung heavily in the air. Then there were large trees with their thick foliage; and huge banners, festoons, hangings etc. which cast their own shadows on the ground below. Then large tents and pavilions were erected all over the sprawling city, where large crowds would gather and celebrate publicly, which in their turn prevented sunlight from reaching the ground.

The net effect of all these and other factors was that though the sun was in the middle of the sky as it was noon time, yet its light was obscured to such an extent that it created an impression that it was the time of dusk or twilight, and not that of noon.]

अगर धूप बहु जनु अँधिआरी । उड़इ अबीर मनहुँ अरुनारी ॥ ५ ॥

agara dhūpa bahu janu am̐dhi'ārī. ura'i abīra manahum̐ arunārī. 5.
mandira mani samūha janu tārā. nr̐pa gr̐ha kalasa sō indu udārā. 6.

The cloud that formed by burning of incense obstructed sunlight to create the impression of dusk.

Fistfuls of Abir (a red powder used during celebrations) were tossed into the air, and the atmosphere was so laden with it that the sun's light filtering through this cloud looked red enough to give the impression of the sun's light as it is seen at sunset time. (5)

The tops of the houses of the citizens were decorated with gems that looked like so many stars twinkling in the fading sunlight during the twilight time.

In their midst, the magnificent and large pinnacle with a cupola that sat atop the royal palace of the king gave the impression of a full moon looking majestic in a sky full of clusters of stars. (6) kautuka dēkhi pataṅga bhulānā. ēka māsa tē'im' jāta na jānā. 8.

भवन बेदधुनि अति मृदु बानी । जनु खग मुखर समयँ जनु सानी ॥ ७ ॥

The sound of the Brahmins chanting verses from the Vedas (scriptures) with a sweet voice in the royal palace resembled the pleasant chirping of birds during evening hours. (7)

The Sun God was himself so much confused by this sight that he beheld in the city below (of dusk appearing during noon time) that he failed to move forward in the sky, but instead moved his celestial chariot round and round to make sense of things, as a result of which one month passed while it was still daytime<sup>1</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, the day on which Lord Ram was born seemed to stretch indefinitely, lasting for about a month's time. No one could distinguish between night and day.

In practical terms it means that every moment of the day was being thoroughly enjoyed by everyone so much so that time seemed to have lost meaning for the revelers. No one knew or bothered as to when the night came and the next day dawned; one day stretched seamlessly into the other day. The festivities and celebrations were continuous and never-ending. The city itself was so brilliantly illuminated that night had no practical meaning, and neither could the sun make his independent presence felt during the day as the daytime seemed to be dusk-time, as already said in the verses that we have just read heretofore.]

दो०. मास दिवस कर दिवस भा मरम न जानइ कोइ ।

रथ समेत रबि थाकेउ निसा कवन बिधि होइ ॥ १९५ ॥

dōhā.

māsa divasa kara divasa bhā marama na jāna'i kō'i.
ratha samēta rabi thākē'u nisā kavana bidhi hō'i. 195.

It was so strange indeed that a day lasted as long as a month, and no one had an inkling of this mysterious happening.

The Sun God was tired (going around in circles), wondering how it would be night time (and also wondering if he has lost his way across the endless stretch of an unmarked sky in front of him)<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 195)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>An explanation of this phenomenon is given as a note appended to verse nos. 7-8 herein above.

A similar idea has been expressed in Tulsidas' 'Geetawali Ramayan', in its Uttar Kand, verse no. 23, line nos. 7-8 where it is said that during the celebrations that marked the arrival of Lord Ram back to Ayodhya from the forest, the sun and the moon stood for some time in the sky as they were overwhelmed with joy and greatly amazed at the sight of grand festivities that were being held on the ground in the city of Ayodhya at that time.

In this imagery, one can visualize a traveler passing across a sand-covered endless stretch of barren land in a desert. Often it may happen that, due to a variety of reasons, the traveler would lose his way as he becomes so confused that he would go round and round in the same area. This loss of direction and sense of bearing may happen due to emotional stress arising out of a sense of hopelessness and helplessness in a vast stretch of wilderness with no sign of succour or help coming his way, or due to physical fatigue caused by sunstroke and heat and thirst, or for other reasons. But the net effect is that though the traveler exerts himself by walking and walking all day, he still sees the same terrain of sand and dunes stretching before him till the distant horizon—making him utterly dismayed, frustrated, bewildered and unhinged.

A similar thing happened with the Sun God. He could not understand why there is dusk when it ought to have been a bright sun-lit day time. He waited for some hours when he expected nightfall, but discovered that the city below was as illuminated as if it would have been during the day time. So, night appeared to be day, and day was nearly night with the sunlight obscured. This caused a lot of confusion to the Sun God.]

चौ०. यह रहस्य काहूँ नहिं जाना । दिनमनि चले करत गुनगाना ॥ १ ॥

देखि महोत्सव सुर मुनि नागा । चले भवन बरनत निज भागा ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

yaha rahasya kāhūṁ nahim jānā. dinamani calē karata gunagānā. 1.

dēkhi mahōtsava sura muni nāgā. calē bhavana baranata nija bhāgā. 2.

The mystery of this strange phenomenon (that there was neither a complete night nor a fully bright day during one month of celebrations marking the birth of Lord Ram and his three brothers as described heretofore) was not marked by anyone, nor did anybody bother to pay attention to its occurrence (because the celebrations in the city were one continuous event, without a break, and every single person was engaged in some or the other activity so much so that virtually the whole population remained awake throughout the time as long as the festivities lasted).

By-and-by, the Sun God, who was already amazed at this mysterious occurrence, finally recognized the mystical aspect of it (that it was the time of the advent of the Supreme Lord on earth, something that was extraordinary, and hence all events associated with that time would be extraordinary too) and went his way, all the while praising the glory of the Lord and reverentially paying his respect to the latter. (1)

The Gods, the Sages and the Nagas<sup>1</sup> (representing those who lived in the heaven, the pious souls who inhabited the earth, and the residents of the subterranean world respectively, i.e. inhabitants of all the three divisions of the world), having witnessed the grand celebrations and festivities marking the birth of Lord Ram, too paid their obeisance and went back to their respective abodes (in the heaven, hermitages and the subterranean world respectively), all the while thanking their good luck and feeling extremely honoured to have been able to participate in the auspicious events (marking the advent of the Supreme Being on earth in the form of Lord Ram). (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>We have read earlier that these gods, sages and the nagas had come to pay their respects to the Supreme Being just prior to the Lord's revelation. Then they had gone back to their respective homes* to prepare and come back once again to participate in the celebrations attending the birth of the same Supreme Lord in the form of Lord Ram. {*Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 191 along with Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede it.}]

Earlier they had to rush to offer their obeisance to the Lord as there was no time for elaborate preparations, as the creator had suddenly announced the time, without giving them any advance notice. But now they came back fully prepared, gods and nagas in their finery, holding flowers and fruits and other gifts, and the sages and seers came prepared with small items that they need for blessing a newly born child, such as sacred water, kush grass, rice grains, vermilion and saffron powder, and so on.

Now, they assumed human forms once they were in the city of Ayodhya, and then they mingled with the local population and participated in the festivities without anyone noticing them. A proof of this happening is that Lord Shiva and sage Kaagbhusund had assumed the form of human beings so that they can personally take part in the celebrations, and they did it not only in the streets but also from within the palace where they had gone to pay their obeisance to Lord Ram. There are clear hints to it in the following verses of Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 194 herein above; and Chaupai line nos. 3-7 that precede Doha no. 196 herein below.}

A similar thing has also happened during the marriage ceremony of Lord Ram and Sita, when the gods and goddesses and other celestial beings as well as sages and mystics had assumed human forms to personally participate in the celebrations that attended that auspicious occasion. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chanda line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 319; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 6-8 and Chanda line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 321.}

paramānanda prēmasukha phūlē. bīthinha phirahim magana mana bhūlē. 5.

[Lord Shiva told Parvati—] ‘Listen oh daughter of the King of Mountains (“giri-jā”; i.e. Parvati, his consort). Since you have a steady mind and would understand the real intent of what I am going to tell you presently, I would disclose to you the stratagem I had employed to personally participate in the gaieties and celebrations marking the auspicious occasion of birth of our beloved Lord Ram. (3)

I and sage Kaagbhusund had assumed human forms and mingled with the crowd in Ayodhya, but no body could know who we were<sup>1</sup>. (4)

We two were ecstatic with joy, and literally puffed up with exhilaration as we roamed around the streets and lanes of the city of Ayodhya. We were so amazed and lost in enjoying the moment that we had no sense of time and direction, or who we were. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Shiva told Parvati: “To wit, it is a secret affair as no one knew what we two did, and no one cared either. It was done with a good intention, and though employment of some cunning method is not good for a noble and upright soul, yet since our intention was not bad but very noble and upright indeed, and also because this deceit was not meant to cheat or harm anyone but to enjoy the sacred bliss which we would have missed if we were too rigid about having a moral high ground just for the sake of false ego of being upright and religious in our conduct, so it was eligible for forgiveness. I am willing to disclose the trick we two employed to participate in the celebrations marking the birth of Lord Ram because I am certain you would see it in the right light, and not misconstrue it as a mischief committed by your husband who had earlier punished you for the same error of trying a dirty trick in order to judge the authenticity of Lord Ram, and then covering up your mischief by telling a lie, during your previous life as Sati—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 52—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 57.

You see the difference between our two cases: you had used cunning to test Lord Ram, and then aggravated your sin by telling a lie to me; while we two, myself and Kaagbhusund, had used a trick to enjoy the spiritual bliss that came by participating in the birth festivities of the same Lord, and I am not telling a lie to you as you had done to me at that time, for I am owning my actions.”

This particular confession by Lord Shiva shows how truthful he was, that he did not hesitate or feel bashful to own-up his trick, that he had assumed a false form of a human being to go and participate in the grand festivities coinciding with Lord Ram’s birth with the main purpose of being able to go near his beloved Lord Ram and seek the Lord’s personal attention.

Now howbeit, a question arises: what ‘human form’ had Shiva and Kaagbhusund assumed on that occasion? Well, though it is not expressly stated anywhere in the text what it was, i.e. out of the four classes of men in ancient societies, such as Brahmins (upper class consisting of learned men, teachers and priests), Kshatriyas (the warrior class), Vaishyas (the merchant or trading class) and Sudras (the section of society that served the other three), it can be safely assumed that they had disguised themselves as Brahmins. The reason is easy to understand: since their main objective in assuming a human form and visiting Ayodhya at the time of Lord Ram’s birth was not only to enjoy the celebrations attending the Lord’s birth and participate in the festivities, but using that opportunity to have direct access to their beloved Lord so that they can see him from close quarters to pay their obeisance to the Lord personally, and to express their love and affection and devotion to the Lord from up close, the safest and surest way to achieve this goal was to become a Brahmin. This would give them free and unhindered access to the inner part of the royal palace, because in a tradition-bound society of those ancient days, males were usually not allowed to be admitted into the female quarters of royal households, where the infant princes would naturally have been with their mothers, but Brahmins were exceptions to this general restriction, especially on an auspicious occasion as birth of a child, as then they were not only most welcome but even invited to come in and bless the new-born child. Besides, as Brahmins, they will be given right-of-way to visit any part of the city they wished, with no one questioning who they were, as Brahmins were always shown great respect by one and all.

Another point to remark here is that Lord Shiva and the saintly crow Kaagbhusund were close friends. It was expected this way, as both of them were ardent devotees of Lord Ram, and totally dedicated to the latter. In this context, one more important thing comes to our mind—and it is that the story of Lord Ram was first revealed in its present form in the Mana (collectively meaning the heart and the mind) of Lord Shiva while he was meditating on Lord Ram, and then this divine story was revealed by Shiva to only two other pious souls directly: one was his consort, goddess Parvati, and the other hearer was Kaagbhusund. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 30.}

Who was Kaagbhusund? He was a saintly crow who lived in the higher reaches of the northern Mountains, i.e. in the Himalayas, somewhere near-about Mt. Kailash, the terrestrial abode of Lord Shiva. His abode was called the Neel Giri, the ‘blue mountain’, with a summit that looked ‘golden’ in hue due to the sunlight falling on it at an angle due to its astounding height. Establishing his hermitage in that pleasant environ that was conducive to spiritual practice, Kaagbhusund used to preach other birds the story of Lord Ram. Even Lord Shiva had once gone to him incognito, disguised as a swan, and heard him give discourse on the story of the Lord. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 56—to Doha no. 57.}

At the time of Lord Ram’s marriage with Sita too, a similar thing had happened when the creator Brahma, the gods and goddesses and other celestial beings, as well as sages and mystics had assumed human forms to personally participate in the celebrations that attended that auspicious occasion. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chanda line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 319; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 6-8 and Chanda line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 321.}

In Tulsidas’ ‘Geetawali Ramayan’ an incident is narrated wherein Lord Shiva had disguised himself as a soothsayer and went to Ayodhya; he had a young Brahmin boy as his disciple with him. Now, though it is not said clearly who this disciple was, but in all probability he was none but Kaagbhusund. Lord Ram’s mother Kaushalya heard that a great fortune-teller has arrived from somewhere with a young disciple, so she called them in and asked Shiva, disguised as a soothsayer, to see and bless the child named Ram, and tell something about his future, as all mothers are eager to know what fate has in store for their sons. This gave Lord Shiva the rare opportunity he was seeking—to be invited to come and be near to his beloved Lord Ram, to touch the divine child’s feet, head and hands, to take the child in his arms and caress him, and in general show excess of love, affection and reverence to the Lord on the pretence of examining him closely to prophesize about his future, while nobody would be able to guess who the soothsayer actually was, and what was his real aim. Having satisfied his heart and feeling extremely fortunate and blissful, and with the main objective of his visit served, Lord Shiva made some general good comments about the future of the children, such as sage Vishwamitra coming and taking Ram with him to perform a deed that would give the adolescent boy a great fame, and later on to get him as well as all his three brothers married; Shiva also predicted that all the four children would gain immense fame and glory in their lives. This good news obviously thrilled all the mothers beyond measure, and then Shiva and his companion disciple went their way. {Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 17.}

यह सुभ चरित जान पै सोई । कृपा राम कै जापर होई ॥ ६ ॥
 तेहि अवसर जो जेहि बिधि आवा । दीन्ह भूप जो जेहि मन भावा ॥ ७ ॥ yaha subha carita jāna pai sōī. kṛpā rāma kai jāpara hōī. 6.

 tēhi avasara jō jēhi bidhi āvā. dīnha bhūpa jō jēhi mana bhāvā. 7.
 gaja ratha turaga hēma gō hīrā. dīnhē nrpa nānābidhi cīrā. 8.

Only those who are blessed by the grace of Lord Ram would understand the secret of the auspicious intention we had then, and the extreme level of bliss and ecstasy that we had experienced during those heavenly moments when we (myself and Kaagbhusund) had participated in the birth celebrations of Lord Ram. (6)

On that occasion, all those who came to the palace were gifted with whatever they wanted by king Dasrath<sup>1</sup>. (7)

The king liberally gifted elephants, chariots, horses, gold, cows, diamonds, and all sorts of wearing apparels and robes to all who sought them, and everything was available for the asking by the visitors. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A very clever statement by Lord Shiva! He and Kaagbhusund had assumed a human form, and they had roamed around in the city as already mentioned by the Lord. But their main aim was to visit Lord Ram and pay their obeisance to the Lord whom they loved so much. So it was but natural that they must have gone to the palace and stood in the queue with other visitors. When their turn came, it is equally natural that they would have got a chance to go to the child Ram and offer their respects to him just like others, who had stood in the queue for their turn to come to go near the child, had been doing. Now, of course they had not come to seek material gifts, so after paying their respects to their beloved Lord Ram, Shiva and Kaagbhusund quietly moved out of the palace and started roaming in the city, left alone to themselves, unnoticed and un-bothered by anyone. It is quite possible that they went inside the palace and met Lord Ram more than once, for the simple reason that the crowd was so huge and the spirit of celebration so high that no one had the mind to keep tabs on who came or went out of the palace.

Truly indeed, it was this exclusive opportunity of being so close and near to their beloved Lord Ram that they could even touch him, put their heads at his feet, and caress the child Ram lovingly as one would do to a child when one goes to bless him during the celebrations of the child's birth, that Lord Shiva and sage Kaagbhusund decided to bear with the accusation of using a trick just so that they can have the good fortune to express their love and affection for their beloved Lord personally, for they realised that they would not get such a golden opportunity ever in their lives again when Lord Ram grows up a little, for then free and direct access to the Lord would be very limited in accordance with traditional protocols that would come into play, which, inter alia, restrict access to princes and other members of the royal household. Obviously, the gates of the palace won't remain open for one and all for all times to come in.]

दो०. मन संतोषे सबन्हि के जहँ तहँ देहिं असीस ।

mana santōṣē sabanhi kē jaham̐ taham̐ dēhim̐ asīsa.

The alms, gifts and largesse granted by king Dasrath satisfied everyone, and all were profusely blessing him from every direction, saying that all the sons, including the Lord of Tulsidas (i.e. Lord Ram), may have long and fruitful lives<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 196)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>We must not forget that Tulsidas was not merely a poet or scribe, but he was an ardent devotee of Lord Ram too. So therefore, while describing all the events associated with the birth of the Lord, Tulsidas personally gets involved at the emotional and spiritual level in the festivities. So he imagines that he too is roaming on the streets of Ayodhya with Lord Shiva and Kaagbhusund, that he too can feel the level of bliss and joy they had themselves experienced, he joins the crowd that queues to visit Lord Ram and bless the child, and like Shiva and Kaagbhusund and others he too expresses his profound love to his beloved Lord Ram, albeit only in a token way in his mind and heart.

So, when Shiva, Kaagbhusund, Brahmins, Gods, Goddesses, Sages, Mystics and others were blessing Lord Ram when their turn in the queue came, Tulsidas too stands up and gives his emotional blessings to his beloved Lord when his own turn comes!

To wit, though the pious saint Tulsidas was not physically present at that time, yet his presence is most remarkable at the emotional, spiritual and mental level, for a true devotee always feels that the Lord is eternally present by his side, and time and distance do not mean anything to him.]

चौ०. कछुक दिवस बीते एहि भाँती । जात न जानिअ दिन अरु राती ॥ १ ॥

nāmakarana kara avasaru jānī. bhūpa bōli paṭha'ē muni gyānī. 2.

Some days passed in this way during grand celebrations and festivities that marked the birth of the four princes, when days and nights passed unnoticed. (1)

Finally the time arrived when a formal name was to be given to the four princes<sup>1</sup>. At that time, the king sent a messenger to the learned guru (sage Vasistha), asking him to come and assign auspicious names to the four children. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Tulsidas has described this episode elaborately in his 'Geetawali Ramayan', in its Baal Kand, verse no. 6.

According to Hindu tradition, this naming ceremony of a child is usually done by the family priest on the 11th or 12th day from birth. We would note here that previously it has been said that the day the four princes were born extended up to one full month—apropos: Doha no. 195. Then at the end of this period, finally, the sun god moved towards the horizon and night fell—apropos: Chaupai line no. 1 that follows Doha no. 195.

Therefore, we can safely assume that the counting of the days must have started from the end of this period, i.e. after one month, during which there was constant daylight. In practical terms it would mean that king Dasrath was himself so lost in the celebrations and so overwhelmed with joy and happiness that he forgot all other things and formalities that needed to be attended to. On the other hand, his guru sage Vasistha too kept quiet as he did not wish to act as a hindrance or a spoil-sport in the mass merry-making, for he well knew who the four children were, and so whatever time was chosen for their naming ceremony would become automatically auspicious—for, wherever the Lord goes the time and circumstance become auspicious and favourable. Hence, there was no need for hurry and creating an unnecessary fuss over inconsequential issues.]

When the guru (sage Vasistha) arrived, the king duly worshipped him and said reverentially: ‘Oh sage (muni)! Please assign names to these four children in accordance with what you may have decided for them, keeping in mind their special qualities and virtues that you see in them.’ (3)

The sage replied: ‘Oh king (nṛpa)! They have many names, and all are beautiful as well as auspicious in their own rights. However, I will give them individual names which I think are most appropriate for the four children. (4)

---He who is an embodiment of the virtues of bliss, happiness and joy of all kinds, and who grants peace and tranquility to the whole world—well, he would be called ‘Ram (pronounced as “Rāma”)<sup>1</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It was either that the queens were sitting side-by-side with their sons in their laps, or all the four princes were lying in small independent cradles during the naming ceremony. So therefore, sage Vasistha pointed out each child while assigning a name to him. He first named the eldest prince as ‘Ram’.]

[Pointing the second child, sage Vasistha said—] ‘He who looks after the material needs of the world and makes necessary arrangements to supply the necessities of life—he would be known as ‘Bharat’.’ (7)

[Turning to the third child, sage Vasistha said—] ‘He whose mere remembrance is sufficient to enable one to eliminate or overcome one’s enemies, and whose virtues have been highlighted even in the Vedas—he would be known as ‘Shatrughan (also pronounced as “satruhana”)<sup>1</sup>’ (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The word “satruhana” has two parts: (i) satru = enemy; and (ii) hana = destroyer. Hence, ‘Shatrughan’, the way satruhana is normally pronounced, is the one who destroys enemies.]

Then finally, he who is an embodiment of all auspicious virtues, is very dear to Ram, and is the one who supports the whole creation<sup>1</sup>—sage Vasistha graciously named that child (i.e. the fourth) as ‘Laxman (also pronounced as “lachimana”)<sup>2</sup>’. (Doha no. 197)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Laxman was a manifestation of Lord Seshnath, the celestial serpent with a thousand hoods. Seshnath is believed to support the earth and the rest of the known living world on top of his thousand hoods. Lord Vishnu too reclines on Seshnath’s coiled body as the latter floats on the surface of the celestial ocean known as Kshirsagar.

The Guru (i.e. sage Vasistha, who was the royal priest and an advisor on religious matters to the royal family) named the four princes in accordance with the special characters and qualities he perceived in them.

Turning to king Dasrath, he said: ‘Oh king (nṛpa)! Your four sons represent the essence of the four Vedas, and the virtues they stand for and extol. (1)

The Lord who is the beloved of great sages and mystics, who is very dear to all living beings, and whom Lord Shiva reveres as dearly as his own life—verily indeed, it is the same Lord who decided to assume the form of a child as it would give immense joy and happiness to one and all<sup>1</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In this verse, sage Vasistha is obviously referring to Lord Ram as the three instances he cites—of the Lord being dear to the sages and mystics as well as to rest of all living beings, and to Lord Shiva—applies exclusively to Lord Ram.

In this context, refer to: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 51; (ii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 209; (iii) Doha no. 204; (b) Ayodhya Kand, (iv) Doha no. 130; (c) Uttar Kand, (v) Doha no. 88.

Refer also to: “Kavitwālī Ramayan” of Goswami Tulsidas, its Uttar Kand, verse nos. 36 and 110 which are very explicit on this subject.

Sage Vasistha says that Lord Ram has assumed the form of a child because the great sages, saints and other pious people, as well as ordinary persons, and even Lord Shiva, had desired to derive immense pleasure by seeing the Supreme Lord in the form of a child, for then they would have an opportunity to see the Lord from up close, as a child playing around in his home, then slowly growing up to become a teen-aged prince, then marrying, and then doing so many other things during his tenure as a human being that later on these events would be duly chronicled into a legendary history called the Ramayana, which would then be recounted and retold by generations after generations of saints, poets, bards and minstrels for all times to come, thereby providing the world an opportunity to have access to something that would help the people to find spiritual peace and mental solace and succour in a world full of miseries and pains and grief.]

From the very days of his infancy, Laxman realized that Lord Ram was his only Lord, someone who was dearest to him and his best well-wisher<sup>1</sup>—and with this firm conviction he (Laxman) developed intense affection for the feet of his Lord, becoming Lord Ram's ardent follower and a faithful devotee<sup>2</sup>. (3)

Meanwhile, the other two brothers, i.e. Bharat and Shatrughan, too were very devoted to Lord Ram, and their affection, devotion and commitment towards the Lord was truly of the standard expected between a loving-and-caring Master and his devoted servants. [To wit, the love, affection and devotion of Bharat and Shatrughan for Lord Ram was not one whit less than that of Laxman.]<sup>3</sup> (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 71—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 73 where Laxman's love, dedication, complete submission and total commitment towards Lord Ram, and his vow that everything for him is secondary in this world when it comes to his relationship with the Lord, is as crystal clear as it could ever be.

<sup>2</sup>This devotion and unyielding commitment to his dearest Lord Ram would become evident a little later on in our reading of the story of Ram Charit Manas. Here, let us briefly have a glimpse of four such remarkable occasions as follows:

The first two occasions were during the bow breaking ceremony held in Janakpur to select a groom for Sita. There, when no one could break the bow, king Janak had lamented and remarked that it seemed to him that the world has no true man worth his name who would have the strength of his arms so as to break the bow, when no one could as much as move it even an inch. This infuriated Laxman as he took it as a direct insult of his beloved Lord, Sri Ram, so much so that he instantly got up and fiercely rebuked Janak, not bothering to mind whom he was speaking against, or for protocol and decency of behaviour that ought to be observed during such events. {Apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 251—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 254.}

Soon, when sage Parashuram came to punish Lord Ram for breaking the bow of Lord Shiva, Laxman stood between the angry sage and the Lord, and fearlessly defended his brother while shaming the sage and putting him on the back foot, to the amazement of the entire assembly and confounding the sage himself. He challenged the sage to try to harm Lord Ram, and Laxman would make him learn a bitter lesson of his life. Ultimately, the sage surrendered and went his way. {Apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 268—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 285.}

The third occasion comes when news arrived in the forest that Bharat, Lord Ram's younger brother, was coming to him with a huge army. Though Bharat had as much love for Lord Ram as had Laxman, and his purpose of coming to meet the Lord in the forest was to try to take him back to Ayodhya, but the news of a great army accompanying him gave a wrong impression—that he was coming to fight and imprison the two brothers, Laxman and Lord Ram, in an attempt to usurp the crown of Ayodhya. This news fuelled Laxman's wrath so much so that he got up determined to fight-to-finish and kill Bharat along with all those who accompanied him for daring to raise their eyes against Lord Ram and attempting to confront and insult him in this impudent manner. This also shows how deeply Laxman loved Lord Ram and was totally devoted to him, because he was ready to kill even his own brother Bharat and subjects of his kingdom because they dared to affront Lord Ram. {Apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 227—to Doha no. 230.}

And then finally, we read that during the famous War of Lanka, Laxman had fallen to the ground fighting Meghanad on behalf of Lord Ram, and then the Lord had wailed and lamented as if he has lost his very own son and the dearest friend in this world. {Apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 54; (ii) Doha no. 61 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-18 that precede it.}

<sup>3</sup>This fact, that Bharat was a great devotee of Lord Ram and faithful to him, is evident in the following verses of Ram Charit Manas: (a) Ayodhya Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that precede Doha no. 178; (ii) Doha no. 182 along with Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede it (Bharat refuses to accept the throne of Ayodhya, saying that his primary duty is to serve Lord Ram and nothing else); (iii) Chaupai line nos. 3-8 that precede Doha no. 208 (sage Bharadwaj praises Bharat's devotion, and says that he is extremely dear to Lord Ram); (iv) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 218; (v) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 216—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 217 (Mother Nature lauds Bharat's devotion for Lord Ram); (vi) Doha no. 219 (the creator affirms Bharat's devotion for Lord Ram); (vii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precede Doha no. 222—to Doha no. 224 (where we read how the people whom Bharat met on the way to meet Lord Ram in the forest have appreciated Bharat's devotion for the Lord); (viii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 231—to Doha no. 232 (Lord Ram's praise for Bharat and his acknowledgement that there is no one like Bharat in the whole creation of the creator); (ix) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 258—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 259 (Lord Ram expresses his happiness when sage Vasistha praised Bharat); (x) Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 266 (the guru of the gods praises Bharat); (xi) Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that precede Doha no. 283 (praise of Bharat during the conversation of Kaushalya and consort of Janak); (xii) Doha no. 288 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede it (praise by king Janak); (xiii) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 294 (where it is said that Bharat was an embodiment of the virtue of devotion for Lord Ram); and (xiv) Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 260 (where Bharat tells Lord Ram how the Lord would lose a game so that Bharat could win it during their childhood days); and (xv) Doha no. 168 along with Chaupai line no. 1 that follows it (mother Kaushalya's praise for Bharat).

It ought to be clearly noted here that Shatrughan had always preferred to stay in the shadows of Bharat; he never stepped out of this shadow; he never yearned to be in the limelight or get fame. It is so praise worthy a character of Shatrughan that though he took full control of the administration of the great empire of Ayodhya while his other three brothers were absent from the capital city, with Lord Ram and Laxman gone to the forest, and Bharat living as a hermit in a nearby suburb called Nandigram*, thereby obviously leaving the administration of the empire entirely in the hands of Shatrughan, the latter never sought to take any credit for it, he never hogged any attention—which is evident when we consider the fact that Shatrughan's name is rarely mentioned in the whole story of the Ramayan, yet there is no denying the fact that it was no one but he alone who had meticulously and perfectly run the affairs of the mighty kingdom when there was no one else to look after it and run its affairs. {Refer: *Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 323—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 324.}

Upon his return from the forest, Lord Ram must surely have acknowledged Shatrughan's great contribution towards keeping Ayodhya as prosperous and mighty as it was when the Lord had left it fourteen years ago. It must be noted here that for fourteen long years when the throne of Ayodhya was virtually empty, no rival king dared to invade or attack the kingdom to take advantage of the power vacuum that existed—because they knew the reputation of Shatrughan that he was a vanquisher of enemies*, and his name so terrified all evil eyes that they spared Ayodhya the horrors that would have befallen it had Shatrughan not been in charge. Sure and certain it is that this obvious point must not have escaped Lord Ram’s attention on his return from the forest. {*Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 197.}}

The four brothers formed a magnificent pair of two, one pair of siblings having a fair complexion, and the other pair being of a dark complexion<sup>1</sup>.

When the mothers would see this wonderful and heavenly sight (of the four children forming two natural pairs as if born to be such as giving the impression of them being a pair of twins), they would be filled with ecstasy so much so that they would break ends of twigs as a charm to ward off evil eyes from harming the children. (5)

Though without doubt all the four siblings were equal embodiments of excellent virtues, good manners and exemplary characters, yet Lord Ram was a wee whit senior or superior to them in all respects<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Ram and Bharat had dark complexion like that of a rain-bearing cloud, while Laxman and Shatrughan were of a fair complexion like that of molten gold.

Refer some instances in this connection: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 229; (ii) Doha no. 242; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 3-8 that precede Doha no. 311 where this fact of the four brothers forming two pairs, one pair consisting of Lord Ram and Bharat having a fair complexion, and the other consisting of Bharat and Shatrughan of being dark, is affirmed by the residents of Janakpur (b) Ayodhya Kand, (iii) Doha no. 116 along with Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes it (the villagers whom Lord Ram met on the way to the forest were also overwhelmed by the beauty of the two brothers, one being dark and the other fair).

<sup>2</sup>It was because Lord Ram was not only the eldest of the four brothers but Lord Vishnu himself personified in that form, while the other three brothers were manifestations of those who were very close to Vishnu. Laxman represented Seshnath, the legendary celestial Serpent on whose coiled body Lord Vishnu reclines on the surface of the Kshirsagar, the celestial ocean; Bharat represented Vishnu’s weapon called ‘Chakra’ (the serrated circular discus); and Shatrughan was a personified form of the Lord’s conch. This is clearly stated in Adyhyatma Ramayan, Uttar Kand, Canto 9, verse nos. 56-57.

Refer also to: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 16 where a similar idea has been expressed.

We read in Ram Charit Manas that when the two brothers, Lord Ram and Laxman, had gone out to take a round of the city of Janakpur, every single citizen was awed by the charm of Lord Ram so much so that a huge crowd followed the two brothers wherever they went, and the ladies of the city had flocked on the balconies and roof tops of their homes to have a look at Lord Ram*. At that time, though the two brothers walked side-by-side, it was Lord Ram's beauty and charm that drew everyone's attention#. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, *Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 220—to Chaupai line nos. 1, 5-8 that precede Doha no. 221; #Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 222 (at Janakpur); and Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-8 that precedes Doha no. 114 (during the Lord's journey to the forest when the humble villagers and travelers were charmed by his magnificent beauty and personality.)}]

In his (i.e. in Lord Ram's) heart the Moon of mercy, compassion and grace always shone, and the Lord's enchanting smile was like the rays of that moon as it illuminated the world with its soothing and comforting rays (because the smile of Lord Ram removed all sorrows and provided immense joy and comfort to all those who were around). (7)

The mothers showered their bounty of love and affection on the children by calling out to them using sweet nicknames that were endearing (priya lalanā), sometimes picking them up in their laps, and at other times putting them in their respective cradles<sup>1</sup>. (8) byāpaka brahma niranjāna nirguna bigata binōda.

sō aja prēma bhagati basa kausalyā kēm̐ gōda. 198.

Indeed and forsooth, it is such a great wonder that Brahm, the Lord who is all-pervading and immanent throughout the endless creation, who is invisible and formless, who has no attributes or a trace of grossness, and who is unconcerned with such worldly things as pleasure and joy, would assume the form of a child and play in the lap of mother Kaushalya just because the Lord was obliged to do it as he submitted to the grand virtue of love that a devotee has for him<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 198)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>We must not forget what Satrupa and Manu had requested from Brahm: that they wished to have the Lord as their son so that they can enjoy the pleasure of showing their love and affection for the Lord just like parents would do to their dear son, at which the Lord had promised them that he would fulfill their wish and become their son. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 149—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 152.}]

A similar promise was made by Brahm to sage Kashyap and Aditi—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-5 that precede Doha no. 187.

Lord Shiva too has affirmed this fact in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 141.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 2-5 that precede Doha no. 13; (ii) Doha no. 192; (b) Uttar Kand, (iii) Doha no. 72-a; (iv) Doha no. 85-b. In all these verses the same idea is expressed—that the Supreme Being goes out of his way to oblige his devotees, and the Lord assumed a human form to fulfill their wishes, thereby providing the rest of the world an opportunity to find an easy source of beatitude and felicity, a way to obtain spiritual bliss, deliverance, emancipation and salvation by singing and remembering the Lord and his divine story.]

[The following verses describe the magnificent charm and bewitching beauty of Lord Ram as a child. This pen-portrait resonates with what sage Kaagbhusund describes in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 76—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 77. Kaagbhusund's description is based on his personal experience when he had gone incognito, in his form as a crow, to play and hop around in the courtyard of the palace where the child Ram too used to play, thereby giving this great sage a chance to see Lord Ram from up close and enjoy playing with the divine child without arousing any suspicion in anyone's mind about his true identity.

Refer also to: (a) Kavitawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse nos. 2-3; (b) Geetawali Ramayan, Uttar Kand, verse nos. 2-17 where we read in detail about the wonderful charm of Lord Ram's image that was divine and heavenly to behold. Both these books have been published by this author in English versions]

Child Ram's image was dark-complexioned (syāma sarīrā) and it looked as magnificent as of a blue-hued lotus flower (nīla kaṇja) and a dense bank of dark rain-bearing clouds (bārīda gambhīrā). It was like a form that embodied the magnificence, beauty and charm of countless Kamdeos (who is a patron god of these virtues) (kāma kōṭi chabi)<sup>1</sup>. (1)

The shine of the nails (nakha jōtī) on the toes of the child's feet that resembled red-lotus flowers (aruna carana pañkaja) was such as if pearls were studded (or fresh dew-drops were perched) on the petals of the said lotus flowers (kamala dalanhi baiṭhē janu mōtī)<sup>2</sup>. (2)

On the sole of child Ram feet there are the auspicious marks of a Vajra (thunderbolt), a Flag and Ankush (a goad) (kulisa dhvaja aṅkusa)<sup>1</sup>.

The soft sound emanating from the anklets worn around the child's feet (nūpura dhuni) enrapture the mind of Munis (sages, seers, mystics and hermits) when they hear it (sunī muni mana mōhē). (3)

Around his hip is the hip-band from which small bells hang (kaṭi kiṅkinī) (and as the child moves they swing and give out a tinkling sound).

On his abdomen there are three folds of the skin (udara traya rēkhā), and the navel is deep in its contours (nābhi gabhīra)<sup>2</sup>, looking so excellent that only those who have seen it can understand its magnificence (jāna jēhim dēkhā). (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chanda line no. 15 that precedes Doha no. 13.

According to traditions, it is believed that there were a total of 48 signs on the two soles of Lord Ram, with each sole having 24 signs. Out of these, Tulsidas cites only three at present in the current verse we are reading, and the fourth, a lotus flower, is mentioned in the above-referred verse of Uttar Kand.

A tiger's claw (nail) that hung around his chest in the fashion of a pendant (hiyam̐ hari nakha) appeared very attractive (ati sōbhā rūri). (5)

The charm of the Lord's chest that was adorned by a magnificent garland made of gems that also has a large pendant of diamond dangling from it (ura manihāra padika kī sōbhā), as well as the sight of the footprint of a sage (Bhrigu) that is marked on the Lord's broad chest (bipra carana) looked very elegant, and together this view captivates the heart of the beholder of this wonderful sight (dēkhata mana lōbhā)<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 147.

By saying 'long arms' it is meant that the Lord goes out of his way and has a long reach in order to help and provide succour to his devotees. This view is endorsed specifically in Kavita wali Ramayan, Uttar Kand, verse no. 52.

The story behind the footprint of sage Bhrigu being marked on the chest of Lord Ram, whose primary form was Lord Vishnu, is as follows:

Once all the sages had collected and decided to judge which of the Trinity Gods, i.e. Brahma the creator, Vishnu the sustainer, and Shiva the concluder, is the greatest. Sage Bhrigu was appointed to find it out. Bhrigu first went to Brahma and did not show any respect to him. This enraged Brahma, but somehow he managed to control himself. Then Bhrigu went to meet Shiva. Shiva came forward but Bhrigu did not want to meet him, accusing the Lord of following inauspicious way of life. This enraged Shiva who lifted his trident to kill Bhrigu. Then Parvati, the consort of Shiva, intervened and pacified him.

Finally, Bhrigu went to Vishnu who was reclining in his divine abode known as Vaikuntha. Bhrigu got annoyed that Vishnu did not get up to welcome him, and so he kicked the Lord on his chest. Lord Vishnu woke up from his sleep, and instead of becoming angry at Bhrigu asked for his forgiveness as he was unaware that the Brahmin has arrived as he was asleep. Further, Vishnu showed Bhrigu great respect and said that instead of feeling insulted on being kicked on the chest, he is feeling honoured that a great sage had blessed him by touching his body with his august feet. This stunned Bhrigu; he was dumbfounded at the gracious and forgiving nature of Vishnu. But Vishnu's consort Laxmi, the goddess of wealth and prosperity, was extremely peeved, and she cursed the Brahmin that henceforth the entire Brahmin race will have to suffer because of lack of wealth and would be forced to beg for their sustenance.

Lord Vishnu wears the mark made by the sage's footprint on his chest as a token of respect that he has for learned Brahmins.

Bhrigu came back and narrated the entire thing to the assembly of sages. They decided that indeed it was Lord Vishnu who was the greatest because he had conquered anger, the worst of all the negative qualities and the cause of all strife and destruction. Anger was to become the greatest of evils and vices in this world, and forgiveness as the greatest of virtues.

This story is narrated in Srimad Bhagwad Mahapurāṇ, Skandha 10, Chapter 89.]

His (child Lord Ram's) neck was well formed and rounded like a conch-shell (kambu kaṇṭha), and his chin looked exceedingly charming (ati cibuka suhā'ī)<sup>1</sup>.

The Lord's face (ānana) embodied the magnificence and beauty of countless Kamdeos (Cupid; the patron god of beauty and charm) (amita madana chabi chā'ī)<sup>2</sup>. (7)

His mouth had only two pairs of teeth, one on the front upper jaw and the other on the corresponding lower jaw (du'i du'i dasana). [To wit, when the Lord opened his mouth to smile or say something, one could see two pairs of small teeth behind his lips, one pair above and the other below it in the mouth.]

His lips were reddish (or pink) in colour (adhara arunārē).

Who can describe (i.e. no one can describe—"kō baranai pārē") the charm and the beauty of the Lord's nostrils (nāsā) and the small Tilak mark put on his forehead (tilaka)<sup>3</sup>. (8)

His (Ram's) ears and cheeks were well formed and lovely to behold (sundara śravana sucāru kapōlā) (like the rest of his body). The child Ram spoke endearing with a lisp in his voice (ati priya madhura tōtarē bōlā). (9)

His hairs were curly and smooth as they had never been trimmed since birth (cikkana kaca kuñcita gabhu'ārē), and the mother had taken special care to adorn them in various ways (bahu prakāra raci mātu samvārē) (such as sticking some gem-studded hair-pin in the cluster of curls, or forming small plaits or tufts tied together with silken strings to which pearls etc. were attached as hangings). (10)

pīta jhaguli'ā tanu pahirā'ī. jānu pāni bicarani mōhi bhā'ī. 11. rūpa sakahim nahim kahi śruti sēṣā. sō jāna'i sapanēhum' jēhim dēkhā. 12.

The child was attired in a yellow loose-fitting frock (pīta jhaguli'ā tanu pahirā'ī).

He moved or crawled on all fours (like a small child would normally do when he crawls forward using his arms and legs) (jānu pāni bicarani). Oh brother (bhā'ī)! This sight is very dear to me (mōhi bhā'ī)<sup>1</sup>. (11)

Verily indeed, forsooth and without gainsay, the most lovely and enchanting sight of Lord Ram's image as a child (that has been described in these verses) cannot be sufficiently described (rūpa sakahim nahim) even by the Vedas (which are experts in language, grammar and vocabulary, and have the ability to narrate even the most complex of things which seem to be incomprehensible for others) and Lord Sheshnath (who has thousands of mouths) (kahi śruti sēṣā).

To wit, only those who have seen it and witnessed the sight first-hand, even if it was in their dreams, can imagine how unique, singularly wondrous and stunningly fascinating it was (sō jāna'i sapanēhum' jēhim dēkhā)<sup>2</sup>. (12)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A remarkable play of words is to be marked here. The poet Tulsidas is referring to himself when he says “mōhi”, while the word “bhā'ī” has two connotations here—one meaning ‘a brother’, and the meaning ‘to like something’.

The poet obviously addresses his readers when he uses the words “mōhi bhā'ī” to mean ‘my brother’, and at the same time he also means that the beautiful sight of Lord Ram crawling on all fours is liked by him (Tulsidas) very much and he is fascinated by it.

<sup>2</sup>The idea is simple and straightforward: it refers to those who have meditated on Lord Ram, for they may have experienced the revelation of the Lord in a subtle world of existence. In higher stages of meditation, a state of Samadhi, a trance-like state of consciousness, is reached when the person rises above the grossness of the physical world and is transported to live in a subtle world of the Spirit, the world where cosmic Consciousness exists. It is akin to one dreaming, because it is a subtle world with no physical boundaries, and where everything is possible.

Till the dream lasts the person seems to fully live in that subtle world, and act in the same way as he would have done if he was living in the physical gross world. While he has to face many limitations inherent to life in the physical material world of grossness where the creature has a physical body, no such barriers exist in the subtle world of the Spirit which is a transcendental form of existence of the Consciousness. In this latter subtle world of transcendental existence of the Consciousness, the creature can go anywhere in his Spirit form, and time-space-distance become irrelevant for him.

It is this state to which the learned poet Tulsidas is referring here when he says that “only those who have seen or witnessed this view of Lord Ram in their dreams can fully understand how beautiful it is, because words we use to describe things of the gross world are incapable to describe it”.

Since this world of dream has no physical boundaries, and since Consciousness is an eternal entity that would know everything of the past and the present, so it is very easy for a highly attained individuals to actually witness the happenings that actually occurred during those days when Lord Ram was born, for such persons would have risen above life in this gross world and live in the subtle world of transcendental existence of the Consciousness.

Though it seems far-fetched an idea and something imaginary and incredulous, but it is because it is very difficult for a common man to reach that state of transcendental existence where such things can be actually experienced and witnessed. So what happens is that people find it is easy and convenient to reject and ridicule something simply because they themselves can't attain or realize it, for it would rather be nice to please the world by saying something that conforms to what the ignorant world would like hear, for the fear of otherwise being scorned for endorsing such esoteric ideas that the ignorant world would like to treat as heresy and paranormal or abstract phenomenon, though it is not the case in reality.]

[Bringing to a conclusion the description of the events that led to the birth of Lord Ram and his three brothers in Ayodhya, and the celebrations that followed, Lord Shiva then continued with his narration of the story of Lord Ram when he told Parvati as follows—] ‘In this aforesaid way, Lord Ram, who is the Parent (Father and Mother; “pitu mātā”) of this entire creation, had manifested himself in Ayodhya, known also as ‘Kaushal Pur’ (i.e. the capital city of the kingdom of Kaushal), to give its inhabitants immense joy, happiness and beatitude. (1)

Oh Bhavani!<sup>1</sup> Those who are devoted to Lord Ram (also called “Raghunath”, the Lord of the legendary line of illustrious kings descending from the ancient king named Raghu) and have deep love and affection for the holy feet of the Lord, they would feel the same way even today as the residents of Ayodhya had felt during those auspicious days when the Lord was personally present in their midst<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Shiva is known as ‘Bhava’, and therefore his consort, goddess Parvati is known as Bhavani—“bhavānī”, the wife of Bhava.

<sup>2</sup>To wit, Shiva has a wonderful prescription in this verse for all of us, whereby we too can enjoy the same sort of spiritual happiness, bliss and beatitude in our present lives that the citizens of Ayodhya had been fortunate to experience very long ago when Lord Ram lived with them personally. And, the magic of the prescription is that it so simple and straightforward—i.e. to have devotion, love and affection for the Lord, for these are the only qualifications the Lord desires from a creature to show his grace upon the latter.

This basic idea has been elaborately dealt with and expounded upon in Ram Charit Manas with several examples to illustrate the point. Refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 24—to Doha no. 25. It is to be remarked here that though this discourse is focused on the importance and the glory of the holy name of Lord Ram, yet it stresses how only a limited number of creatures could benefit by directly coming in contact with the Lord, but countless creatures benefit from invoking the grace of Lord Ram by having devotion for him, by having affection for him and faith in his holy name.

Even Lord Ram has reiterated this in principle in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 43—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 45.]

raghupati bimukha jatana kara kōrī. kavana saka'i bhava bandhana chōrī. 3.
jīva carācara basa kai rākhē. sō māyā prabhu sōm bhaya bhākhē. 4.

If a person is averse to (having devotion, affection and faith in) Lord Ram (Raghupati), then no matter what kind of efforts he does, he cannot find freedom from the fetters that shackle him to this gross mundane world consisting of an endless cycle of birth and death (i.e. the cycle of transmigration in which the soul of the creature is trapped)<sup>1</sup>. (3)

Even Maya (the personified form of the powers of Nature that create delusions in a living being) that has kept the entire world, both its inanimate as well as animate components, under its grip and influence, sparing none, is afraid of Lord Ram, and would consequently not disturb anyone who is devoted to the Lord and has the Lord's blessings upon him<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>An exactly similar principle has been endorsed by Lord Ram in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 43—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 45; and (ii) Doha no. 46 along with Chaupai line nos. 3-8 that precede it.

When the Vedas came to pay their obeisance to Lord Ram at the time of the Lord's coronation ceremony in Ayodhya, they had also reiterated this principle as is clearly said in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chanda line nos. 9-12 that precede Doha no. 13.

The saintly crow Kaagbhusund too has reiterated this fundamental spiritual truth in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 78—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 79; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 84; (iii) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 86—to Doha no. 87 (where Kaagbhusund quotes Lord Ram in this context); (iv) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 117—to Doha no. 119; and (v) Doha no. 122. In all these aforesaid verses, the relationship between Maya and Bhakti, how Maya keeps the creature trapped in its tentacles, and how one can break free from its fetter and find deliverance has been elaborately expounded.

भृकुटि बिलास नचावइ ताही । अस प्रभु छाड़ि भजिअ कहु काही ॥ ५ ॥ bhṛkuṭi bilāsa nacāva'i tāhī. asa prabhu chāḍi bhaji'a kahu kāhī. 5.

mana krama bacana chāḍi caturāī. bhajata kṛpā karihahim raghurāī. 6.

Lord Ram keeps a close watch on the activities of that Maya, and makes it do his bidding and carry out his orders obediently by the mere movement of his eyebrows<sup>1</sup>.

This being the case, say whom else should one worship and have devotion for other than such a powerful Lord (who can save a creature from the evil eyes of Maya, because it is only Lord Ram to whom Maya owes its allegiance and is affright of, for it dare not defy the Lord or his devotees)<sup>2</sup>? (5)

[Now, Shiva answers a pertinent question—which is: How would Lord Ram be pleased with a creature, what should one do or what qualities one should have in order to please the Lord and get his blessings so that Maya does not disturb him? The answer is this—] If one worships Lord Ram with purity in his heart, deeds and words, if one has devotion and affection for the Lord without a trace of deceit, conceit and pretension whatsoever in his heart, actions and thoughts as well as the words he speaks—then Lord Ram (Raghurai) would surely and without any doubt be pleased with such a devotee<sup>3</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that precede Doha no. 202; (b) Uttar Kand, (ii) Doha no. 71—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 72; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 3-8 that precede Doha no. 116.

<sup>2</sup>To wit, though there may be many different paths and means to attain deliverance from the fetters of this gross world of transmigration, and attain emancipation and salvation, but it would be a tiresome adventure trying to negotiate and overcome the countless difficulties that Maya would nevertheless create for the seeker. So therefore, it would be wiser and prudent to skip all the trouble and waste of time and energy trying to overcome Maya by following the simple trick that takes care of all misfortunes, and it is to have Bhakti, collectively meaning to have devotion, affection, love and total faith in Lord Ram, for then Maya and all its attendants would shy away from creating hurdles in the path of the seeker—because Maya cannot annoy the Lord and those who are protected by him.

<sup>3</sup>Shiva prescribes a very simple and practical way for a creature to gain Lord Ram's favour: he must have Bhakti for the Lord. 'Bhakti' means simple things as worshipping the Lord, being dedicated to him, having unadulterated devotion, love and affection for the Lord, and to be unconditionally faithful and committed to him.

The path of Bhakti is very easy and simple as explicitly outlined by Lord Ram himself in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 46 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede it.

Purity of heart, mind and deeds is of great importance to please Lord Ram, for he does not like cheats and cunning fellows—Lord Ram has expressly said so in Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-5 that precede Doha no. 44.]

In this way (as has been narrated earlier), the Lord played his part as a child perfectly to the great amusement and pleasure of all the (fortunate) residents of the city of Ayodhya. (7)

The mother (Kaushalya)<sup>1</sup> would sometime lift the Lord in her lap and sing a lullaby, and at other times she would put him in a cradle and swing it softly. (8)

Mother Kaushalya remained so lost in the joy and bliss that she got by tending to her dear son Ram and expressing her love for him that the passage of days and nights were not noticed by her.

So overcome was she with love and affection for the Lord that had filled her inner-self with immense ecstasy and happiness that most of the time she would sing about the child-like activities of the Lord as it gave great happiness and pleasure to her<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 200)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, mother Kaushalya did not seem to have enough of the childhood plays and pranks of Lord Ram; she would enjoy talking endlessly about the Lord's way of crawling on all fours, his laughing and smiling, his lisping banter and childish prattle-prattle, his cries of joy at seeing a toy and playing with it, his crying if that toy breaks, and all other such small acts that are so very natural for a little child, and which cause great amount of merriment and amusement for those who witness them.

Refer also to: Kavitawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse nos. 4-7; and Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse nos. 7-46.

Sage Kaagbhusund had also derived a similar bliss and feeling of blessedness when he visited Ayodhya and remained for quite some time in the royal palace, playing with the child Ram and hopping around in the courtyard alongside the Lord. No one suspected who he really was, for he was in the form of a 'crow'. { Who was Kaagbhusund? He was a saintly crow who lived in the higher reaches of the northern Mountains, i.e. in the Himalayas, somewhere near-about Mt. Kailash, the terrestrial abode of Lord Shiva. His abode was called the Neel Giri, the 'blue mountain', with a summit that looked 'golden' in hue due to the sunlight falling on it at an angle due to its astounding height. Establishing his hermitage in that pleasant environ that was conducive to spiritual practice, Kaagbhusund used to preach other birds the story of Lord Ram. Even Lord Shiva had once gone to him incognito, disguised as a swan, and heard him give discourse on the story of the Lord. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 75—to Doha no. 82.}}

[The episode we are now going to read herein below in these verses that follow relates to an incident that once happened when mother Kaushalya placed the child Ram on a couch to sleep and then went to her personal worship room to offer prayers to the family deity. After doing the rituals associated with worshipping the deity, she went to the kitchen for some work, and when she returned to her worship room she found the little child Ram eating sweets meant as offerings to the deity. Stunned and unable to understand what she saw, the mother rushed back to the place where she had put the child Ram on the couch to sleep. She found, to her utter astonishment and a baffled mind, that Ram was sleeping peacefully on it. She again rushed to the worship room and saw Ram enjoying the sweets there as well. This was the moment when the Lord of the world revealed his cosmic form of the 'Viraat Purush' to enlighten Kaushalya not to be deluded to think that Ram is her son in the ordinary sense of the meaning of the word as the mortal world understands it, but the Divine Being revealed in his human form.]

One day, the mother (Kaushalya) bathed the child (Ram), dressed him and adorned him with ornaments befitting a child, and then laid him in a couch (i.e. a cradle) so that he could go to sleep<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Then she took a bath herself so that she could offer worship to the family deity. (2)

 bahuri ā'i dēkhā suta sō'ī. hrdayam' kampa mana dhīra na hō'ī. 6.

After worshipping, she offered some sweet offerings to the deity as part of the worship ritual<sup>1</sup>, and then went to the royal kitchen. (3)

Then she came back to the room where the deity was worshipped. To her utter amazement and shock, she saw that her son (i.e. Lord Ram) was eating the offerings that she had just a while ago made to the deity! (4)

Stunned and sore affright (as it seemed to be some evil sort of a magic charm cast around the child that gave an impression of an apparition appearing in his likeness), she rushed to the room where she had, a little while ago, placed the child in the cradle to sleep. And lo and behold; what did she see? To her dazed mind overcome with astonishment, she found the child (Lord Ram) peacefully sleeping in the cradle, the same way she had place him on the bed! (5)

She dashed back to the worship room, and found the child enjoying the food offerings. The sight shook her to the core; her heart trembled in fear, and she was not able to come to terms with what she saw (for she thought she was seeing a nightmare in broad daylight, something that may be a bad omen, indicating that some Spirit has entered the palace and had an evil eye on the helpless child)<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The offerings made during worship of a deity usually consist of some sweets, fruits, dry as well as fresh, sugar, clarified butter (known as Ghee), curd, cooked rice etc.

<sup>2</sup>It is a belief in tradition-bound Hindu homes that evil spirits usually attack infants. This erroneous belief leads to many customs, such as wearing of a tiger claw around the neck of a child, or making a black mark of a dot or a crescent moon on his forehead by using a paste made of black soot of an oil lamp that is mixed with its oil, or hanging some kind of charm, such as green lemon, chilly, garlic and onion, and sometimes even a sun-like small disc, tied to a string and hung from the cradle stand or the doorway of the child's room.

So, when Kaushalya saw her son Ram at two places at the same time, one sleeping in the cradle and the other enjoying the food offerings to the family deity, her hairs stood on their edges, fearing that something was amiss and seriously ominous. So her heart shook with the thought of something bad happening.]

इहाँ उहाँ दुइ बालक देखा । मतिभ्रम मोर कि आन बिसेषा ॥ ७ ॥
देखि राम जननी अकुलानी । प्रभु हँसि दीन्ह मधुर मुसुकानी ॥ ८ ॥ ihām' uhām' du'i bālaka dēkhā. matibhrama mōra ki āna bisēṣā. 7.

dēkhi rāma jananī akulānī. prabhu haṁṣi dīnha madhura musukānī. 8.

When she saw the child simultaneously at two places, she was confused and overcome with consternation, wondering: 'Am I deluded; I see two images in the exact likeness of my son, which of the two is my son? Or has someone else's son disguised as my son come here to befool me, or has some evil spirit come in the form of this apparition to cause some grave mischief?' (7)

However, when Lord Ram observed that the mother was exceedingly disturbed and trembling with fear, the Lord smiled sweetly (to indicate to her that all was fine, that she need not get so upset as it was a mischief done by himself to have some fun with her)<sup>1</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>We must not forget who Lord Ram was, like probably mother Kaushalya did, which obliged the Lord to remind her of his true identity: i.e. that though he acted like an ordinary human child, he was actually the Supreme Being come in that form. Lord Ram wished to remind Kaushalya to remember that moment when he had appeared to her in a Holy Spirit form just prior to assuming a human form. {Apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chanda line nos. 1-15 that precede Doha no. 192 earlier.}]

The Lord used this opportunity, when there was no third person present there, to privately warn Kaushalya not to be deluded and carried away by his worldly activities as a human being, but rather remain focused on his divine form if she wishes to reap any spiritual rewards by having the rarest or rare opportunity to be so close to the Supreme Being as to lift him onto her lap and shower her motherly love on him at a very personal level to fulfill the desire of her previous life when this is what she had exactly sought from the Lord. Otherwise, she would be lost in the maze caused by Maya (delusions). She must display the same level of maturity and wisdom that she had shown at the time of asking the Lord to become her son earlier. {Apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 150—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 151; and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that precede Doha no. 187.}]

This fact, of Lord Ram alerting Kaushalya not to be deluded by his human form, and to remember who he actually was, and Kaushalya suddenly realizing that she was on the verge of falling into the trap of delusions when she erroneously thought that the Father of creation was her child, is very clear in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 202 herein below. Here we shall also read that the Lord has expressly asked her to keep this event secret, between the two of them.

It is to be remarked here that when Sati, i.e. goddess Parvati in her previous life, had gone to test the authenticity and divinity of Lord Ram, she had tried a trick upon the Lord by assuming a perfect image of Sita, Lord Ram's wife, to see if he could recognize who she actually was. To her amazement and consternation, Lord Ram not only recognized who she really was when he asked her how her husband Shiva fared, but created a magical sight whereby Sati could see Lord Ram, Sita and Laxman in all the directions around her, and all the gods and goddesses serving the Lord everywhere she could see*, a sight almost similar to the event now when mother Kaushalya sees two images of Lord Ram simultaneously, doing two different things—eating and sleeping at the same time in two separate rooms. {*Apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 52—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 55.}]

The Lord (Ram) showed the mother his original, wonderful and mysterious cosmic form that encompassed the entire creation within its ambit, and was infinite and undivided.

Not only one universe or world, but countless universes and worlds (known as ‘Brahmaands’) were embedded in each of the hairs of this all-encompassing, all-inclusive, vast and colossus form of the Supreme Lord, for the entire cosmos, the entire creation, is his cosmic form, forming his body<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 201)

चौ०. अगनित रबि ससि सिव चतुरानन । बहु गिरि सरित सिंधु महि कानन ॥ १ ॥

aganita rabi sasi siva caturānana. bahu giri sarita sindhu mahi kānana. 1.
kāla karma guna gyāna subhā'ū. sō'u dēkhā jō sunā na kā'ū. 2.

[Now we shall read what an astonishingly wondrous form of Lord Ram, whom Kaushalya thought was her son, she saw before her eyes.]

She saw a marvelous sight of uncountable suns, moons, Shivas and Brahmas (“caturānana”) (in the sky of these universes), along with innumerable earths (mortal worlds) with as many mountains, rivers, oceans and forests on it. (1)

Similarly, she saw countless Kaals (phases of time; periods, eras and epochs), Karma (deeds done by living beings), Gunas (qualities and virtues that exist in the world, and which combine in countless permutations and combinations to determine the kaleidoscopic nature of the character of this mysterious world), Gyan (knowledge which so infinite that the more one seems to learn the more he has yet to know), Swabhaav (a creature’s nature, instincts and inclinations)—the sight she saw was so mysterious and magical like no one has ever seen it or heard of it anywhere anytime. (2)

देखी माया सब बिधि गाढ़ी । अति सभीत जोरें कर ठाढ़ी ॥ ३ ॥

देखा जीव नचावड़ जाही । देखी भगति जो छोरड़ ताही ॥ ४ ॥

dēkhī māyā saba bidhi gāṛhī. ati sabhīta jōrēm kara ṭhārḥī. 3.
dēkhā jīva nacāva'i jāhī. dēkhī bhagati jō chōra'i tāhī. 4.

She saw that ‘Maya’ (the personified form of the Supreme Being’s Shakti or powers that create delusions)—which assumes a grave and uncompromising attitude in its dealings with the world, is fearless and reckless in her demeanours, and is an undeniably invincible force to reckon with in this creation (because it is directly empowered by the Supreme Being, because it has direct access to the Lord, and is so powerful and effective that it keeps even the most able gods and the wisest of living beings such as great sages, seers and hermits held captive in its vice-like grip of delusions)—was standing before the Lord obediently and humbly with joined hands (as a token of submissiveness and ready to take orders from the Lord). (3)

She saw that countless ‘Jivas’ (living beings) are being made to dance to the tune of (i.e. obey the dictates of) this Maya. Only those Jivas who have ‘Bhakti’ in them (i.e. have devotion for the Lord God in their hearts; here obviously referring to those who have Bhakti for Lord Ram as he is a personified form of the Supreme Being whose Viraat or cosmic form is being described here) are spared by this Maya. [To wit, though the entire living world is under the spell of Maya, those who have devotion for the Lord God are free from its grip.] (4)

तन पुलकित मुख बचन न आवा । नयन मूदि चरननि सिरु नावा ॥ ५ ॥
बिसमयवंत देखि महतारी । भए बहुरि सिसुरूप खरारी ॥ ६ ॥

tana pulakita mukha bacana na āvā. nayana mūdi caranani siru nāvā. 5.
bisamayavanta dēkhi mahatārī. bha'ē bahuri sisurūpa kharārī. 6.

When Kaushalya saw this magical and marvelous sight, her body was thrilled, and she was completely dumbfounded, being unable to utter a single word. So dazed was she that she closed her eyes and bowed her head before this divine cosmic form of the Supreme Lord<sup>1</sup>. (5)

When the Lord, who is known as ‘kharārī’ (a reference to Lord Ram vanquishing the demon named Khar)<sup>2</sup>, saw that the mother was sore affright and utterly perplexed, he withdrew his magical charm and reverted to his former form as a child<sup>3</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When Sati had seen a similar sight, she too was so dazed and out of her wits that she sat down on the ground, dizzy in her head as she swooned and things seemed to go around in circles for her, making her feel as if she was suffering from a bout of severe vertigo or hallucination—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 55.

<sup>3</sup>Later on in the story we shall witness a similar incident when Lord Ram has shown Kaagbhusund his cosmic form. When the purpose was served, the Lord reverted to his form as a child playing with the crow named Kaagbhusund—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 82 along with Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes it.]

अस्तुति करि न जाइ भय माना । जगत पिता मैं सुत करि जाना ॥ ७ ॥
हरि जननी बहुबिधि समुझाई । यह जनि कतहुँ कहसि सुनु माई ॥ ८ ॥ astuti kari na jā'i bhaya mānā. jagata pitā maim suta kari jānā. 7.

hari janani bahubidhi samujhāī. yaha jani katahum kahasi sunu māī. 8.

The mother (Kaushalya) was so dazed and terrified that she could not even gather her wits to pray to the Lord (even after she realized who her son Ram actually was)—because she was numbed with regret to have been so foolish as to imagine that that ‘the Father of this creation was her child’<sup>1</sup>! (7)

Meanwhile, seeing the dilemma of Kaushalya and her fears, Lord Hari (i.e. Lord Ram, for he was a manifestation of Lord Vishnu, one of whose names is ‘Hari’) explained to the mother everything (assuring her that there was nothing to worry or fear, that everything was fine, that he had willingly done this small trick to alert her, and nothing more is to be made out of it).

Then the Lord requested her to keep this incident secret, between the two of them; he told her: ‘Oh mother, please keep this under wraps, and don’t tell anybody about it.’<sup>2</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>We ought to recall that it is the same thought that had confounded Satrupa when she was asking the Supreme Being to bless her with a boon that he would become her son—the question ‘how can the Father of this creation become her son?’ {Apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-7 that precede Doha no. 150.}

<sup>2</sup>Why did the Lord want to keep this magical event, when he had revealed his true cosmic form to Kaushalya, a secret? Well, if the demons came to know that the Supreme Being has come down personally in the form of Lord Ram to eliminate them, it was sure they would go hide somewhere to avoid him, and the result would be that the whole exercise of the Lord taking the trouble to come down to earth to get rid of the demons would be made void. We shall read later on that Ravana has some doubts in this matter of the Supreme Being taking the form of Lord Ram, and he was determined to find it out the hard way—by waging a war with the Lord. For he concluded that if Lord Ram was indeed the Supreme Being as it seems to be the case to him, then it would be a great honour to die fighting with the Lord as this death would grant him (Ravana) deliverance and emancipation, and in case Ram was an ordinary human being, so far and good, Ravana would vanquish him and keep his wife Sita as his concubine. This is absolutely clearly stated in Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 23.

Hence, it was absolutely necessary and prudent to keep the Lord’s identity a top secret.]

However, finally Kaushalya got her with together and prayed to the Lord by joining the palms of her hands in a submissive way, saying: 'Oh my Lord, please grant me leave that your powerful Maya (delusions) never casts its shadow on me in future.'<sup>1</sup> (Doha no. 202)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Kaushalya puts the ball in the court of Lord Ram by asking him to instruct his Maya not to disturb her again in future. Kaushalya was very wise in this respect, because she knew how powerful Maya was, and it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to fend off its tricks if she depends on her own abilities to do so, so it she decided that it would be far better for her to give the responsibility of protection from Maya's evil influence to the Lord of the Maya himself, i.e. Lord Ram, now that she had realized that the Lord was not her son but the Supreme Being himself.

This would free her mind from a lot of problems and worries, and she meanwhile would be able to enjoy the blessing she had so fortunately got to shower her motherly affection and love on the Lord, without any strings attached or the fear of falling into some new trap of delusions in the future.]

The many kinds of playful acts and lovable behaviour of Lord Hari (i.e. Lord Ram, who was a manifestation of Lord Vishnu, one of whose many names is 'Hari') that he indulged in as a child provided immense delight to his servants.

[To wit, Lord Ram performed many enjoyable and cheerful deeds as a child playing around with his usual pranks which gave immense joy and happiness to the servants of the royal palace; they thoroughly enjoyed the playful activities of the child Ram.]<sup>1</sup> (1)

Some pleasant time passed in this manner while the four brothers grew up, all the while providing cheer and happiness to all those who were around them, such as their relatives (parents and other family members), as well as other members of the royal household<sup>2</sup>. (2)

<sup>2</sup>Refer also to Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse nos. 25-26, 30-33, 36.

Lord Ram's childhood plays that enthralled the heart of his devotees can also be judged by sage Kaagbhusund's personal experiences as narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Doha no. 77 along with Chaupai line nos. 8-10 that precede it;

(ii) Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 79; (iii) Doha no. 88 along with Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede it.]

cūrākarana kīnha guru jā'ī. bipranha puni dachinā bahu pā'ī. 3.
parama manōhara carita apārā. karata phirata cārī'u sukumārā. 4.

When the appropriate time came, the family priest and guru (i.e. sage Vasistha) went to perform the ritual of shaving the hairs on the head of the four princes, a ritual called 'cūrākarana'<sup>1</sup>. On that occasion, Brahmins got a lot of donation as charity. (3)

The four young princes went around doing many kinds of charming deeds that were very pleasant and captivating to behold by all those who witnessed them as these activities gladdened their hearts.

[To wit, the four princes roamed about doing many enchanting deeds that spread cheer and happiness all around.] (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The “cūrākarana” is a Hindu ritual whereby a child's head is shaved for the first time after birth; this shaving can be complete by shearing off all the hairs on the scalp, leaving only a short tuft on the back, or many times done in a symbolic manner by just pruning the long curly strands of hairs and reducing them to a short crop on the scalp.

This rite is usually done when the child is between 3-5 years of age.

Earlier we have read (in Doha no. 195, and verse no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 197) that the festivities associated with the birth of the four princes seemed to last for one full month. During this period, the rituals associated with naming of the new-born as well as his shaving-of-the-hair were performed by the royal priest, sage Vasistha. On the occasion of the 'naming ceremony', king Dasrath had sent a messenger to summon the sage (verse no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 197), but here we read that the sage had taken the initiative to visit the palace to perform the second rite of shaving of the hair of the children. The probable reason is that king Dasrath had all but forgotten about observing formalities and performing rites, so much submerged he was in the ocean of joy and happiness that overwhelmed him with the birth of four divine sons in his household. Hence, his royal priest decided to step in, as it was his moral duty to ensure that the king, his patron, does not deviate from standard practices as ordained by the scriptures, for if the priest hesitated and did not carry out his responsibilities as required of him conscientiously and faithfully, he would be deemed to have committed an irresponsible act which would make him guilty of misconduct and unrighteousness, as well as give him a bad name of being negligent and careless.]

That Lord (i.e. the Supreme Being) who is beyond the reach of the mind, who cannot be accessed by making physical efforts, who cannot be described by the means of speech and words, and who cannot be perceived by the sense organs of perception of a creature—that same transcendental Lord moves around the courtyard of king Dasrath (as the Lord feels obliged to fulfill the desire of his devotee, even if it means to assume a gross body such as that of a human being as the Lord did in the present case when he became a son of king Dasrath)<sup>1</sup>. (5)

When his father, king Dasrath, sat down for his meals and called him (i.e. Lord Ram) to come and eat something, the Lord would not come because he was enjoying the company of his friends. (6)

When his mother Kaushalya would go to fetch him, the Lord would run away as fast as he could, toddling and stumbling, trying to avoid her<sup>2</sup>. (7)

<sup>2</sup>This enthralling scene that captivates the mind would be best enjoyed if we just close our eyes and see it unfold on the canvass of our imagination.

When king Dasrath sat down for his meals, he would call out to child Ram to come near and eat some morsel of food according to his liking. But Ram would not come as he was engaged in playing some game with his brothers and other friends. So, Dasrath would ask queen Kaushalya to go and fetch the child. When Lord Ram saw his mother coming hither to catch him, he would give a shrill cry to indicate that he does not want to leave the game and his companions, but finding that the mother was determined to take him to his father, the naughty boy would suddenly make a dash to run away from her as fast as his little legs would carry him, laughing loudly and giving out a loud yell of mirth, even as he toddled, stumbled and fell down in an attempt to escape, only to get up quickly and make a fresh attempt to avoid the clutch of his mother who was pursuing him from close behind, and then they would run around the courtyard for sometime before the mother finally overtook him and lifted him in her arms, to the immense amusement and joy of king Dasrath and all others who were in attendance at the time and watched this enchanting scene being enacted.]

The fascinating sight of the little child Ram playing around in the courtyard, toddling and stumbling in an attempt to walk, with pleasant sound emanating from the tiny bells tied to the anklets and bracelets that he wore around his ankles and wrists, the astounding beauty of his form attired in charming clothes and adorned with magnificent ornaments, and how lovely he looked as he sat on the lap of his father

dhūsara dhūri bharēm tanu ā'ē. bhūpati bihasi gōda baiṭhā'ē. 9.

Verily indeed, it is such an enchanting sight to behold that the Lord whom the Vedas fail to describe fully, and so they simply say 'Neti-Neti' about him<sup>1</sup>, and even Lord Shiva has acknowledged that he does not know the end of (the story of) the Lord as the Lord is infinite<sup>2</sup>—the mother (Kaushalya) rushes forward to catch hold of the same Lord (i.e. Ram, a manifestation of Brahm, the Supreme Being, who has become a child)! (8)

Finally, when the mother managed to catch hold of child Ram and bring him to king Dasrath, the Lord's body was covered in dust (as he had been playing with his friends). However, king Dasrath lifted the child and sat him affectionately on his lap. (9)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The Vedas, which are not only repositories of all knowledge but also experts in grammar and language which gives them the ability to expound upon even the most complex and esoteric of concepts and philosophies pertaining to creation and its varied mysteries, as well as on the subject of metaphysics, theology and spiritualism, have however failed to describe the Supreme Being in entirety. So after countless attempts and many ways to try to present a comprehensive picture of the Lord and describe who he is, they finally surrendered by acknowledging their limitations in this regard by declaring "Neti-Neti", meaning literally 'not this-not this'. To wit, the Vedas say that the many things they have proposed and expounded upon with respect to understanding the nature and form and character and qualities and virtues of the Supreme Being are all only a fraction of the Great Truth, but while they are correct and true within their limited sphere of meaning, yet they do not mean to be an exhaustive, exclusive and comprehensive narration of the nature of the Lord, for much is left to be said and known which is beyond our ability.

In the context of the concept of the phrase 'Neti-Neti', refer to: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, (i) Doha no. 12; (ii) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 216; (iii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 341; (b) Ayodhya Kand, (iv) Chaupai line nos. 708 that precede Doha no. 93; (v) Sortha no. 126; (c) Aranya Kand, (vi) Chaupai line no. 11 that precedes Doha no. 27; (d) Kishkindha Kand, (vii) Chanda line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 10; (e) Lanka Kand, (viii) Doha no. 117-a; (f) Uttar Kand, (ix) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 124; and (x) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 216.

In the Upanishads we come across many instances of the use of the phrase 'Neti-Neti' with reference to Brahm—viz. (a) Shukla Yajur Veda's Brihad Aranyaka Upanishad, 2/3/6, 4/2/4, 4/4/32. (b) Krishna Yajur Veda's Tejobindu Upanishad, Cantos 4-5, and verse nos. 1-29 of Canto 6; Varaaha Upanishad, Canto 2, verse no. 68.

In the context of Lord Ram being eternal, without a beginning and an end, and whose glory and divinity is being sung by the Vedas, Lord Shiva, Seshnath and goddess Saraswati, because he is Brahm, the cosmic Consciousness, personified, refer to: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, (i) Doha no. 12 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that follow it; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 108; (iii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 109; (iv) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 114; (v) Chaupai line nos. 5-6, 8 that precede Doha no. 116; (vi) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 118; (vii) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 119; (viii) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 120; (ix) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 121; (b) Uttar Kand, (x) Chanda line no. 21 that precedes Doha no. 13; (xi) Doha no. 85-a.

<sup>2</sup>Refer to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 114; and (ii) Doha no. 118 along with Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede it where Lord Shiva has himself acknowledged it.]

The childhood activities of the Lord (Sri Ram) were very simple and unpretentious (sarala), as well as sweet, charming and pleasant ("suhā'ē"; so much that they enthralled the mind and captivated the heart of one and all who witnessed them)<sup>1</sup>.

These acts of the Lord have been sung (gā'ē) by goddess Saraswati (sārada), Lord Seshnath ("sēṣa"; the celestial serpent with a thousand tongues), Lord Shiva (sambhu), and the Vedas (śruti). (1)

Say, those whose Mana (mind and heart) is not captivated and enthralled by this enchanting image of the Lord, verily indeed the Creator has made them very unfortunate by depriving them of this opportunity of being able to enjoy the happiness and delight that comes with it<sup>2</sup>.

[To wit, those whose hearts and minds are enthralled and captivated by the remembrance of the childhood acts of Lord Ram, a personified form of the Supreme Being, are indeed very fortunate and blessed, for otherwise they would have missed a great opportunity to enjoy the nectar of bliss and a feeling of beatitude that naturally comes with it.] (2)

When all the four brothers attained boyhood, they were given the 'Sacred Thread' by their teacher (sage Vasistha) and their parents (3).

Thereafter, they went to sage Vasistha's hermitage for education, and in a short time they mastered all knowledge.

[To wit, after their initiation ceremony when the four princes were given the sacred thread by their guru, the royal priest sage Vasistha, they went to study at his hermitage. The princes quickly learnt all that was taught to them; they became experts sooner than expected.]<sup>1</sup> (4).

What a wonder it is that Sri Hari (a term used for Lord Vishnu who had manifested as Lord Ram), whose breath is the reservoir of all the four Vedas, should study like an ordinary child!<sup>2</sup> (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precedes Doha no. 26 where a similar idea is expressed.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Vishnu is regarded in the Purans as the Supreme Being. Lord Ram is an incarnation of Vishnu. The Vedas are the primary scriptures and a repository of all available knowledge in existence. Being the Supreme Lord of creation, Vishnu is obviously the one who must have created even the Vedas. These scriptures are called his 'breath' because originally the Vedas used to be chanted and transmitted orally—hence the reference to the 'breath', because speaking is also done through the same windpipe by which one breathes, and also because only a man who breathes can speak, and therefore recite and teach the Vedas. 'Breath' is metaphor for life. Since Ram is an incarnation of Lord Vishnu, Tulsidas expresses his astonishment that the Lord had to pass through the normal process of education and learning the Vedas though he is the one who had created these scriptures.

Some confusion may arise here as according to traditional belief, the Vedas were created by Brahma, the creator of the world and the first god of the Trinity. But then it must also not be forgotten that this Brahma had himself emerged sitting atop a lotus flower that sprouted from the navel of Lord Vishnu as he reclined on the coiled body of the celestial serpent known as Seshnath who floated on the surface of Kshirsagar, the primordial ocean of milk. Obviously it means that Vishnu had created Brahma. So, who was Vishnu? When Brahm, the Supreme Being representing the cosmic Consciousness, decided to initiate the process of creation, he thought over the issues that he faced and the gigantic nature of the task he was about to undertake. Contemplating seriously on the matter, Brahm concluded that the best way was to divide the entire work into three parts—creation, sustenance, and conclusion. This methodology would make it easier for him to control the wheel he was about to set rolling.

Besides that, there was another problem. Brahm, representing cosmic Consciousness, had no form, was without attributes, was invisible, subtle and all-pervading, whereas the world he envisioned to create would have to have visibility, a form and a character. That would in turn entail putting into place a mechanism to tackle the nitty-gritty affairs of what was to come.

Hence, Brahm decided to first lay the foundation of the structure he planned to raise—and therefore created the three gods of the Trinity by transforming himself into Brahma the creator, Vishnu the sustainer, and Shiva, the concluder of creation. This was the first instance of the principle of ‘delegation of authority’ with clear-cut areas of function marked for these three Authorities of creation. This would ensure smooth running of the affairs of creation, without overlapping and confusion that may later on get so tangled up that a colossal mess and hotchpotch would result.

So, though it is said that the Vedas were created by Brahma, the first of the Trinity gods, the reality is that they were actually created by the Supreme Being known as Brahm who had assumed three roles as Brahma, Vishnu and Shiva at the beginning of creation, with Brahm himself assuming the central controlling authority in the entire setup by becoming Lord Vishnu.

Now, Lord Ram was a manifestation of Brahm as is repeatedly affirmed in Ram Charit Manas, and Brahm, in his role as Brahma, had created the Vedas. Hence, it is correct to say that “the Vedas are Lord Ram’s breath” in as much as he was the creator of these scriptures like the rest of creation in his primary form as Brahm.]

The four brothers (Lord Ram, Laxman, Bharat and Shatrughan) were well versed in all forms of knowledge one was expected to acquire, were endowed with the noble qualities of politeness, courteousness and decorum, and were epitomes of all auspicious virtues and characters.

They proficiently played games befitting young princes who would learn in this playful way the different arts and skills (such as martial arts, diplomacy and administrative skills, justice and compassion, all going hand in hand), and all such manners of things, that would prepare them to be great king in the future.

[To wit, the four princes played ‘princely games’, and not ordinary games like other boys of their age would play. This was an established method to train young princes for their future role as kings which they would have to assume one day.]<sup>1</sup> (6)

In their hands bows and arrows looked magnificent. Their charming and enchanting image captivated and enthralled the entire world consisting of animate beings and inanimate things<sup>2</sup>. (7)

In whichever street or lane of the city the four brothers went to roam about, the common citizens were held in thrall by their august presence in their midst. To wit, the people were so delighted at the sight that they stood still and gazed at the four lovable boys as their sight mesmerized them and filled their hearts with excess of joy<sup>3</sup>. (8)

When the two brothers went for sight-seeing in the city, and as soon as the news spread about their visit, the whole city poured out onto the streets. Men and children flocked them, surrounding them from all sides, and the women filled the balconies and terraces of their homes to have a glimpse of the two divine brothers. The merciful, compassionate and gracious Lord Ram (rāma kṛpāla) was treated very dearly by all the citizens of Ayodhya, the males and the females, the old and the young—for all of them held the Lord as dear to them as their own lives<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 204)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>We witness a similar event when king Janak meets Lord Ram—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 215—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 217.

And later on we shall read that all those whom Lord Ram met on his way to the forest were equally overjoyed by meeting the Lord, so much so that while the Lord stayed and conversed with them they were ecstatic with joy, and when he had gone away then those whom he met would remember him most affectionately for all times to come—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 89; (ii) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 109—to Doha no. 122.

In the last chapter of Ram Charit Manas there are many instances where we read that the citizens of Ayodhya loved their king very dearly for they were all happy and contented under his rule, and the city was prosperous and beautiful—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 25; (ii) Doha no. 26; (iii) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 27—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 31; and (iv) Doha no. 47 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede it.

It is an obvious fact that when the subjects are fully contented and taken care of by a king, it is but natural for them to not only love but also be absolutely devoted and loyal to that particular king. This was the case with the relationship that existed between Lord Ram and the citizens of Ayodhya.]

Lord Ram would call his brothers and friends, and accompanied by them he would go to the royal forest almost daily to play the game of hunting<sup>1</sup>. (1)

The Lord shot only those animals whom he perceived to be pure in their souls (explained below in the next verse)<sup>2</sup>, and he brought them back home to show to the king (to show his father that he is a skilled archer and a good shooter who would aim perfectly while riding a horse at full gallop, because these skills were needed in a king of the era when horse-riding, archery and perfect aim with a bow and an arrow while on a galloping horse were the essential ingredients for success in wars). (2)

Those animals who were killed by Lord Ram (during hunting) would find emancipation and salvation when their Atma (soul) left their gross body upon being killed, whereby finding liberation from the trap of the gross body in which the Atma was caught, and this granted that individual animal the spiritual reward of deliverance from the gross world and the cycle of transmigration<sup>3</sup>. (3)

<sup>2</sup>Lord Ram would not kill at random just for the pleasure of killing wild animals during hunting courses. The Lord selected only those creatures who were pious and holy from inside, but due to some unfortunate events in their previous life they had to become an animal. Such creatures yearned for liberation and deliverance from the body of an animal so that their pure ‘self’, i.e. their Atma or soul, could find eternal peace.

When the news spread that the Supreme Being has come down to earth as Lord Ram with the main purpose of granting deliverance to those who were unnecessarily trapped in a sinful body, these animals migrated from far away places to come and live in the forests around Ayodhya in the hope that they would be granted liberation from their animal-body by Lord Ram by killing them during his hunting trips, so that they can find deliverance from the horrors of life as an animal.

The idea expressed herein above finds support when we examine the story of Ravana, the demon king. We have already read that in his previous life he was a noble king named Pratapbhanu, but unfortunately the latter was cursed to become a demon for no fault of his. As the demon king Ravana, the soul of Pratapbhanu surely yearned for deliverance, and this could only be realized when that demon-body would die. Since this was only possible if the Supreme Being himself killed him, so Lord Ram had to travel all the way to Lanka to deliver Ravan’s soul from the trap of a demonic body.

To wit, this “killing” was a blessing in disguise for such creatures, for it granted them instant deliverance, emancipation and salvation for which they would have to wait for a long time till death would make it possible for them, and during this long waiting time they would have to suffer all the ills and pains and fears that are inherent to life in this gross physical world. There were fair chances also that during this long interval they might commit some kind of sin, even inadvertently, but that would prevent their deliverance at the time of natural death. All these uncertainties were taken care of when their souls were granted liberation from their gross body of an animal by getting killed at the hands of Lord Ram.

<sup>3</sup>During the war of Lanka too, all the demons who died while fighting Lord Ram got liberation and deliverance—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 45; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 7, 9-10 that precede Doha no. 115.

Even the demon king Ravana and his brother Kumbhakaran found emancipation and salvation for themselves and deliverance of their respective souls when they were killed by Lord Ram in battles—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede Doha no. 71 (Kumbhakaran); (ii) Chaupai line nos. 3-9 that precede Doha no. 103 (Ravana).]

After returning home from playing outside with his brothers and friends<sup>1</sup>, Lord Ram would take his meals in their company<sup>2</sup>.

He (Lord Ram) would always be obedient to his parents; he did what they instructed him to do, and requested their permission before doing anything on his own initiative. (4)

In whatever manner the citizens of the city (of Ayodhya) would get joy and happiness, the Lord would always devise ways or contrive means to make things happen that way<sup>3</sup>. (5)

He would listen attentively to the discourses on scriptures such as the Vedas and the Purans, and then explain their meanings and intricacies to his younger brothers<sup>4</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 1 that follows Doha no. 204 herein above; and (b) Uttar Kand, (ii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 26 later on when Lord Ram ascended the throne of Ayodhya as its King-Emperor.

The same idea is expressed in Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 46.

<sup>2</sup>Lord would invite all his brothers and friends to join him for meals. This shows how friendly and affable he was, having no trace of pride or ego or harbouring any sense of superiority complex that he was the senior-most prince and must keep a respectable distance with others junior to him. This was the primary reason why Lord had endeared himself to the masses, both in his own country as well as all those whom he met during his long journey through the forest.

<sup>3</sup>Later on in our reading of the story, when we come to its last chapter, we shall read that there was all-round happiness and prosperity in Ayodhya after Lord Ram returned from the forest and ascended the throne to become a King-Emperor. In all these instances we find that Lord Ram would regularly discourse on matters of importance with respect to proper conduct, morality, ethics, righteousness, spiritualism, metaphysics, religion, and all other such matters that would serve as guidelines for his brothers and the subjects of his kingdom, helping them to improve the quality of their lives and become excellent human beings.

To wit, for all practical purposes, Lord Ram was not merely a king for them, but their teacher, guide and preceptor too.]

āyasu māgi karahiṁ pura kājā. dēkhi carita haraṣa'i mana rājā. 8.

[Setting an example of excellent character for others—] He (Lord Ram) would get up early in the morning and bowed his head to his parents (father Dasrath and mother Kaushalya) as well as to his guru (sage Vasistha) to offer his respects to them the first thing in the morning. (7)

Then, the Lord would seek their permission and instructions to carry out his royal duties as a prince of the kingdom (on behalf of the king, his father Dasrath)<sup>1</sup>.

This ideal and dutiful conduct, the disciplined and righteous behaviour, and the diligence and fastidiousness of the Lord mightily pleased them (i.e. his parents and guru). (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It was but natural that when the princes became adult, the king would gradually hand over the routine affairs of the kingdom, such as administration, justice, diplomacy, army, and the rest, to them. He would assign different tasks to them on a rotational basis so that they are trained in a practical manner and gain a first-hand experience in all the different spheres of the affairs of the kingdom.

Both the parents as well as the guru of Lord Ram were pleased and satisfied to find that he was living up to their expectation.]

{Now we shall move onto the second half of this first Chapter of Ram Charit Manas called the 'Baal Kand'; it narrates the next phase of this magnificent story of Lord Ram. There was a great sage named Vishwamitra. Demons used to defile his fire sacrifice. So the sage decided to come and take Lord Ram and his younger brother

Laxman to his hermitage in order to prevent the demons from creating nuisance for him. From here starts the journey for which the Supreme Being had come down to earth as Lord Ram—because the slaying of the demons would start immediately after the sage left Ayodhya with the two brothers and was attacked by a female demon named Tadka. A little while later, the huge army of demons, led by Marich and Subahu, which comes to destroy the fire sacrifice of the sage, was eliminated by Lord Ram. While Subahu was killed, Marich was flung off to a far-away island in the middle of the ocean.

Then we shall read in detail about all the interesting developments that took place—including the breaking of the mighty Bow by Lord Ram which entitled him to marry Sita, the princess of Janakpur, and the subsequent angry intervention by sage Parashuram, who was mightily annoyed by the breaking of the Bow as it belonged to Lord Shiva, his revered deity, and so he came rushing in to punish the person who had broken that Bow, and the way he vented his ire on Lord Ram and Laxman before calming down and going back crestfallen when he realized that all his efforts to punish the Lord for breaking the Bow was in vain because he was not an ordinary human prince but Lord Vishnu himself in that form, as well as the fact that the sage's revered deity, Lord Shiva, too worshipped Lord Ram.

Lord Ram's other three brothers too got married at the same venue, and to the sisters and cousins of Sita. There were a lot of festivities in Janakpur during that auspicious occasion, and we read in detail everything about how the marriage was solemnized on a grand scale.

The Chapter ends with the grooms' party returning to Ayodhya from Janakpur with the four brides, a brief description of rituals and celebrations in the city, and the departure of sage Vishwamitra to go back to his hermitage.

All these events are narrated from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 206—to Doha no. 361.

This part of the story has also been described in Tulsidas' "Geetawali Ramayan", Baal Kand, verse nos. 47—110.}

The story of Lord Ram from his birth till the time he grew up to reach the age of adolescence has been narrated (sung) by me till now. Whatever happened next will be narrated by me now. Please pay attention to it<sup>1</sup>. (1)

There was a great learned sage named Vishwamitra. He lived in a hermitage in the forest as that place was auspicious, peaceful, serene and generally compatible for his spiritual pursuits<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The primary narrator of Lord Ram's story is Lord Shiva, and he is telling the story to his consort Parvati when she expressed her eagerness to hear the Lord's divine story from beginning to end. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from

Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 107—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 110.

The episodes relating to the arrival of the learned sage Vishwamitra to take Lord Ram and his brother Laxman with him to the forest to protect his fire sacrifice from being defiled by demons, and the subsequent events when the sage took the two brothers to Janakpur, the city of king Janak, the father of Sita, the breaking of the strong bow of Shiva by Lord Ram that culminated in the marriage of Lord Ram with Sita, and also of his other three brothers Laxman, Bharat and Shatrughan with Sita's sister and cousins, and the final celebrations at Ayodhya, the capital of Lord Ram and his father Dasrath, constitute the second part of the narration. It is in answer to the Parvati's fourth query—'please tell me how Janki (Sita) was married to Lord Ram.' Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, 1st half of Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 110.

Tulsidas has stressed that one should listen to the divine story 'with attention'. Obviously, if one does not pay attention one would not enjoy the nectar that it contains. For instance, when one enjoys the taste and smell of the food served, the body digests is better than when one eats with disgust and forcefully just to fill his stomach. Tulsidas has said that "those who sing the episode of Lord Ram's marriage with due devotion, affection and attention will always have auspiciousness and joy in their lives—because the glory of Lord Ram is inherently a provider of happiness and bliss as well as the best of spiritual virtues one can expect to possess." Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 361.

Arrival of sage Vishwamitra to take Lord Ram and Laxman with him to his hermitage to protect his fire sacrifice has been narrated beautifully in Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse nos. 47-56.

Vishwamitra was a great sage and a leader of other sages who lived in the forest. He was a 'great sage' as well as a 'Gyani' as he had learnt to practice self control over his senses; he had conquered anger and desires; any kind of sorrow or misery never disturbed his peace of mind and heart, nor did the sage had any wish for worldly pleasures and comforts.

The word 'Gyani' means one knows; who is self-realised and knows the truth of everything. He is a man of wisdom and erudition. People look towards him for guidance and example. He had done severe Tapa (austerity and penance) which entitled him to attain the stature of a learned Brahmin though he was born as a Kshatriya, the warrior class.

His name is very remarkable. "Vishwaa-mitra" has two connotations. One is that he is a friend of the whole world (Mitra = friend; Vishwa = the world). Another meaning is that his communion makes a man dispassionate and detached towards the world and its material charms (Vishwa = world; A-mitra = to be unfriendly towards). A person who keeps his company realises the futility of this mortal world and its transient and perishable nature, and therefore develops detachment from it.

His hermitage was an oasis of peace and had a divine aura about it. The area was known as 'Siddha-shram'—the place where mystics and hermits lived. It was located in the geographical area known as Buxar in Magadh that falls in modern-day Bihar state of India. It was here that Lord Vaaman, the dwarf mendicant form of Lord Vishnu had once lived. Sages and hermits always lived in those parts of forests that were compatible for their spiritual pursuit. These places were usually away from the hustle and bustle of city life, but at the same time were well endowed with the basic necessities of life such as water in the form of rivers or lakes, abundant fruit trees, greenery and rich vegetation.

Regarding his lineage, the sage has himself told Lord Ram when the latter enquired about his family line that “there was a great king named Kush who was the son of Brahma, the creator. He had four sons. The second son was named Kushnaabha. He had done a fire sacrifice to get a son. This produced a famous son by the name of Gaadhi. He was a very religious man. Vishwamitra was his son. Since the sage was born in the clan of king Kush, he is also known by the name of Kaushik.” Refer: Valmiki Ramayan, 1/33/3; 1/34/1, 5, 6.

Vishwamitra further told Lord Ram “my elder sister was named Satyawati, and she was married to sage Richeek. She went (ascended) to heaven with the physical body. A great river is named after her; it is called Kaushiki. My natural habitat is in the valley of the Himalayas, but I came to this particular place for doing the fire sacrifice.” Refer: Valmiki Ramayan, 1/34/12.

Earlier his name was Vishwarath, but when he had attained the exalted stature of Brahm-rishi, i.e. the level that is equivalent to Brahma, he began to be known as Vishwamitra.

There is an interesting story regarding his birth as narrated in Bhagwat, 9/15/8-9, and Vishnu Puran, 4/7. The story in brief is as follows—

Once, Satyawati and her mother approached sage Richeek with a request to provide them a herbal concoction that will help them get sons. Richeek sanctified two helpings of porridge with son-begetting Mantras, and gave each of them one helping with clear instructions that they should eat the one given to them, and not mix things up. Then the sage went away to take his bath. The jealous mother thought that the sample of porridge that the sage gave to Satyawati was better and more powerful, she prevailed upon her daughter to swap the samples with the argument “Daughter, everyone likes that his own son be better, and no one is interested in the brother of the wife. So, take my sample and give me yours, because my son will have to look after the whole world as he would be a Kshatriya king, while you are the wife of a sage (Richeek) and so your son will not require the powers and majesty that are needed to take care of the world. As a sage’s son, he will be contented with leading an austere life of Tapa and Yoga.”

So, the mother and daughter swapped the porridge. When Richeek came to know of this, he was very upset and accosted his wife Satyawati, telling her that she has done a very inappropriate thing. Now, her son would be a great warrior, and her brother (her mother’s son) would be a renowned sage of the stature of Brahma-rishi. When Satyawati pleaded with him to forgive her, the sage told her that now it cannot be rectified. However, though her son would be a brave warrior, the grandson would be great sage. Meanwhile, her mother’s son (her brother) became a great sage though he was born as a Kshatriya because his father was Gaadhi.

Vishwamitra was an angry man; he used to curse fluently. He had a hundred sons. It was he who had tested king Harishchandra’s steadfastness for truth and vows. He had great mystical powers so much so that he was able to attain the exalted stature of a Brahma-rishi though he was born a Kshatriya. This story is as follows—

Once he gathered a huge army and went to the forest to hunt. There, he stayed in the hermitage of sage Vasistha who had a magical cow known as ‘Kamdhenu’ which had the mystical power to give anything one wishes. Vasistha fed the entire army and made arrangements for their comfort on the strength of this cow.

Vishwamitra eyed the cow because he thought that she was more useful for a king than a hermit or a sage. When Vasistha refused to give her, Vishwamitra tried force, but was utterly defeated. All his sons were killed except one. Vishwamitra handed over the charge of the kingdom to him and went to do Tapa to acquire powers so that he can get the Kamdhenu from Vasistha. As a result of the Tapa he acquired great weapons from Lord Shiva, but again failed to snatch the Kamdhenu from Vasistha. Ashamed, he did severe Tapa once again to attain the exalted stature of a Brahma-rishi, a stature that Vasistha already possessed. To wreck vengeance upon Vasistha, he had cursed the latter's sons and reduced them to ashes. Later on, however, the two sages became friends when one day Vasistha heard that Vishwamitra has great respect for his Brahmin-hood and spiritual powers. Refer: Valmiki Ramayan, Sarga 51—65.

He is the Rishi (the wise and enlightened sage or seer who conceptualized and preached) of the entire 3rd Mandal of the Rig Veda. 501 Richas (hymns) of this Mandal are directly attributed to him, and the rest to his disciples.

Along with sages Vasistha and Valmiki, he is the most famous sage who played a pivotal role in the life of Lord Ram. It was Vishwamitra who had taken Lord Ram and Laxman to protect his fire sacrifice from being defiled by the demons. It was when Lord Ram went with him that he first encountered the demons, and had killed the demoness Tadka and the demon Subhahu while flinging the demon Marich far away into the middle of the ocean. Sage Gautam's wife Ahilya was also liberated by the Lord during this trip with Vishwamitra. The sage took the Lord and Laxman to the marriage ceremony of Sita where the Lord had broken the sturdy bow of Lord Shiva and married her. All the four brothers were married on the occasion.

There is a famous story in Nadishukta (Rig Veda, 3/33) that he once prayed to rivers Vipaat and Shutudri (the modern rivers Beas and Sutlej of Punjab state of India) to part and give him a way when robbers were pursuing him.

He has been mentioned as a great sage in a number of Vedic literature—e.g. Aitareya Aaranyaka, 2/2/1; Taittiriya Samhita, 2/2/1/2; Kaushitaki Brahman, 15/1; Panchavinsha Brahman, 14/3/12.

In Rig Veda 1/24 there appears a story of Shunashshepa who was saved by sage Vishwamitra when he was about to be sacrificed in a Vedic sacrifice ritual. The sage adopted him as his son.

He is said to be Kshatriya king as mentioned in Nirukta 2/24, and Panchavinsha Brahman 21/12/2. He is believed to have been the son of king Gaadhi of Chandravansha. His earlier name was Vishwarath.

The story of sage Vishwamitra is narrated by sage Satanand to Lord Ram in the famous epic “Valmiki Ramayan”, in its Baal Kand, Canto 51, verse no. 17—to Canto 65, verse no. 29. Many interesting stories related to him are narrated, and one such story is that he had created a heaven for his patron king Trishanku, and his conflict with sage Vasistha and his ultimate elevation to the status of a Brahma-rishi, i.e. a sage who has acquired the highest stature which makes him equivalent to the stature of Brahm, the Supreme Being personified.

He is counted amongst the seven great celestial Rishis or sages. The greatest contribution of sage Vishwamitra was his creating the famous Gayatri Mantra dedicated to the Sun God. It is regarded as the greatest Mantra ever conceptualized and preached in the entire pantheon of Mantras.

He is the patron sage of the great Mantra known as ‘Brahm-Gayatri’.]

जहँ जप जग्य जोग मुनि करहीं । अति मारीच सुबाहुहि डरहीं ॥ ३ ॥

देखत जग्य निसाचर धावहिं । करहिं उपद्रव मुनि दुख पावहिं ॥ ४ ॥ jaham̐ japa jagya jōga muni karahīm. ati mārīca subāhuhi ḍarahīm. 3.

dēkhata jagya nisācara dhāvahīm. karahīm upadrava muni dukha pāvahīm. 4.

At that place (i.e. in the Sidhashram), sages and hermits used to pursue spiritual and religious way of life by doing Japa (repetition of the holy Mantras), Jagya (fire sacrifices) and Yoga (meditation). This scared the demons led by Marich and Subahu*<sup>1</sup>.

[*There is another way of interpreting this part of the verse. It may also mean—“The sages and hermits were immensely scared of the demons Marich and Subahu.”

By naming Marich first, the sage indicated that he was the elder brother, and Subahu was his younger sibling.] (3)

As soon as the demons saw the fire sacrifices being done, they rushed forward. They created all sorts of mischief and nuisance, which cause a lot of grief and misery for the sages<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>What was the reason for the demons being afraid of the sages performing fire sacrifices or doing Japa and Yoga? Well, they knew that if these sages succeeded in completing their spiritual practices then they would acquire great mystical powers which they would then use to eliminate the demons. The king of demons, Ravana of Lanka, has clearly instructed his chief commanders to ensure that these sages did not do fire sacrifices as the offering made during such exercises provide nourishment to the Gods who were eternal enemies of the demon race. So if the fire and other sacrifices were not allowed to take place, the Gods will be starved and become weak and emaciated. The weakened Gods would no longer pose any challenge to the demons. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 181 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 5-8.

Marich and Subahu were given the charge of the area where sage Vishwamitra and others did sacrifices. So, as soon as the demons saw smoke rising into the sky by the burning of the sacred fire and offerings made into it, they rushed and destroyed it. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 207; (ii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 210.

And why were the sages afraid of the demons? It was because these nasty demons did not allow them to pursue their spiritual and religious activity though the sages meant no harm to them.

<sup>2</sup>Three religious activities are mentioned in verse no. 3—viz. Japa, Yagya and Yoga. While Japa and Yoga are done silently, the Yagya cannot be hidden. This is because as soon as the sacred fire was lit while doing Yagya, smoke rose in the sky, and this alerted the demons. So, the sages were not so much afraid of the demons while doing either Japa or Yoga as when doing Yagya.

What was the mischief the demons do? They threw meat, faecal matter, blood etc. over the sacred fire, thereby defiling it.

The next question is why did the sages not curse the demons? The answer to this is that while undertaking religious activities they used to take a vow of practicing self-control over all their instincts and evil qualities. Becoming angry and cursing would be a sin while the fire sacrifice was being undertaken. So they did not curse the demons. However, this goodness of the sages had a negative impact on the senseless demons—they thought that the sages were afraid of them and that is why they did not curse.

Another reason is that if they did curse one or two of them, the rest of the demons would take revenge and attack them mercilessly, killing all of them.]

गाधितनय मन चिंता व्यापी । हरि बिनु मरहिं न निसिचर पापी ॥ ५ ॥
तब मुनिबर मन कीन्ह बिचारा । प्रभु अवतरेउ हरन महि भारा ॥ ६ ॥ gādhitanaya mana cintā byāpī. hari binu marahim na niscara pāpī. 5.

taba munibara mana kīnha bicārā. prabhu avatarē'u harana mahi bhārā. 6.

The son of Gaadhi (i.e. sage Vishwamitra) was overcome with worries. He decided that is not possible that the sinful demons would ever be killed without the help (intervention) of Lord Hari (Vishnu)<sup>1</sup>. (5)

Then the sage thought to himself that the Lord (Vishnu) has already taken birth to remove the burden of the earth<sup>2</sup>. [This was in the form of Lord Ram who was born in Ayodhya as a son to king Dasrath and his wife Kaushalya.] (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>As has been said above, Vishwamitra, the chief of the sages, was worried because he could not kill the demons by simply cursing them. If the sage cursed the demons, it will be sinful on his part. If he prayed to them not to disturb the sages, it is impossible that the demons will oblige. Therefore, there was only one solution—and it was to get Lord Vishnu to kill them. It will have to benefits—one, it will help rid the tyranny of the demons, and two, they will be liberated from their cursed body of a demon and their souls will find liberation and deliverance. This will prevent them from taking re-birth as a demon once again and continuing the horrors they perpetrate. It was not too difficult because the sage knew that Vishnu had taken birth as Lord Ram precisely for this purpose—to eliminate the demons. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that precede Doha no. 187.

See verse no. 6 below.

<sup>2</sup>When the demons had unleashed their reign of terror, mother Earth and other Gods led by the creator Brahma had prayed to Lord Vishnu to eliminate the demons and restore peace. The Lord had promised them that he will come down to earth as Lord Ram and take birth in the household of king Dasrath. This is because the Lord had to oblige him as he had done severe Tapa in his earlier life as Manu and had requested Lord Vishnu to become his son. So, this way, Lord Vishnu will be killing two birds with a single stone—the word given to Manu will be fulfilled and the prayers of the Gods will be answered. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 184—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 187.

A very interesting observation can be made here. The demons had been defiling the fire sacrifices and tormenting the sages for a long time, then why is it that Vishwamitra now thought of inviting Lord Hari (Ram) to kill and eliminate the demons? Well, the obvious answer is that things are to be done at the proper time; one must not rush things along as it will be more harmful than producing any beneficial results. Though Lord Vishnu had taken birth as Lord Ram but it took him say 14-16 years to grow up to become an adolescent. After all, Lord Ram was in a human form and was obliged to follow all the norms set by the creator for the human race. The Lord could not perform miracles as it would alert the demons that Vishnu has finally arrived to get rid of them. Then, the demons would have taken remedial action—they would either go and hide somewhere, or even fall at the feet of Lord Ram begging for forgiveness. In this latter scenario, the Lord would be obliged to forgive them as it is his vow that if anyone comes and seeks his refuge the Lord must oblige him no matter how sinful that person is. This is clearly stated by Lord Ram himself when Ravana's brother Vibhishan came to seek the Lord's refuge after being kicked out by Ravana. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 43 and Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 44.

So the learned sage had to wait for the opportune time. Now Lord Ram had grown up and used to move out of the royal palace to go hunting, and used to participate in the administrative work of the kingdom to help his father Dasrath. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1 and 7-8 that precede Doha no. 205.]

एहूँ मिस देखौं पद जाई । करि बिनती आनों दोउ भाई ॥ ७ ॥

ग्यान बिराग सकल गुन अयना । सो प्रभु मैं देखब भरि नयना ॥ ८ ॥

ēhūṁṁ misa dēkhaum pada jā'ī. kari binatī ānaum dō'u bhā'ī. 7.

gyāna birāga sakala guna ayanā. sō prabhu maim dēkhaba bhari nayanā. 8.

The sage thought that on the pretext of getting the demons killed, he will get the rare and golden opportunity of having a divine vision or sight of the holy feet of Lord Hari. He would then pray (request) and bring the two brothers along<sup>1</sup>. (7)

The learned sage felt excited and exhilarated at the thought that “Now, I will have an opportunity to have my fill of seeing the Lord who is a treasury of Gyan (enlightenment and knowledge), Viraag (or Vairagya; renunciation, detachment and dispassion), and all the auspicious and noble Gunas (virtues and qualities)<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To whom would the sage request? It's not mentioned here. Hence, we have two meanings—one, he would request the Lord himself, and two, he would request his worldly father, king Dasrath, to send Lord Ram with him to the forest to kill the demons.

The sage thought to himself that ever since Lord Vishnu took birth as Lord Ram, he had not gone to have a 'Darshan' (divine viewing) of the Lord. So, now he has got an excuse. The sage was an enlightened one, so he felt that he is very fortunate that he will have a divine vision of the holy Lord and his divine feet with the additional bonus of being able to help the Lord fulfill the purpose of his incarnation by being instrumental in bringing him to the forest and initiating the process of elimination of the demons one by one. This helped him to achieve a double reward—one was the chance to see the Lord at close quarters and act as his guardian in the forest, and second was being instrumental in removing the burden of the earth caused by the demons, a duty that great sages were supposed to perform.

The sage wished to keep the identity of the Lord secret lest it would have alerted the demons as noted in the note appended to verse no. 6 above, though all the great sages were privy to the news of Lord Vishnu having taken birth on the earth as Lord Ram. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, line no. 2 of Doha no. 48 Ka.]

<sup>2</sup>Had the sage gone earlier at the time of birth of the Lord or anytime later on, he would be welcomed and shown the Lord and his brothers to seek his blessings. Lord Ram would be summoned by his parents and ordered to bow before the sage who would then bless them. This is the routine way the things happen—when some sage or hermit arrives in a household, the parents call their son and request the guest sage to bless him. In this scenario, the guest sage is not able to spend much of a time with the child. It is a formal interaction that barely lasts for a few minutes. But now Vishwamitra is very excited as he will be able to spend a lot of time with Lord Ram, the incarnate Supreme Being. This is because he will bring the Lord along with him; the Lord will live and eat at his hermitage. The Lord will stay with him for a long time. The sage imagined the fun it would be when he would be coming back to his hermitage with the two brothers at his side. It will be a moment in his life which none of the sages, big or small, ever had. The beauty of the sight of Vishwamitra walking on the path with Lord Ram and Laxman is very wonderfully described by Tulsidas in Geetawali, Baal Kand, verse nos. 52—56.

There is an interesting interpretation to the three divine virtues Vishwamitra mentions in Lord Ram—viz. Gyan, Viraag and auspicious Gunas. The sage himself was highly self-realised and enlightened; he was full of renunciation, detachment and dispassion; and he had all the virtuous qualities one can imagine of. So he stressed these qualities in his beloved Lord. It is these qualities that attract wise men to others; a great sage is not attracted to a prince for his fame or strength, but for his good virtues. Vishwamitra did not see a ‘prince warrior’ in Lord Ram, but the grand virtues of Gyan, Vairagya and Gunas that he possessed.]

The sage remained submerged in divine thoughts and auspicious expectations as he hurried to meet the Lord. It did not take the sage much before he reached and took a bath in the river Saryu (on the banks of which was established the great city of Ayodhya). Then he went to the royal court of the king (Dasrath, the father of Lord Ram). (Doha no. 206)

[Note—It ought to be noted that the place where Vishwamitra used to stay, the place known as Siddha-shram, was very far away from the city of Ayodhya. So this Doha implies that the sage did not waste time by staying anywhere on the way. He went straight to Ayodhya.

The way Vishwamitra was engrossed in divine thoughts and the prospect of meeting Lord Ram is finely described in Tulsidas' book Geetawali, Baal Kand, verse no. 48.

When one is lost in thoughts one does not feel the burden of a tiring and long-haul journey. Though the sage was sure that his request for Ram would not be turned down by Ram's father king Dasrath, but still it was uncertain because he has had no previous assurance from either the Lord or the king. A similar dilemma was faced by Vibhishan when he was on his way to meet Lord Ram after being kicked out of Lanka by his own brother Ravana. Vibhishan kept on imagining and wondering as he crossed the mighty ocean to reach Lord Ram. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 42—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 43.]

When the king (Dasrath) heard that the sage has arrived (to meet him), he went forward to receive and welcome him. The king was accompanied by members of the Brahmin class of his kingdom<sup>1</sup>. (1)

The king prostrated before the sage to pay his respects to him. After that, he brought the sage inside the palace and made him sit on his own throne (again as a mark of great respect)<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Brahmins are respected in the society. So when some important guest arrived, it was customary for the host king to go to receive and welcome the guest along with noble members of the society. This was specially the case when some great sage or seer came. The king took Brahmins with him to show that he holds Vishwamitra in high esteem. Usually the king does not leave his palace, but since in this case the guest was not an ordinary one but a renowned sage of the stature of a Brahma-rishi, it was obligatory on the part of Dasrath to go and meet him outside the door as a gesture of great respect.

Under normal circumstances, the royal guards would not allow any mendicant to enter the palace grounds. So when Dasrath himself went to receive Vishwamitra it was a signal to all the members of the royal household to become alert as some special guest has arrived.

Later on we shall read that when sage Vishwamitra went with Lord Ram and Laxman to Janakpur to attend the bow-breaking ceremony that would culminate in the marriage of Sita with the victorious competitor, king Janak of Janakpur also came out with a large group of Brahmins to meet and welcome the sage at the gates of the city. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 214.

bibidha bhām̐ti bhōjana karavāvā. munibara hr̥dayam̐ haraṣa ati pāvā. 4.

The king (Dasrath) worshipped the sage and washed his feet reverentially. He lauded his good fortune that he was honoured to have sage Vishwamitra as his guest. The king said, 'There is no one as lucky, fortunate and privileged as me today.'<sup>1</sup> (3)

The king then entertained (served) the sage well by offering him food of different varieties (i.e. the king laid out a sumptuous meal containing a variety of dishes for him). This (respect and honour) immensely pleased and delighted the sage's heart; he felt contented and happy<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Sage Vishwamitra was born a Kshatriya, but he had done severe form of Tapa (austerity and penance) to attain the stature of a Brahma-rishi, a great sage who has a stature that is equivalent to Lord Brahma, the creator. Besides this, he was a perfect example of renunciation and detachment. He did not yearn for any worldly pleasures or comforts. So there was no need for him to go to kings and beg for alms or charity, or seek the patronage of any king to meet his worldly needs of money and wealth. He never did in fact. Sage Vishwamitra never wanted his Atma, his soul, to be obliged to anyone.

So it was indeed remarkable that the sage of his exalted stature would come on his own, uninvited, to meet king Dasrath. Therefore, the king thought that it was a very lucky day for him that a great sage has come to bless him on his own. Ever since Dasrath became a king, all the other sages and seers had come to him on one occasion or the other, but Vishwamitra never came. In fact, Vishwamitra rarely ventured out of the forest; if any king wished to meet him he would go to his hermitage.

By telling the sage that today he feels highly honoured and privileged to have him as his guest the king meant that it is very rare to have a great sage of the exalted stature of Vishwamitra as one's guest, giving the householder a rare opportunity to serve him and seek his blessings. The occasion is all the more rare because of the fact that Vishwamitra never goes to the place of any householder unlike other sages who roam around in this world. Even the celestial sage Narad, who is said to be the son of the creator Brahma, is habituated to roam around in the entire creation, paying visits to countless households. Therefore obviously it is a rare and great moment for the king.

<sup>2</sup>After formal welcome and showing of respect, the king fed the sage with a sumptuous meal that consists of a variety of delectable dishes. The sage was pleased not so much because he ate delicious food but because he had been shown the greatest respect possible and was welcome warmly.

Another reason for the sage feeling happy was that he deduced that since the king holds him in high esteem, chances are very bright that he would concede to his requests to send his two sons, Lord Ram and his brother Laxman, with the sage so that the demons could be slayed. As it transpired, after initial dithering the king did accede to the sage's requests and sent the two brothers with him.]

पुनि चरननि मेले सुत चारी । राम देखि मुनि देह बिसारी ॥ ५ ॥
 भए मगन देखत मुख सोभा । जनु चकोर पूरन ससि लोभा ॥ ६ ॥

puni caranani mēlē suta cārī. rāma dēkhi muni dēha bisārī. 5.
 bha'e magana dēkhata mukha sōbhā. janu cakōra pūrana sasi lōbhā. 6.

The king then summoned his four sons (Lord Ram, Laxman, Bharat and Shatrughan) and placed them at the feet of the sage. [That is, the king called his sons and asked them to pay their respect to the sage by touching his feet and bowing before him.]

When the sage saw Lord Ram he lost awareness of his body; he became so exhilarated that he forgot about everything else so much that his attention was riveted on the Lord<sup>1</sup>. (5)

The sage was beguiled by the bewitching beauty of Lord Ram's face which resembled the sight of a full moon. The sage's mental condition was like that of the Chakor bird (the Indian red-legged partridge) which gazes at the full moon unblinkingly<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When the four brothers came and touched the sage's feet it is natural that their father, king Dasrath, introduced them to the sage and told him their names. When the sage learnt who Lord Ram was, whom he knew to be a personified form of the Supreme Being, it is no wonder that he became stunned and ecstatic as he was now watching the Lord—who is the object of so much adoration by the scriptures, who is inaccessible to even the greatest of ascetics and hermits who spent an entire lifetime searching the Lord in vain, who can rarely be reached by doing even the severest forms of spiritual and religious exercises, and who is so merciful and compassionate that he would reveal himself in an instant if one has the proper level of love and devotion for him—so closely, and first hand.

The sage just could not believe his eyes when he saw the Supreme Being standing before him in a personified form as Lord Ram. The sage immediately attained the transcendental state of utter bliss that comes in the highest stage of Samadhi, the transcendental state of existence of the Consciousness when nothing of the gross world is relevant.

The sage was so stunned at the sight of Lord Ram and his bewitching beauty that he forgot about observing formalities such as blessing the princes and thanking the king.

By saying that the sage forgot about the awareness of the existence of his body it is also implied that he did not remember for some moments who he was and why he had come here.

<sup>2</sup>The bird known as 'Chakor' is reputed to be so enamoured of the moon that on the full moon night it continuously stares at the moon and turns its head gradually as the moon traverses across the sky during the night.

In Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 47 it is affirmed that "the divine story of Lord Ram is like the beautiful and charming rays of the full moon, while saints, holy and pious people are like the bird Chakor that is so enamoured of the moon and its beauty that it keeps its gaze fixed on the latter”.

In other words, such holy people keep their mind and attention fixed on the divine story and auspicious glories of Lord Sri Ram, who is a personified form of the Supreme Being.

Again, in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 115 the metaphor of Chakor is used to describe that the people of the villages who met Lord Ram while he was on his way to the forest were so charmed at this magnificent sight that they gazed at the Lord’s face just like the Chakor stares at the full moon.

Another instance is found in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 321. Here the occasion is of Lord Ram’s marriage. Lord Ram, along with his father king Dasrath and the rest of the guest, is sitting in the marriage pavilion. The Lord was the center of attraction; he was the cynosure of the eyes of all those present on that occasion so much so that they gazed at the Lord unblinkingly like the bird Chakor gazes at the full moon.]

तब मन हरषि बचन कह राऊ । मुनि अस कृपा न कीन्हिहु काऊ ॥ ७ ॥

taba mana haraṣi bacana kaha rā'ū. muni asa kṛpā na kīnhihu kā'ū. 7.
kēhi kārana āgamana tumhārā. kahahu sō karata na lāva'um̃ bārā. 8.

Then the king was greatly pleased in his heart and he said to the sage—‘Oh revered sage! You had never been so kind and graceful upon me previously. [7] Say, what is the reason of your coming here. Tell me, and I will do my best to carry out your orders without delay.’ [8] (7-8)

[Note—One does not ask his regular guest, who comes too often, why he has come. The host presumes that the guest has come in a routine way, and there is nothing special about it. But in the case of someone who never comes, especially if the guest is someone very exalted and honoured in the world, the host naturally wonders what brings him to his house. Surely there must be a special reason.

The guest was not an ordinary sage, but a Brahma-rishi, a sage of a stature that is equivalent to Brahma the creator, which made him as honourable as the king’s own royal priest Vasistha. So the king felt he would be highly privileged and honoured to fulfill the desires of Vishwamitra—especially because this sage is not in the habit of asking anything from anybody.

Hence, if the sage asks for something and the king is able to fulfill his needs then it will help spread the king’s fame and glory throughout the world; it is not always that sage Vishwamitra asks for anything.

Refer also to Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 49, line nos. 1-2.]

असुर समूह सतावहिं मोही । मैं जाचन आयउँ नृप तोही ॥ ९ ॥
अनुज समेत देहु रघुनाथा । निसिचर बध मैं होब सनाथा ॥ १० ॥

asura samūha satāvahiṃ mōhī. mairiṃ jācana āya'um' nṛpa tōhī. 9.
 anuja samēta dēhu raghunāthā. nīcara badha mairiṃ hōba sanāthā. 10.

Sage Vishwamitra finally disclosed the reason for his coming to Ayodhya. He told king Dasrath—‘Hordes of demons torment me. I have come to request something from you<sup>1</sup>. [9] Give Lord Ram along with his younger brother (Laxman) to me (i.e. send the two brothers with me) so that these demons can be killed and eliminated. I will feel secure and happy; I will be obliged.<sup>2</sup> [10] (9-10)*#

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The word used in the text is “Jaachan” which also means ‘to test’. Hence, if we take this meaning, the verse changes as follows: ‘I have come to test you.’

What did Vishwamitra wish to test? Well, king Dasrath was renowned for his magnanimous, gracious and helpful nature; he had always obliged the sages and gods, and he had always fought on their behalf. After all, the Supreme Being will not take birth as a son of any ordinary man. So the sage wished to test this quality in Dasrath. He also wanted to test the level of enlightenment of Dasrath—which unfortunately the king lacked. This is proved immediately as soon as the sage had expressed his desire because the king, upon learning what the sage wanted, flatly declined to oblige him. The king forgot that he is committing some grave mistakes—one, by refusing to accede to the sage’s request after having promised him that he will fulfill his desires immediately, the king was going back on his own words which is a very bad character and is a punishable offence; two, this was like playing with fire because the sage could curse him for his refusal, inviting horrible consequences; and three, that Lord Ram was not a man’s son but the Supreme Being who had simply obliged him by becoming his son because the king had done severe Tapa with this request, and that the Lord has other much more important duties and obligations in this creation than to grow up and rule an ordinary worldly kingdom known as Ayodhya like so many other kings in the dynasty.

The question now arises, why was Dasrath so ignorant of the facts? Well, herein lies the wonderful play of the Lord’s ‘Maya’. The ‘Maya’ is the Supreme Beings dynamic cosmic powers that create delusions; it holds the entire creation in its sway; there is no creature or god who escapes its snare. It is this Maya that cast its magical spell of delusions on Dasrath, eclipsing his wisdom and propelling him into an intellectual void that made him forget the reality about who Ram was. Refer Doha no. 207 below.

Another interesting point to note is that the cruel demons who so relentlessly and ruthlessly tormented the sages and ruined their fire sacrifices did not dare to disturb the fire sacrifice done by Dasrath for getting sons, as narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 189 and its preceding Chaupai line nos. 5-8. Well, what can be the reason? The answer is this: Dasrath was a very brave and invincible king with an equally brave and invincible army. Evil creatures of a pervert mind do not dare to irritate those who are strong and capable of taking revenge; they torment the humble and the weak because they know that the latter would not harm them. Remember: the demons were like modern-day terrorists who attack the weak and the defenseless, and not the powerful and the resourceful because they know that if they attack the latter they would suffer immensely, for these sinful people know inside their hearts that what they are doing is wrong and unrighteous, and wrongfulness and unrighteousness saps their moral courage and spiritual strength, replacing it with inherent fear and cowardice.

The demons knew that if they dared to disturb the fire sacrifice of the mighty king Dasrath, then the king would put his entire army and employ all his strength to punish them, and then they will have no place to hide. Their king, the demon Ravana of Lanka, feared complete destruction of his golden city of Lanka should he annoy Dasrath. They also feared the wrath of Vasistha whom they knew to be a powerful sage as he was the son of the Creator (Brahma) himself (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 48 and its preceding Chaupai line nos. 6-8).

On the other hand, they had less fear from the numerous sages and hermits whom they attacked and whose fire sacrifices they ruined because these demons knew that these sages don't have the backing of a powerful army, and that they will not curse them because while doing a fire sacrifice they took a vow to overcome anger and refrain from cursing anyone.

Besides this, the sages, seers and hermits lived alone in isolated hermitages in remote far-flung areas of the earth, places that were not protected by armies, while cities and towns were well protected by walls and guards. When Dasrath performed the fire sacrifice to beget a son, his whole army was on alert with its entire array of formidable arsenal kept ready to ward-off any attack by inimical forces. When the sages and hermits did the fire sacrifice, they had no protection whatsoever.

The demons therefore thought it wise to let Dasrath alone, and they abstained from unnecessarily provoking him into a war that would be destructive for them.

<sup>2</sup>Sage Vishwamitra was a Brahmin by his spiritual actions, and king Dasrath was a Kshatriya. The Kshatriya is duty-bound to protect the Brahmins and their religious activities; this the former had been doing since the dawn of civilization. So, the sage said that he has come to ask Dasrath to help him by killing the demons who are defiling his fire sacrifice. By directly asking for Lord Ram, the sage clearly implied that Dasrath's great army will not be helpful in this case.

Another important point is that the sage said that Lord Ram's 'younger brother' should be sent with him; he did not specifically mentioned 'Laxman' or any one of the others, viz. Bharat or Shatrughan. But Laxman was always so close and dear to Lord Ram that whenever Ram's 'younger brother' was mentioned it was deemed to mean Laxman. Hence, Vishwamitra had no doubt in his mind that the king would know whom the sage means by saying 'the younger brother of Ram'.

There is a reason for asking for Laxman. Laxman was a personified form of Seshnath, the thousand-hooded coiled serpent on which Lord Vishnu reclines on the surface of the celestial ocean known as Kshir Sagar. Seshnath is also the one who is believed to hold the earth on his hood. This Seshnath manifested himself as Laxman to help Lord Vishnu in the form of Lord Ram to remove the burden of the earth, the demons. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 17.

*Sage Vishwamitra told Dasrath—"Oh great king. Cruel savages who live beyond the boundaries of your realm have been constantly intruding into your territory, plundering and pillaging at random and with ease. They have found far-flung, outlying remote areas of your extended kingdom easy ground to prey upon because these places are not as robustly protected as the towns and cities, with their walls and ramparts, that are well guarded by your army. These areas are generally inhabited by sages and seers who prefer to live away from the hustle and bustle of crowded places, and have established their hermitages there. Forest-dwelling tribes and simple harmless folks are the ones who live there. Since such subjects of your kingdom are humble and defenseless against the merciless intruders, these cruel savages whom I would call ‘demons’ because of their blood-thirsty, sinful and evil nature, prey on them and torment them endlessly, without any rhyme or reason. We, the sages and seers who lead a reclusive life in hermitages and spend our time in religious activities and meditation or teaching and studying the scriptures, are seen by these demon-like savages as their natural enemies though we pose no threat to them, and so they target us ruthlessly.

We are not even able to do our daily chores and offer oblations without fear, and there is a nagging dread of either getting harmed in physical terms or at least being disrupted in our practices and rituals.

Since I (Vishwamitra) am the most senior amongst all the sages, seers and hermits living in that area, I decided that it was my moral duty and responsibility to do something on behalf of the entire community of holy men. You can say that I have come as a representative of all the sages and seers who are suffering gravely under the constant threat of these savages. Many of the sages and seers feared a backlash from the savages if they dared to come to you, the king of the realm, and seek your help, because they were sure that though you will certainly help them by sending your invincible army to face these savages, but the problem is that these rascals won’t attack as long as the army is there. And since it is not practically feasible for the army to stay indefinitely at remote places, once it leaves the savages would strike us with greater viciousness and renewed ferocity in order to take revenge upon us. So the majority of the sages preferred not to annoy the cruel blood-thirsty savages, the ‘demons’ who are evil and sinful and cruel to the extreme.

Now, if you can help me in the plan I have devised to get rid of these savages, great good and fame would come to you. You will not only accumulate points of religious merit but history will also honour you as the great and honourable king who lived upto his reputation of not dithering in doing his duties without a second thought and of protecting the subjects of his kingdom well even it meant putting his own self-interest at peril.

Listen therefore: As I have pointed it out to you, sending a huge army is not the solution as it would alert our enemies, the cruel savages (the ‘demons’) and it would back-fire. They will go into hiding and never face your army, so no purpose will be served. So I have carefully devised an alternative plan. You should send your two sons, Lord Ram and Laxman, with me. This will not cause any suspicion in the mind of the demons (the savages), and so they will attack us in the routine manner when we set out to do our daily religious practices. It is then that these two powerful brothers—who are like the splendorous sun as far as the removal of the darkness of the night symbolized by these evil savages is concerned, or are like the flame which attracts the fly and then burns it—would then effortlessly get rid of the cruel demons as easily as the sun overcoming the darkness of the night by merely rising in the horizon or the flame burning the flies by just remaining lighted.

And my dear king, if you are worried about the safety of your two sons, then perish the thought. Don’t you know about my reputation? I am not an ordinary sage, but one who possesses such mystical powers that I could have myself demolished the mightiest of the demon army (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 209 and its preceding Chaupai line no. 8 in this context). But I can’t do that because I have taken a vow as part of my religious austerity not to take revenge, not to show anger, not to curse and not to show how strong and powerful I am. But that does not mean I am weak and unable. Remember: your two sons are safer with me than they are with you. You don’t have that mystical ability that I as a sage have. I don’t speak a lie because sages, seers and hermits who lead an austere life of total renunciation in forests, remaining involved in nothing but religious pursuits, are not accustomed to doing so (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 210). So don't worry about the safety of your two sons, Lord Ram and Laxman.

Besides this, I do not accept debts and obligations of any kind whatsoever. So be sure that I will compensate them as well as you for your magnanimity and graciousness if you let Lord Ram and Laxman go with me. They, and you, will be more-than-fully rewarded. You will get the blessings of countless sages and seers who would be freed from this constant horror of savages, and these blessings in themselves would be the strongest shield for you and your sons in future.

Therefore, oh great and noble king, please send Lord Ram and Laxman with me. God bless you!'

#The wise sages, seers and hermits had called a meeting to discuss the problem of the demons tormenting them and ruining their fire sacrifices. They decided that they will have to act diplomatically and wisely if they want to get rid of this terror. If they went to king Dasrath and asked for help, he would surely do so, but obviously he would send in his army to fight the demons, kill them or chase them away. But that would not be the solution—because the demons will hide and keep low till the army is there, and once the army goes back to its barracks, the demons would wreak havoc.

So, what should be done? The congregation of sages and hermits decided to act secretly and appointed their senior-most member, sage Vishwamitra, for the covert mission. He was to go to Ayodhya like any other sage going out on his routine visit to kings. He would not request for the army, but would bring Lord Ram and Laxman, the two empowered sons of king Dasrath, to the forest instead. Even if the demons discovered about the visit they would think that Vishwamitra was invited by the king to teach his two sons the scriptures or secrets of some martial arts and secret weapons that Vishwamitra was known to possess. This will not arouse suspicion in the minds of the demons about the real intention of Vishwamitra's visit.

The sages knew who Lord Ram was; they knew that he was as powerful, potent, dynamic, pure, divine, holy, and of course as scorching as the Fire God himself. Remember that Lord Ram and his three brothers had their origin in the sweet pudding presented to Dasrath by the Fire God himself. In other words, they had the powerful and dynamic genes of the Fire God in them, rather than that of Dasrath who was after all a mere human king in spite of him being very strong and powerful. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 189 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8.

Like the flame of a candle that first attracts the insect and then burns it, the sages knew that Lord Ram would attract the demons in droves and then get rid of them by killing them. This is exactly what had happened. On the way to the hermitage of sage Vishwamitra, the demoness Tadka had attacked Lord Ram, Laxman and the sage. We shall read shortly that she was instantly killed by the Lord—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precedes Doha no. 209.

Another pertinent question now arises—what attracted Tadka to Lord Ram and Laxman? Later on in the story we shall read that another demoness named as Supernakha was also attracted to Lord Ram. What attracted her? She was enchanted by the 'astounding beauty, the matchless aura of glamour surrounding the Lord, and the Lord's fascinating charm'—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-10 that precede Doha no. 17.

Even her cousin brothers, the demons Khar and Dushan, whom she summoned to take revenge upon Lord Ram when he spurned her overtures and got her nose and ears cut-off to punish her for being pervert and promiscuous, were mesmerized at the beauty of the Lord's physical form as clearly said in Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-5 that precede Doha no. 19.

Even sage Vishwamitra was struck by the beautiful images of Lord Ram and Laxman—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 209.

Coming back to our present discussion regarding Tadka, she had been attracted by the Lord's beauty like the fly is attracted by the charm of the flame. And like the flame burning the fly to death, Lord Ram had slayed Tadka too as referred to herein above.

See the following Doha no. 207 which carries on this conversation.]

दो०. देहु भूप मन हरषित तजहु मोह अग्यान ।

dōhā.

dēhu bhūpa mana haraṣita tajahu mōha agyāna.
dharma sujasa prabhu tumha kaur̥n inha kaham̐ ati kalyāna. 207.

The sage requested the king—‘Oh king! Give cheerfully what I request, and discard delusions and ignorance<sup>1</sup>. Don't have doubts; don't dither, because oh king this will be an auspicious act on your part that would conform to the laws of Dharma and give you religious merit, which will enhance your fame in the world (and invite blessings from countless pleased sages and seers who will feel obliged to shower their blessing and praises upon you).

Not only this, they (Ram and Laxman) would be blessed with great glories and acquire renown by the great achievements that would come their way.<sup>2</sup> (Doha no. 207)

<sup>2</sup>A King's religious duty is to protect his subjects from enemies or those who torment them. Vishwamitra was being tormented by demons, so it is a moral duty of king Dasrath to help him. It would obviously be a meritorious work. Just imagine the consequences of refusal—the king would be denounced and ridiculed and scorned at as being sinful for not standing up to protect the fire sacrifice of a sage.

Obeying the requests of selfless sages and hermits was obligatory, as was to honour one's word given to them. The king has already promised to help Vishwamitra and fulfill his desires, so to rescind on his words now by refusing to send Ram and Laxman with the sage would be an unforgivable sin.

Vishwamitra was an enlightened sage; he knew what was in store for Lord Ram if he accompanied him. It was during this trip that the Lord's marriage with Sita would be formalized. This would be a cause of celebration and establish Lord Ram as a prince of matchless strength and prowess—because this marriage was centered on a strict competition in which anyone who lifted and stringed the formidably strong bow of Lord Shiva, that was kept in the custody of Sita's father, king Janak, was to marry her. All the great kings and princes of the time would be invited, and all of them would fail to move the bow. It would be then that Lord Ram, on the instructions of Vishwamitra, would lift, string and break this bow, thereby establishing his identity as the greatest prince on earth. Where else would one get this golden chance to establish himself and gain fame throughout the world except in an assembly where all the great kings and princes have gathered together under one roof?

Then, Lord Ram and Laxman would be killing ferocious demons from whom even the Gods ran away in terror. This would be another reason for establishing the brothers' fame and glories.

A third development was waiting to happen. Sage Gautam's wife Ahilya was turned into a stone by a curse. When Lord Ram would touch her with his feet, she would regain her original form and be freed from this curse. This incident would establish that Lord Ram had supernatural mystical powers, that he was not an ordinary mortal. This incident is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Doha no. 210 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 11-12—to Doha no. 211.

Which father would not like his son to achieve these successes? Dasrath did not know all this. This is precisely why Vishwamitra advised him to discard his ignorance and delusions. The king must realise that the prince whom he treats as his 'son' is not a human being like the king himself, but the Supreme Being in a personified form. So, the sage told him to wake up from his day-dreaming and become realistic.

A very interesting interpretation can be made of the sage telling Dasrath that 'they will also be blessed'. The sage did not specify who he means by 'they'. The king had four sons, so the sage meant that the two brothers who would accompany him would indeed be blessed, but this blessing would extend to cover the other two, Bharat and Shatrughan, also. This is because all the four brothers would be married simultaneously at Janakpur. This prospect should be sufficient to excite the father, king Dasrath, so thought the sage. But we will now read that the opposite happened. The deluded and ignorant king did not understand the import of the sage's words, and flatly refused to oblige him.

When the king heard these most unwelcome words (request) of the sage, his heart shivered (shook) with shock and the brightness of his face faded<sup>1</sup>. (1)

The king said, 'Oh sage! I have got four sons during my old age. You did not think over the matter before speaking and making this demand from me<sup>2</sup>. (2)

The king was shocked and dismayed beyond imagination, and he was dumbfounded. He had never expected the sage to make such a demand which no father will like to hear. His face that sported a smile earlier suddenly became sullen and gloomy. His heart quivered at the thought of sending his beloved sons to the forest with a hermit to face ferocious demons. Which father would love to hear it?

<sup>2</sup>The king had become very old, and according to the Purans he was sixty thousand years old when he was blessed with the four sons. Refer: Valmiki's Ramayan, Baal Kand, Sarga 20, Sloka no. 10.

After ruling the kingdom for such a long time he was worried that he had no heirs. So he had summoned sage Sringeri who performed a son-begetting fire sacrifice which resulted in the Fire God manifesting himself and offering some sweet porridge sanctified by Mantras to Dasrath with the instructions that the latter should make his three chief queens eat it. The king followed the instructions, and in due course of time the four sons were born to his queens. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 189—to Doha no. 192.

A son is a source of great comfort, solace and support for a father, especially during his old age. Dasrath was a king, and he was preparing to anoint Lord Ram, his eldest son, on the throne. At this juncture sage Vishwamitra came and demanded that Ram and his brother Laxman be sent to the forest to fight demons. The king was extremely worried; demons are not human enemies who could be easily defeated and killed. They were known to be very fierce and cruel, and would perform magical feats during the heat of battle which stun even veteran warriors. Ram and Laxman had no experience of entering into such a battle; in fact they had yet not been trained in the art of warfare. Refer: Valmiki's Ramayan, Baal Kand, Sarga 20, Sloka no. 7.

Pitting young, delicate and inexperienced princes who have never witnessed hardships of any kind in their lives against ruthlessly cruel demons will be an absurd proposition and would be tantamount to throwing them willingly to a pack of hungry wolves. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 208.

Besides this, Lord Ram had not even reached sixteen years of age. Refer: Valmiki's Ramayan, Baal Kand, Sarga 20, Sloka no. 2.

The king's worries were compounded because the sage wished to take only the two boys, Ram and Laxman, and did not request that the army accompany them. This was like throwing the two young inexperienced princes to hungry wolves to tackle them alone. This very idea sent shivers through the spine of Dasrath.

So he remarked that the sage had not given due thought and was not being practical before making the request.]

मागहु भूमि धेनु धन कोसा । सर्वस देउं आजु सहरोसा ॥ ३ ॥

देह प्रान ते प्रिय कछु नाहीं । सोउ मुनि देउं निमिष एक माहीं ॥ ४ ॥ māgahu bhūmi dhēnu dhana kōsā. sarbasa dē'um' āju saharōsā. 3.

dēha prāna tēm priya kachu nāhīm. sō'u muni dē'um' nimīṣa ēka māhīm. 4.

‘Ask me for land, cows, wealth and anything else—I will be glad to give you cheerfully whatever you demand. In fact, I will willingly give to you all that I have.’<sup>1</sup>

(3)

One's own body as well as the Pran is the dearest possession one has. I will willingly give both of them to you in an instant if you so want.<sup>2</sup> (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The king had earlier promised the sage that he will give the latter whatever he asks for. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 207.

So the king offered everything he had—his wealth, his possessions, his entire kingdom by way of land—lest the sage would accuse him of being a liar and rescinding on his words of honour. He was even willing to die for the sake of the sage—i.e. he was willing to accompany the sage to fight the demons himself, or if the sage curses him to die he was willing to accept it. But the king pleaded, 'don't force me to part with my beloved son Ram and his brother Laxman; I can't cope with this demand.'

Remember: the king was under the spell of the Lord's Maya (powers of creating delusions and imposing ignorance which eclipses all wisdom and intelligence). The learned sage was well aware of this face—as he had asked the king to overcome these negative influences. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, line no. 1 of Doha no. 207. But the Maya of the Lord is so powerful that no matter how much one teaches someone who is under its spell, such advice will have no effect on him.

The king was acting like an ordinary father and a worldly man. For he had forgotten who Ram actually was, and why the Lord had become his son.

When he asked the sage to request for cows, wealth, land etc. he meant to tell the sage that this is normally what alms seekers and Brahmins demand. No one asks the host to give his two sons to him like what Vishwamitra has demanded. It's absurd to ask someone to part with his sons; no one should expect anyone to meet such a demand.

<sup>2</sup>The word 'Pran' means one's life. So the king offered himself to the sage—he offered to accompany the sage and fight the demons himself. He did not fear being killed for the sake of the sage and protecting his fire sacrifice. This was in answer to the sage's suggestion that if the king fulfills his needs—which was to help him complete the fire sacrifice which was interrupted by the demons—then he, the king, would get immense fame as one who contributes willingly for an auspicious act. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, line no. 2 of Doha no. 207.

In the eventuality that he might be killed while fighting the demons on behalf of the sage, he still would have no worries in his mind because Lord Ram and his other brothers would automatically take up the responsibility of taking care of the kingdom. Besides this, the king would go down in history as having laid his life for a noble cause, and especially fighting for the cause of a renowned Brahma-rishi of the exalted stature of sage Vishwamitra.

'But just imagine what would happen to him in the unfortunate moment if something wrong goes and Ram is mortally wounded', the king implicitly asked the sage. 'Say sage', the king implied, 'what would happen to an old father whose dearest and eldest son is harmed and seriously wounded in battle? How will he comfort himself in his last days? Oh sage, please be kind to place thyself in my position and then thee would realize my reluctance to part with Ram who is so dear to my soul that I would hardly survive if he is taken away from me, just like the case of a person rarely surviving if the Pran is removed from his body.'

सब सुत प्रिय मोहि प्रान कि नाई । राम देत नहिं बनइ गोसाई ॥ ५ ॥
कहँ निसिचर अति घोर कठोरा । कहँ सुंदर सुत परम किसोरा ॥ ६ ॥

saba suta priya mōhi prāna ki nā'īm. rāma dēta nahim bana'i gōsā'īm. 5.
kaham̐ nisicara ati ghōra kaṭhōrā. kaham̐ sundara suta parama kisōrā. 6.

‘All the sons are equally dear to me; they are as dear to me as my own Pran—my own life. So, oh revered sage, it is not possible for me to part with Ram.’<sup>1</sup> (5)

On the one hand are the ruthlessly cruel demons, and on the other hand are these beautiful and delicate princes who have neither attained adulthood nor have ever experienced any sort of hardship and cruelty anytime in life; therefore they are no match for such demons.<sup>2</sup> (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The king was apprehensive that after his reluctance and refusal to part with Lord Ram because he loved him so much and also because he was the eldest son who is the heir to the throne, the sage might make another demand—that if the king finds it difficult to send Ram with him, then he can send one of the other three sons.

After all, the king has four sons. Had he only one son, the sage would have been morally forced to accede to his arguments that it is impossible for a father to part with his only son. But since he has three other sons besides Ram, it would be well nigh impossible to refuse the sage’s demand if he asks the king to send any one of them as per his own choice.

So to pre-empt this eventuality the king told the sage that all his sons are equally dear to him. That is, ‘Please do not ask me to send a replacement for Ram.’ Earlier the king has offered his own body as well as the ‘Pran’ to help sage Vishwamitra. Now he says that the sons are dear to him like his own ‘Pran’, and he cannot part with them. On the surface these two statements seem contradictory. They aren’t. What the king meant is this—‘Sage, for a man his sons are both a part of his body as well as his Pran. This is because the sons are produced through the medium of the body of the father, they are like an image of the father, and as a proof they carry the physical features of the father. The son carries the genes of the father, and in symbolic terms the father transfers his life forces into the body of the son at the time of the latter’s conception.

So here Dasrath clearly means that when he accompanies sage Vishwamitra himself, it will be equivalent to all the four sons going with the sage!

Refer also to Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 49, stanza no. 2.

<sup>2</sup>The two princes had not even attained sixteen years of age. They had never seen demons in life. Demons were no ordinary opponents or enemies. They were fearsome to look at; they were not only simply cruel but were ruthlessly blood-thirsty and man-eaters. To make young inexperienced princes face such creatures would be tantamount to willingly throwing them to hungry pack of wolves, into the jaws of certain death. The two princes would be scared to death by the mere sight of ferocious demons with a colossus body and horrifying countenance.]

सुनि नृप गिरा प्रेम रस सानी । हृदयँ हरष माना मुनि ग्यानी ॥ ७ ॥

sunī nr̥pa girā prēma rasa s̄ānī. hr̥dayam̐ haraṣa m̄nā muni gyānī. 7.
taba basiṣṭa bahubidhi samujhāvā. nr̥pa sandēha nāsa kaham̐ pāvā. 8.

When the learned sage heard the king's words soaked in love and affection, he felt happy in his heart (i.e. was pleased internally)<sup>1</sup>. (7)

Then sage Vasistha, the royal priest, intervened and he pleaded with the king (on behalf of sage Vishwamitra), explaining the things to him in various ways (i.e. from different angles, making him aware of the reality and enlightening him about the pros and cons of sending Lord Ram with Vishwamitra along with the consequences of stubborn refusal). This advice removed all doubts that the king had<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Why was the sage 'happy' instead of getting annoyed and angry at the king for his refusal to give Lord Ram? Well, the sage was delighted because he agreed that one should indeed have this kind of love for the Lord, a love in which one prefers to die and suffer the horrible consequences of inviting curses and punishments but not yielding an inch as far as the object of his adoration is concerned. No matter what pressure is exerted on a true lover and devotee of the Lord, he would not abandon his commitment of dedication, love and devotion for his beloved Lord. A true devotee of Lord Ram will willingly face the wrath and ridicule of the world for his faith and devotion and love for the Lord. So the learned sage was pleased internally; he expected this sort of response from the king.

The sage knew the level of devotion and love the king had for the Lord because when he had done severe Tapa in his previous life as king Manu, he had spurned all offers of all sorts of boons for being success in the Tapa. Instead, he had asked Lord Vishnu that he wishes to have him as his son so that he can shower his love and affection on him in the best and the closest form ever possible. Only when the Lord becomes his physical son would Manu be able to play with him while the Lord frolics around him, lift the Lord on his lap and kiss him affectionately to his heart's content, eat with him and feed him with his own hands, and watch the Lord till his eyes were full of this divine sight. None of this is possible in a formal atmosphere of a man interacting with a God; it is possible only when the Lord becomes his physical son because all formalities and decorum are now erased. Now the devotee can love his Lord as much and in a way he wants just like a doting father loves and pampers his dearest son.

The wise sage empathized with the king and knew how difficult it is for a father to part with his beloved young sons, especially when he knows that they would have to face cruel savages and blood-thirsty enemies. Vishwamitra was also a father before he renounced his family life, and therefore he understood the pain, and hence the fear and reluctance, in the heart of Dasrath. Therefore he did not get angry on Dasrath for his refusal to allow the two brothers to accompany Vishwamitra.

At this point of time, sage Vasistha intervened. He explained the pros and the cons to king Dasrath, and managed to bring him around to the idea of agreeing to Vishwamitra's proposal.

Sage Vasistha was not an ordinary priest; he was the son of Brahma the creator. He was highly respected, and when he intervened on behalf of sage Vishwamitra, pleading with the king to accede to the sage's requests and send Lord Ram and Laxman with him as demanded by him, the king thought things over and decided that he must obey. This is because he had great faith in Vasistha and knew that the latter would never advise him anything that was detrimental for his welfare.

Further, if the king still refused then he would have crossed the red-line of indiscipline because he would have disobeyed two great sages. The king realised that he was about to commit the greatest mistake of his life by being irrationally stubborn, and the consequences will be disastrous. No one would protect him should the two sages become angry. The king realised that the anger of the two sages would be more ruinous than the wrath of all the demons taken together—for the simple reason that while he would have the protection of two powerful sages against the wrath of the demons if he agreed to their requests and pleased them, he would lose this protective shield if he remains stubborn. This would have horrendous consequences for the entire kingdom because his enemies would get the wind of this development and they would seize the opportunity to attack him from all sides. This is what exactly happened earlier in the case of another great king by the name of Pratapbhanu. He was an emperor and had all the kings subdued by force. But once, due to certain developments, the Brahmins had cursed him that his entire family would be ruined along with the kingdom. When the conquered kings got the wind of this development, they got a chance to attack Pratapbhanu because they knew that under this curse he is most certain to be defeated, and they would be victorious. As it happened, Pratapbhanu's kingdom was destroyed and he died in ignominy as a defeated and fallen emperor. This entire episode is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 153—to Doha no. 175. The curse and the destruction of Pratapbhanu's kingdom is specifically narrated in (i) Doha no. 173; (ii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 174; and (iii) Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precedes Doha no. 175.

So, when Dasrath remembered this story—or rather we can safely presume that sage Vasistha must have reminded him of it because we read that he explained the things to the king in a variety of ways from different angles—he must have become terrified of the consequences of refusing to send Ram with Vishwamitra.

Vasistha must have also told him many other facts that the king had forgotten under the influence of Maya—(i) that in his previous life he was king Manu who had done Tapa to have Lord Vishnu as his son, and that therefore Ram was Lord Vishnu personified; (ii) that Vishnu had promised the Gods and the Earth that he will take birth in the household of the king of Ayodhya because he has already promised him to do so, and then he would eliminate the demons who had been tormenting them. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 142—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 152; and (ii) from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 184—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 187 respectively.

It must be noted that Vasistha must have taken the king to some private place to discuss the matter with him; he surely must not have done it in open court. It is a standard practice that a senior Authority consults his advisors in private, and not in full public view. Vasistha must have done it to avoid any unpleasant development should there be an argument between him and the king, and to avoid the chance of the assembly become aware of what he told the king; it was supposed to be a secret meeting between the king and his senior most advisor, sage Vasistha.

The sage would have also told him the good things that beckon Lord Ram if he goes to the forest with Vishwamitra—such as the sure chance of Vishwamitra teaching Ram and Laxman the great secrets and the art of warfare. This would be a rare opportunity for the two brothers because Vishwamitra was the greatest expert of his time in this field. Besides this, great fame and praises awaited Ram and Laxman as they are sure to eliminate the demons because they have the protection of a renowned sage of the stature of Vishwamitra who was an invincible Kshatriya king before he attained the exalted stature of Brahmin-hood. This would help to establish Ram and Laxman as the greatest warriors of all times.

During this discussion sage Vasistha must have surely told king Dasrath—in order to convince him in favour of obeying Vishwamitra and to allay his fears about the safety of his two sons Ram and Laxman while they are in the custody of the sage—about the stupendous glory and the astounding mystical powers that Vishwamitra possessed.

Sage Vasistha saw suppressed anger in the eyes of Vishwamitra, though externally the latter kept his calm. So the former sage feared for the worst; he knew about the sort of anger that Vishwamitra had, and no one can be sure that he won't curse the king. Vasistha had not forgotten that it is the same Vishwamitra who had killed all his hundred sons in the fight for the Kaamdhenu cow without having any kind of regret. Therefore it was his moral duty as the royal priest to bring his patron king to his senses before disaster struck. Hence, Vasistha decided to talk with the king in private and explain to him the pros and cons of the situation.

Among other things, sage Vasistha reminded the king that his family is famous for its charitable nature and its reputation of honouring the word given to others. This time the king has promised a renowned sage that he will fulfill his desires, and now to go back on his own words of honour will boomerang upon him with full force of ignominy as well as the unforgivable sin of telling a lie to a great sage of the stature of Vishwamitra.

Even if Vishwamitra excuses him, the laws of Dharma (i.e. the natural laws of righteous and proper conduct) will not spare him from punishment. The king is bound to suffer if he refuses to oblige sage Vishwamitra by sending Ram and Laxman with him.

Vishwamitra was a Brahma-rishi and not an ordinary hermit. If he is pleased, then great boons and blessings are in store for the king, his sons and the kingdom. On the other hand, if his displeased horrendous consequences loom on the horizon.

Vasistha must have told Dasrath—‘Look king. You have become old; how long do you think you will protect your sons? Vishwamitra is a Brahm-rishi who will live for thousands and thousands of years. You are simply a king, and there are numerous kings like you on this earth, no matter how high and powerful you may think yourself to be. Your strength, powers and authority are no match for Vishwamitra. If he is pleased and extends his patronage and protection to your sons and the kingdom, take it from me oh king that you will be sure that no enemy, howsoever strong and powerful he may be, will ever dare to raise his eyes against you, your kingdom and your sons. On the contrary, if Vishwamitra is antagonized, and your enemies get the wind of it, then no power on earth would be able to shield you. And by the way remember this: don't expect much from me either for I am no match for Vishwamitra. I have myself lost a hundred sons in confrontation with him earlier. So beware of your actions. You will have no time to regret later on. Don't be foolish to let this opportunity slip your hand: Vishwamitra does not come requesting often at the drop of a hat like other Brahmins, he rarely ventures out of his hermitage. So this is a golden chance for you to get his blessings and come under his protection.

For the sake of your own good and welfare, don't lose this chance. Refusal to oblige the sage will invite horrible aftermath for you, I warn you; don't blame me later on.

And remember oh king the age-old wisdom: It is said that if a minister, a doctor and a guru (teacher, guide, advisor and moral preceptor) speaks to please his king, patient and disciple or follower respectively because of their powerful position and fear of retribution by annoying them if they don't like the advice given to them, then most certainly the latter would come to ruin (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Doha no. 37). In other words, I must not become your 'yes man', but tell you what is good for you. You have appointed me as your royal priest and moral advisor, and I must do my duty by giving you a sane and wise advice, not something that you will like to hear but something I think is good for you. And in the present context, the best of your interests would be served by honouring the wishes of the great sage Vishwamitra.'

All these arguments made Dasrath change his mind. He realised his folly, and immediately rectified his wrong-doing by summoning Ram and Laxman and handing them over to sage Vishwamitra.]

The king then called<sup>1</sup> the two sons (Ram and Laxman) and affectionately clasped them to his bosom. Then he advised them in many ways<sup>2</sup> (like a loving father is expected to give guidance to his beloved sons before he sends them with someone else to an unknown place). (9)

The king told sage Vishwamitra—‘These two sons are like my Pran (i.e. they are extremely dear to me just like a man loves his life). Oh sage, you are no one else but their own father. They do not have anyone else to protect them (in the forest, away from the kingdom) except you (just like they have no one else to protect them except me while they are in the kingdom). [So, please take special care of them; give them the love a father gives his sons. They are now in your custody and guardianship. It's your responsibility to protect them and take care of their well-being.]’<sup>3</sup> (10)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>An interesting thing has happened here. The two princes were “called” by Dasrath. One calls someone if he is not present at the site. This is obviously not the case because when Vishwamitra had come the king had summoned all the four brothers to bow before the sage to pay respect to him. It would be extremely impolite if the brothers had gone away while Vishwamitra was still sitting in the royal court. So they stood in attendance near their father. If this is indeed the case, then where is the question of “calling” the two brothers?

The answer lies in the fact that Vasistha had taken king Dasrath aside into a private chamber to discuss the matter of his outright rejection of Vishwamitra's request for sending Lord Ram and Laxman with him as explained in a note to verse no. 8 above. When Vasistha was successful in convincing Dasrath that it will be proper to accept sage Vishwamitra's requests and send Ram and Laxman with him, the king then “called” the two sons in that antechamber to confide with them his decision.

Remember: just a short time ago the king had flatly refused to send his two sons with Vishwamitra, and all the sons were witness to this refusal. Now suddenly the king has changed track; he is now willing to send them. So it was necessary to “call” the two sons aside in a private chamber to take them into confidence and to explain to them the reasons and circumstances of the change. It could not be done openly in public; it would make the king look ridiculous.

<sup>2</sup>Like sage Vasistha explaining to Dasrath the pros and cons of accepting the request of Vishwamitra, the king too explained the situation to his two sons in detail to convince them why he had changed his decision as well as to emphasize to them that this change is for their own good and welfare. This is what any other father would also do. After all, Ram and Laxman were not spoon-fed children; they had grown up and needed to be taken into confidence.

All the reservations and doubts that Lord Ram and Laxman might have had needed to be addressed and they be assured of protection and well-being when they were told to go with an unknown sage to an unknown place. This had to be done in private to maintain decorum of open court; everything cannot be discussed in public.

What might the king have told or advised them? Well, there may have been many things one can think of—he told his sons about the stupendous mystical powers of sage Vishwamitra, he advised them to treat the sage with the greatest of respect, to treat him like their own father, to obey his commands without second thoughts or questions, that they must think that they are going out on an excursion under the protection of a powerful guardian, sage Vishwamitra, and therefore they must enjoy every moment of it, that they will come back soon and so there is no need to feel homesick, and so on and so forth.

It was a moment of parting, so it is obvious and natural that at that moment the loving father would affectionately embrace his dear sons.

Then after all this, what happened next? All of them—i.e. Dasrath, Vasistha, Ram and Laxman—came out of the king’s private chambers back into the open court where Vishwamitra and others were waiting for them. This is obvious in the next line.

<sup>3</sup>Here, the wise king made Vishwamitra obliged to protect Lord Ram and Laxman by telling him that he is their father. Vishwamitra has already seen how much Dasrath loves them, so Dasrath implied that he expects the same love and affection from him for Ram and Laxman. A special bond was created now; a special responsibility befell on the shoulders of the great wise sage Vishwamitra.

Remember: It was not Dasrath coming to the hermitage of sage Vishwamitra with a request to keep his sons with him to train them on the scriptures or to teach them the art and skill of warfare for which the sage was famous. It was the other way round—it was Vishwamitra coming to Dasrath with the request to send his two sons with him.

Therefore, Vishwamitra was morally bound to accept certain conditions which Dasrath made before he handed over his two precious sons to him. And this condition was so sublime, free from any deceit or conceit, as well as heart-touching that even if the sage had wanted he would not have been able to gather the moral and ethical courage to refuse—‘to act like a father for two innocent, inexperienced princes, who had yet not seen or witnessed the harsh realities of life, while they were in his custody in a far away alien land and culture’.

Surely, Vishwamitra's heart must have boiled-over with surging waves of love and affection for the two brothers as soon as he heard the word "father" being used for himself. Not only this, whatever hidden annoyance he might have had for Dasrath for his initial reluctance also vanished in thin air.

A very interesting thing can be deduced on the sidelines of the text. There are ten (10) lines in this set of Chaupais—i.e. there are ten lines between Doha nos. 207 and 208. The significance is this: Lord Ram is the Supreme Being in a personified form; he is the cosmic Consciousness known as Brahm in the Upanishads. Without this Consciousness there is nothing in this creation; sans the Consciousness the creation is a lifeless void. That is, without Lord Ram the world is equivalent to 'zero'. Lord Ram is the only 'one' entity, as the cosmic Consciousness, that lends meaning and essence to this entire existence just like the case of the digit 'one' lending a ten-fold value to 'zero' when it is added to the latter. Otherwise, the 'zero' means nothing. Hence, from the metaphysical and spiritual angle these ten lines indicate that Lord Ram is the 'Pran' of this creation, he is the 'very life-force and essence' of this creation. If we look now about what Dasrath says for Ram, the meaning would become clear. The body of a man is useless if there is no life—or Pran—in it; so the world is also useless if one removes the Lord from it. And on the other hand, with the same logic, the world assumes manifold meaning and use for someone who sees the Lord everywhere just like the case of the digit 'one' being used to add value to the 'zero'.]

The king liberally blessed the sons (Lord Ram and Laxman) in various ways, and then handed over their charge (guardianship) to the sage (Vishwamitra). The Lord went to his mother's palace, bowed his head before her to seek her blessing and permission, and then started on his journey (with sage Vishwamitra). (Doha no. 208 Ka) [Note—Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 51, line nos. 3-4 also.

The king invoked many Gods and blessed his two sons, Lord Ram and Laxman profusely with their Mantras. He silently prayed to all the Gods to look after the welfare of his two beloved sons whom he is parting with for the first time in his life.

The king had told sage Vishwamitra that now onwards he is their father. So in essence the king held the hands of Lord Ram and Laxman and handed over them to their 'foster-father'. It is a normal custom that when one hands someone who is very dear to him to another person, he blesses him all the best of wishes. It's a courteous way of parting with someone.

Lord Ram, and of course Laxman also though he is not specifically mentioned here, went to take formal permission of their respective mothers, Kaushalya and Sumitra respectively. Laxman is understood by default because the sage had asked for both the brothers.

The Lord hurried through his meeting with the mother lest she would ask him a lot of uncomfortable questions—such as where was he going, what was the purpose of the journey, etc. In such a case the Lord would be in a fix—he could not lie, and if he disclosed the truth that he is going out of the kingdom on foot with a sage to help him protect his fire sacrifice against ruthless demons, then there was all probability that the mother would throw tantrums and try to stop him, creating another scene much more theatrical than how the father behaved.

Another reason is that the Lord did not want to give the impression that he was unwilling to go with the sage and could not say ‘no’ to his father in open court, so he has gone to hide behind his mother, pleading with her to do something to prevent him from going. Delay would mean that some kind of brief or detailed discussion transpired between the son and the mother wherein the mother somehow reassured her son and encouraged him not to be afraid but be brave and go ahead.

So, the Lord wasted no time in the mother’s palace.

A question arises—why was the mother not reluctant to allow Lord Ram to go with sage Vishwamitra? When the sage arrived and expressed the reason for his visit it was done openly, and not secretly. So it is not possible that the queens had no knowledge of what the sage wanted. The answer lies in verse no. 17, stanza no. 5 of Baal Kand of Geetwali, another wonderful book written by Tulsidas. It is said there that once a soothsayer had come to visit Ayodhya. The queen mother asked him to tell her about the future of her son, the child Ram. The wise man had foretold her that one day sage Vishwamitra would come and take him away on the pretext of protecting his fire sacrifice, but that later on Ram will be married with Sita during the same visit. So the mother was in the know of the good things that were to happen. Therefore she was more than willing to give her permission.

Besides this, the mother had some idea of the mystical nature of her son, Lord Ram. Two specific incidents point to this fact. At the time of birth of Lord Ram, the mother had a clear vision of Lord Vishnu manifesting himself with all the dazzle and splendour of thousands of suns before her. She had been blinded, and had prayed to Lord Vishnu to discard this superhuman form and become an ordinary human child. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chanda that precedes Doha no. 192.

Another incident occurred when the Lord was still a child. One day the mother put him to bed in his crib and went to her deity’s worship room to offer prayers. She found that Ram was enjoying the food meant as offering for the deity. She rushed back to the crib and found him sleeping peacefully. The mother felt dazed; she rushed to and fro and could not believe her eyes or her self at the magical sight she saw. It was then that the Lord had shown her his true cosmic, all-pervading form of the ‘Viraat Purush’. Mother Kaushalya fell at the feet of Lord Ram and pleaded with him never to show these wonders to her as she feels terrified and would die of shock or would faint. In other words, mother Kaushalya knew who Ram actually was. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 201—to Doha no. 202.

In contrast, Dasrath had no such divine experience. This is the fundamental reason why Dasrath was reluctant but the mother wasn’t to let Lord Ram accompany sage Vishwamitra.]

The two brave warriors (Ram and Laxman) were like lions among men. They cheerfully went with the sage to remove the cause of his fears.<sup>1</sup> *

The Lord (Sri Ram) is an ocean of mercy, compassion, kindness and grace. He is of a steady and resolute mind and determination. And he is the fundamental cause of the being (existence) of the whole world.<sup>2</sup> (Sortha no. 208 Kha) [Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 52, line nos. 1-2 also.

The Lord was about to face a huge army of ferocious demons. He was cheerful when he started on the journey with sage Vishwamitra though he knew fully well that he is not going on a picnic. This is why he is compared to a 'lion'. The lion is the king of the jungle; he is not terrified at the sight of a horde of wild elephants. A single lion can enter the horde of wild elephants fearlessly, jump on their back, and kill them one by one by tearing at their heads.

Likewise, Lord Ram was not scared at the prospect of having to face the demons. Hence, he is compared to the lion.

It is clearly said that there are 'two brave warriors who were like lions among men'. Hence, both Lord Ram as well as Laxman were equally strong and powerful.

<sup>2</sup>Three adjectives have been used here to qualify Lord Ram—(i) he is an ocean of mercy and compassionate, (ii) he is steadfast and resolute, and (iii) he is the cause of the coming into being of the world. All of them have relevance here.

The Lord will kill the demons not because he loves bloodshed or war, but he, being the Supreme Lord of this creation, has to ensure that all other creatures who are being endlessly and without rhyme or reason tormented and harassed by the cruel demons must be protected and allowed to live in peace. The demons won't mend their ways, so the Lord has no choice. But at the same time he will ensure that none of the demons killed by him go to hell because of their evil deeds. In other words, all the demons who Lord Ram killed got liberation and deliverance for their souls—that is, their souls were freed from the evil body of a demon and found emancipation and salvation. This is clearly mentioned in Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 45; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precedes Doha no. 114.

The same idea is expressed in another context—when Lord Ram used to hunt, the deer or any other animals that were shot by the Lord left their gross mortal bodies and went to the heaven where the Gods live. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 205.

Lord Vishnu had come down to earth to eliminate the burden of demons, and the Lord will leave no stone unturned to accomplish his mission. He had declared this in no uncertain terms that "I raise my hands and declare that I will make the earth free from the tyranny of demons". Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Doha no. 9.

By emphasizing the Lord's cosmic form as the Supreme Being and Creator of the entire universe, it is stressed that the reader must mentally prepare himself to understand the hidden meaning and draw subtler inferences from the miraculous events that were about to unfold. Let the reader be warned that he must see the incidents in the context of the fact that the protagonist is not an ordinary human being but the Supreme Being himself, for otherwise he would become highly skeptical about the authenticity and the truth of the magical events that will now happen in one after another.

*It ought to be noted here that king Dasrath did not send his army or even helpers with his sons whom he loved so much and for whom he was so much worried inspite of being fully aware that they are going to fight demons. Well, when sage Vasistha enlightened him about the astounding potentials and powers of sage Vishwamitra, the king became reassured about the security of his two sons. If he had proposed to send army troops with Ram and Laxman it would mean that he had no confidence on sage Vishwamitra's ability to protect the two princes. That would be highly offensive and insulting for the mighty sage. It would have had disastrous consequences: Vishwamitra, who was already smarting by the king's initial refusal to send Lord Ram and Laxman with him, would have been further angered and his emotions ruffled the wrong way. It would have inflamed his annoyance with the king, and it would have been tantamount to publicly undermining the sage's powers, strength and abilities. Therefore, the king was wise enough to keep quiet and not inflame things further by proposing to send troops or attendants with Ram and Laxman.

Another reason is that no warning should be given to the demons who were tormenting sage Vishwamitra that they are about to be killed. This was sure to happen if a huge army assembled at the hermitage of the sage. The demons would be forewarned, and they wouldn't come to attack. So how would they be destroyed? It was therefore prudent to keep a low profile so that they are trapped. With only two young boys guarding the fire sacrifice, the demons would have no suspicion of what was in store for them as compared to the sight of a huge army doing the job.

Though no dates are mentioned here, it is believed in tradition that sage Vishwamitra had arrived at Ayodhya on the 9th day of the dark lunar fortnight of the Hindu month of Aashwin which is the 7th month that commences when the sun enters the constellation of Virgo that corresponds to mid of September, and departed with the two brothers on 12th day of the month. In other words, he stayed at Ayodhya for 3 days.]

[The wonderful beauty and the bewitching charm of the Supreme Lord's physical form are being described now.]

The Lord (Sri Ram) had bewitching red-coloured eyes. His chest was broad and his arms were long and muscular. His body and countenance were dark blue like the colour of the dark rain-bearing clouds (or even the blue-coloured lotus flower) as well as the Tamaal tree (the black catechu plant). (1)

He (Lord Ram) had the Pitambar and a quiver wrapped around his waist. [The 'Pitambar' is a yellow silk seamless cloth that is wrapped around the body, especially the lower half around the waist and downwards. The quiver filled with arrows was tied to the Lord's waist.] He held a beautiful bow and arrows in his hands. (2)

[Note—Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 52, stanza nos. 2-3; verse no. 53, stanza nos. 1-2; and verse no. 54, stanza nos. 1-2 also.

The Lord's eyes are red because he is angry that some kind of misery has befallen sage Vishwamitra that had forced the otherwise calm and dispassionate sage to come and ask for help and succour. The Lord was angry at the demons.

Lord Ram is a personified form of Lord Vishnu who in turn is the 'Viraat Purush', the cosmic form of the Supreme Being whose countenance is likened to the colour of the sky when it is filled with rain-bearing clouds. This is an important metaphor and a significant symbolism. It means that Lord Vishnu is as vast as the sky, being all-pervading and all-encompassing. Nothing exists beyond the limit of the sky, and so nothing exists outside the Lord. The sky is inherently dark in the cosmic background; we see it as blue because of the physical phenomenon of scattering of light of the sun in the atmosphere of the earth. So, since Lord Vishnu has appeared on earth as Lord Ram though the Lord has a cosmic existence, both the colours—'dark' and 'blue' are used to describe the colour of the Lord's complexion in his manifestation as Lord Ram.

Comparison to the 'rain-bearing cloud' is made to emphasize that like this cloud which pours the life-sustaining rain upon the earth which would parch and all its creatures would die if there was no rain, Lord Vishnu too sustains and protects all forms of life in this creation.

The Tamaal tree (black catechu plant) is about 15-20 arms length in height. It grows on mountains as well as on the banks of river Yamuna. Its flowers are red in colour, and leaves dark green.

His chest and arms are well-formed and muscular; they are broad and long respectively indicating that he is a great warrior who can extend help beyond the scope of ordinary human beings. The 'long arms' of the Lord are especially indicative of this—that his reach is long and beyond measurement. The 'broad chest' is indicative of the fact that the Lord is very forgiving and compassionate; he welcomes all and accepts them, whether a friend or foe, with equal warmth but with one condition—and it is that the other person must surrender before the Lord with complete humility and dispassion.

Remember: The same Lord Ram who killed so many demons including their king Ravana had welcomed and accepted Vibhishan, the brother of Ravana, as a member of his group when he had come to seek the Lord's refuge and to surrender himself before him. At that time, Lord Ram had clearly declared that even if a creature had committed great sins, but if he comes to surrender himself and seek forgiveness from the Lord, he is most welcome and assured of the Lord's patronage. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 42—to Doha no. 44.

The presence of the quiver, bow and arrow indicate that Lord Ram is ready for battle with the demons. The Pitambar is symbolic of the fact that he is none else but Lord Vishnu as this cloth is the trademark apparel of the latter.

The three armaments of Lord Ram are his bow, arrow and the quiver. They are said to be 'beautiful'. What is the beauty of them? The beauty or the glory or the special quality of the ‘bow’ is that it never gets broken, of the ‘arrow’ is that it never fails to hit the target, and of the ‘quiver’ is that it is never empty of arrows.]

Sage Vishwamitra got a matchless (spiritual and divine) treasure in the form of the two beautiful (handsome, enchanting, captivating and wonderful) brothers (Ram and Laxman) who were respectively of a dark and fair complexion<sup>1</sup>. (3)

The sage told Lord Ram—‘Oh Lord, I have realised that you are a ‘Brahmanya-deva’ (‘prabhu brahman'yadēva’)—i.e. you are the Lord who is worshipped and adored by the learned Brahmins. In other words, you are a personified form of ‘Brahm’, the Supreme Being and the cosmic Consciousness of this creation. Oh Lord, you have left your father for my sake.

[So, I just can't find words to express my gratitude and thanks to you. I am extremely obliged and feel exemplarily happy and blissful. Thank you for giving me this honour!] (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 53, stanza no. 1, and verse no. 54, stanza no. 2 also.

Lord Ram is a personified form of the Supreme Being, and Laxman is an epitome of Bhakti (devotion) for the Lord. In the entire story of the Ramayan, Laxman has stood by the side of the Lord like a man's shadow follows him wherever he goes. Laxman symbolizes that spiritual character which stands for complete and unquestioned dedication and submission for the Lord no matter what happens. That is why Laxman is as beautiful as the Lord himself. Lord Ram held Laxman dearest to his heart, he could not live without him to give us a message that the only character that pleases the Lord is to have devotion for him. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line nos. 9-10 that precedes Doha no. 61 in which Lord Ram clearly declares that his life is useless without Laxman just like a serpent is without his Mani (the gem-like effervescent sac present on the hood of a special category of serpents without which they can't see), and a bird is without its wings.

Lord Ram is the cosmic Consciousness known as the ‘Pran’ or the vital life sustaining force of creation. Without Pran and Consciousness there can be no life in this creation. What good is a dead world without life in it? What good is a granary without eatable grains in it; what good is a treasury without saleable and cashable assets in it which can be sold and cashed to meet the owner's financial needs in cases of emergencies?

Hence, both Lord Ram and Laxman are ‘beautiful’ and ‘like great treasury’ for the lucky sage Vishwamitra.

The two colours ‘dark’ and ‘fair’ represent Lord Vishnu and his divine conch. Vishnu has the dark colour of the sky, and his conch is of a white colour. The cosmic sound of OM is said to have its origin in this conch. The conch, known as a ‘Shankha’ in Sanskrit, is a priceless gem produced by the ocean at the time of its churning by the demons and the gods in search of Amrit, the ambrosia of eternity and bliss. The entire creation is said to have originated by the dynamic sound energy generated when this divine conch was sounded by Vishnu in his primary form as the Viraat Purush. In other words, while Lord Ram represents this Viraat Purush, Laxman represents the latter's conch which heralded the arrival of the Lord and the existence of his dynamic energy that would not only create but also sustain and protect the creation that was about to be created.

The word used in the text is 'Maha-Nidhi'. 'Nidhi' means an asset, and the prefix 'Maha' means 'great'. Hence, Lord Ram and Laxman are not merely assets for sage Vishwamitra, they are his 'great asset'. A man will never lose something that has immense value for him; sage Vishwamitra therefore decided that he has got the reward of all his Tapa in the form of the two brothers and he will protect them with his life. This is in answer to the king's request to take care of them like he was their own father.

Remember: King Dasrath had told the sage that he is willing to give him anything he wants—his whole treasury, his kingdom, cows etc., he even offered himself to the sage. But the king was unwilling to part with Ram and Laxman. True, because no one would willingly like to part with a 'Maha-Nidhi' that he values more than the rest of the assets he possesses. This 'Maha-Nidhi' which Dasrath held close to his heart has now been transferred to sage Vishwamitra. Hence it is apt to say that the great sage got the 'Maha-Nidhi' in the form of the two brothers, Lord Ram and Laxman.

The very next verse tells us why Vishwamitra treated Lord Ram as a 'Maha-Nidhi' <sup>2</sup>How did the wise sage realise that Ram was no ordinary prince but the Supreme Lord himself? Well, the hints are obvious. When the sage had disclosed that he wishes to take Lord Ram to fight ferocious demons who no one else dare face, an ordinary prince would have been scared out of his wits and tried all possible excuses to avoid going with the sage to willingly fall in this trap. It was no so with Ram; he cheerfully and excitedly accompanied the sage as if he was going out to play some game. The prospect of having to face blood-thirst demons did not terrify him a bit. This is clearly because Lord Ram, who was an incarnation of Lord Vishnu, knew that this was the very purpose why he had come down to earth, and so he was rather itching for this opportunity rather than running away from it.

Say, what could the sage have done if Ram himself had expressed his incompetence at fighting the demons—which under no imagination was an easy job? But the Lord willingly and cheerfully joined the sage with great confidence, not even asking him how big the demon and his army was, or what would other support he can expect in the battle, or whether the sage would help in the battle, and so on. This filled the sage not only with great admiration and gratitude for Lord Ram but also signaled to him that what he had thought before coming to Ayodhya was indeed true—i.e. Lord Vishnu had come in the form of Lord Ram to destroy the demons. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 206.

This subtle hint was not lost on the enlightened sage Vishwamitra. He immediately realised the secret truth behind the external façade of Lord Ram's appearance as an ordinary human prince. The Lord had some great job to do, and he could not afford to waste time to respect the lovable emotions of his father Dasrath who has had sufficient time to enjoy the bliss and ecstasy of being near to the Lord as he had desired in his previous life as king Manu who had done Tapa to have the Lord as his son. The wheel of time waits for none; so Lord Ram cannot go on indefinitely playing the role of a child just to please the king when more important work was pending. Things had to be prioritized.]

The Lord (Sri Ram) took her life with a single arrow. Realizing that she was miserable and deserved mercy and compassion, the gracious Lord provided her soul the exalted stature of his own divine state—i.e. she was graced with liberation and deliverance, and her soul found emancipation and salvation.<sup>2</sup> (6)*

As soon as she was within sight, the sage pointed her out to Lord Ram who wasted no time to shoot her down with a single arrow.

Remember: There was no time to procrastinate and shoot another arrow. So the Lord hit directly at her, killing her instantly.

<sup>2</sup>All the male and female demons had become such because of some curse they incurred due to their mischief or because of the evil deeds they had been doing in many of their previous lives. But their evil and sinful body harboured a soul, known as the Atma, which is inherently pure and which yearned to break free from this cage-like evil body of a demon. The Atma could not succeed in it because the body continued to perpetrate its evil deeds which resulted in continued accumulation of punishment in the form of continuity of the evil body of a demon. Had any one of these demons mended their way and shunned doing evil deeds, their souls would have found automatic liberation as per the laws of Nature. But unfortunately it was not to be so.

To prove this point that if the demons had had the wisdom to mend their ways in spite of living in the body of a demon they would have found auspiciousness and welfare for their souls, we have a sterling example in the Ramayan itself—he is Vibhishan, the demon brother of Ravana, the king of the demon race. Vibhishan abhorred the life of a demon; he lived a life of a religious man. He worshipped Lord Vishnu and repeated the great Mantra “Ram” as prescribed in the Upanishads. This word “Ram” is said to be a ‘Tarak Mantra’—i.e. it is a spiritual formula which helps the soul to attain freedom from the body and the world, and find emancipation and salvation. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 6.

The result was that he did find succour in the holy feet of Lord Ram, and the eternal kingdom of Lanka after the sinful demons were eliminated. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 42—to Doha no. 49.

So, when Lord Ram killed the demoness Tadakaa, it was actually freeing her soul that was trapped in the evil body of a female demon. It was the physical gross body that was hit by the arrow, and not the subtle body which harbours the Atma. Once the gross body of Tadakaa, which is like a shell over the soft kernel, was ruptured by the Lord's arrow, the soft inner-self spilled out, and the soul living inside it found its liberation.]

तब रिषि निज नाथहि जियँ चीन्ही । बिद्यानिधि कहँ बिद्या दीन्ही ॥ ७ ॥
जाते लाग न छुधा पिपासा । अतुलित बल तनु तेज प्रकासा ॥ ८ ॥

taba riṣi nija nāthahi jiyam' cīnhī. bidyānidhi kahum' bidyā dīnhī. 7.
jātē lāga na chudhā pipāsā. atulita bala tanu tēja prakāsā. 8.

Then the great sage recognized who his Lord actually was<sup>1</sup>.

Once this awareness dawned upon the sage, he gave (taught) all the knowledge that he had to the 'Lord of knowledge', the Lord who was himself a treasury of knowledge (bidyānidhi)<sup>2</sup>. (7)

This divine eclectic knowledge that the sage imparted to Lord Ram incorporated, inter alia, such mystical abilities as being able to overcome thirst and hunger, and it empowered the possessor of the knowledge with stupendous strength, astounding valour and super-human powers so much so that his glory and dynamism effused from him like a halo that lent his body a divine glow<sup>3</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The sage has already told Lord Ram that he has realised who he was a little while ago in Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 209 above. So, what happened that he had to say that he recognized the Lord again for the second time? Well, this is the mysterious way Lord's Maya (delusion creating powers) acts. This Maya had the greatest of wise men held in its snare.

The sage had for some time forgotten the reality of who Lord Ram and Laxman were because of the fun, frolicking and child-like pranks that the two brothers had been playing with each other and with the sage while they were walking on the path to his hermitage. The sage's hermitage was far away from the kingdom of Ayodhya.

Remember: the place where they saw Tadakaa was beyond the boundary of Ayodhya—for the simple reason that its king Dasrath would not have allowed her, or for that matter any other demon, to survive within his realm. Sage Vishwamitra's hermitage was in Magadh, a great distance from the kingdom of Ayodhya. So the three—i.e. the sage and the two brothers—had been walking together for quite some time. During this journey, the Lord and his brother had acted like ordinary children of their age to provide the great sage the benefit of a lifetime—the same benefit, the same happiness and the same bliss that the Supreme Lord had given Dasrath by becoming his son and playing around in his household.

Dasrath had told the sage that now onwards he is like their ‘father’. So, the sage too wanted to taste and enjoy the divine bliss that Dasrath may have got by acting as the ‘father’ of the Supreme Lord. Hence, the Lord decided to oblige the sage by casting his Maya upon the sage’s intellect and wisdom, eclipsing them. The fun and frolic and enjoyments of the journey have been very vividly described in Geetawali, Baal Kand, verse nos. 53—56. Refer specifically to stanza no. 5 of verse no. 52 which says— “On the way, the two brothers would sometimes rush into a pond, or climb on a boulder to watch transfixed at the beauty of the forest dwelling birds, animals and trees. The sage got scared for their safety at this behaviour, and he would urgently call them back.”

Again, in stanza nos. 3-4 of verse no. 54 it is said that “The two boys make a lot of fun and do strange things as they walked along with the sage on the path. They pluck flowers and leaves from trees, and lotus along the banks of rivers and lakes on the way. Then they would drink cool water from these rivers and lakes and stand there relaxing for quite some time. They sit down on some boulders under the shade of some tree, adoring the scene, the shade and the soft breeze. The peacocks begin to dance when they watch the two brothers, and the birds such as the parrot and the cuckoo as well as the bumble bees sing merrily when they see the brothers.”

All these things mesmerized the sage so much so that for many days he forgot who Ram was just like Dasrath who forgot who his son Ram actually was.

Then the reality struck upon Vishwamitra like lightening when Tadakaa came howling for his blood. He was shaken out of his dream. That is why he ‘realised or recognized who Lord Ram was for the second time’.

It must be kept in mind that in order to understand the story of the Ramayan, we have to distil available information and peep behind the curtain to be able to visualize what actually must have been happening behind the scene. Though the outline of the story in all the versions of the Ramayan is similar, they differ in finer details.

<sup>2</sup>Sage Vishwamitra was an expert in the knowledge of warfare. He was a great warrior before becoming a sage. So, when he woke up from his day-dreaming he gladly initiated Lord Ram and taught him the intricacies of the science of warfare. This included the ability to overcome thirst and hunger because it was necessary for the future when Lord Ram and Laxman would have to spend long time wandering in the deep recesses of the forest during their exile and the journey that would culminate in the epic battle of Lanka where all the evil demons would be killed and eliminated.

Remember: This knowledge was transmitted to both Lord Ram as well as Laxman. The all-knowing sage was aware of the fact that Laxman would have to share the responsibility of eliminating the demons along with Lord Ram, so both had to be prepared for the job.

Since Lord Ram is the Supreme Being himself personified, it is said that he is the ‘treasury of knowledge’. But now the Lord had to act normally like a human being, and so some formality of giving and accepting knowledge had to be fulfilled.

Earlier, when Lord had grown up and reached the age when a boy is sent to a teacher for his education, the Lord was sent to the hermitage of sage Vasistha in a routine manner for his education. The Lord acquired knowledge rapidly in very short time. Really it is a wonder that the Lord whose breath constitutes the four Vedas, the primary scriptures that contain all the knowledge that exist in this creation, should learn and acquire knowledge from someone else, in this case his teacher sage Vasistha. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-6 that precede Doha no. 204.

दो०. आयुध सर्व समर्पि कै प्रभु निज आश्रम आनि । कंद मूल फल भोजन दीन्ह भगति हित जानि ॥ २०९ ॥
dōhā.

āyudha sarba samarpi kai prabhu nija āśrama āni.
kanda mūla phala bhōjana dīnha bhagati hita jāni. 209.

The sage submitted all his mystical weapons and the knowledge pertaining to their skillful use to the Lord<sup>1</sup>, and then reverentially brought him to his hermitage<sup>2</sup>.

At the hermitage, he offered edible roots and stems as well as fruits to the Lord with great devotion because he (the sage) had realised that the Lord is the best well-wisher of his devotees<sup>3</sup>. (Doha no. 209)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Here it means that the sage, who was renowned for his knowledge of the science and art of weapons and warfare, transferred that knowledge to Lord Ram and Laxman. It means that he taught them all that he knew in connection with the science and art of weapons, and how to invoke their Mantras and use them during warfare.

When Lord Ram had shot the ferocious female demon Tadakaa effortlessly with a single shot of an arrow, Vishwamitra was stunned and awe-struck. At that time he realised that Lord Ram was no ordinary warrior, for Tadakaa was a colossus demoness who resembled a flying serpent with thousands of hissing hoods.

This on the one hand filled the sage with great satisfaction that he was correct in thinking that Lord Ram would indeed be able to destroy the demons, but on the other hand he was humbled. Previously he had thought that there was no one on this earth who was more expert in archery and other forms of weaponry than he. But now it was like the case of a camel, which was proud of its tall frame, standing below a tall coconut tree or a lofty mountain whose summit kisses the sky. It was also like the case of a perennial river, which was proud of its endless content of water, seeing the mighty ocean.

The sage thought to himself that he be shamed. He calls himself a ‘sage’, but is so selfishly guarding the secret knowledge of weapons which ought to be used for the general good of the world by putting them into effect in the process of the elimination of the demons that would help to restore peace upon the earth. After all he knew that he won’t use them anytime because he had taken a vow to be calm and serene and never to be angry and hurt anyone. This was the vow that prevented him from destroying the demons who had been tormenting him and defiling his fire sacrifices.

The sage has explained the reason himself in Valmiki’s Ramayana where he said that he could not kill the demons who were defiling his fire sacrifice because he had taken a vow of observing self-restraint, maintain mental calmness and serenity, and not being angry or wrathful on anyone while the sacrifice was in progress. If he punished the demons by cursing them, then it would violate this vow, and the whole exercise would be spoilt.

Refer: (i) Valmiki's Ramayana, Baal Kand, Sarga/Canto 19, verse nos. 7-20; and (ii) Tulsidas' Geetawali, Baal Kand, verse no. 47, stanza nos. 1-2, and verse no. 66, stanza no. 2.

Now therefore, sage Vishwamitra thought that it would be highly improper and selfish for him not to divulge this secret knowledge of weapons to Lord Ram and Laxman who he himself have selected to destroy the demon race. So he willingly taught the two brothers the secret of all the mystical weapons which could be immediately summoned and used at the opportune moment when they were required to be employed.

These weapons were not physical weapons, but mystical ones that relied on invocation of respective Mantras, which were magical formulas that helped the concerned weapon to present its self when the Mantra relevant to it was invoked.

Details of these weapons have been narrated in Valmiki's Ramayan, 1/27/4-21, and 1/28/4-12. These weapons could be invoked by their respective Mantras. Similarly, they could also be neutralized by Mantras which are outlined in Valmiki's Ramayan, 1/28/4-12.

A brief list of these weapons is as follows—Danda-chakra, Dharma-chakra, Kaal-chakra, Vishnu-chakra, Ayendra-chakra, Vajraastra, Lord Shiva's Shul, Brahma-shir, Ayeshik, Brahmaastra, the two maces named Modaki and Shikhari, Kaal-paash, Dharma-paash, Varun-paash, the two Ashanis named Shushka and Aadra, Shiva-astra, Narayan-aastra, Shikhar the weapon of the Fire God, Vaayabya, Hayashir, Kroncha, the two Shaktis, Kankaal, Mushal, Kapaal, Kinkini, Nandan, the weapon of the Gandharvas known as Moha-naastra, Praswaapan, Prashman, Varshan, Shoshan, Santaapan and Vilaapan weapons of Kamdeo, Durgharsha Maadan Maanav, Mohan, Taamas, Sauman, Samvarta, Mausala, Satya, Mayamaye, the Tej (energy) of the Sun God, Prabhu-astra, the weapon of the Moon God named Shishir, the ferocious Twaa-shtra, and Shiteshu.

<sup>3</sup>Sage Vishwamitra realised that Lord Vishnu had agreed to take so much trouble to come down to earth and walk all the distance to his hermitage just because he wishes to oblige his devotees. This was all the more evident to the sage when Lord Ram and Laxman had acted like innocent young boys, playing around and making fun as they wend their way from Ayodhya to the hermitage of the sage. The Lord did all this to satisfy the sage's desire to taste the happiness that a father gets playing with his sons. Hence, he offered great respect to the Lord because the Lord is a well-wisher of his devotees.

चौ०. प्रात कहा मुनि सन रघुराई । निर्भय जग्य करहु तुह जाई ॥ १ ॥

होम करन लागे मुनि झारी । आपु रहे मख कीं रखवारी ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

prāta kahā muni sana raghurāī. nirbhaya jagya karahu tumha jāī. 1.

hōma karana lāgē muni jhārī. āpu rahē makha kīm rakhavārī. 2.

At dawn, the Lord of the Raghu dynasty, Lord Ram, told the sage—‘Oh sage, go and do your fire sacrifice without having any fear whatsoever.’<sup>1</sup> (1)

All the sages collected together and immediately started making offerings to the sacred fire (i.e. they did ‘Homa’). Meanwhile, Lord Ram himself (of course, with Laxman by his side) stood at attention to guard the fire sacrifice<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The sages of the hermitage were so terrified of the demons that they had suspended the fire sacrifices ever since their chief Vishwamitra had gone to fetch Lord Ram. So, the Lord told them to resume their religious observances and perform the fire sacrifice. Lord Ram’s confidence is self-evident.

One outstanding point to note here is that the Lord has virtually commanded the sages to go ahead with the fire sacrifice. He did not seek Vishwamitra’s orders or permission for this. Wonderful indeed! The Lord indicated that now he is in charge; that the rest of the sages are now in his safe-keeping; that he is the one who will decide what to do and what not to do like a true Lord and Master!

Well, the Supreme Lord was in his true form and mettle at that moment. He did not need anyone’s permission to fulfill the divine mandate for which he has taken birth as a human being. Rather, he is the one who would regulate how things would take shape now. The wise sages did not take this as an affront at all; rather they welcomed this confidence of Lord Ram and were reassured that they indeed were safe in his hands. This self-confident and robust attitude of the Lord instilled faith and confidence in the heart of even those sages who may have been skeptical in the beginning when they had first seen the two young princes who sage Vishwamitra brought from such great distance.

<sup>2</sup>The fire sacrifice is an elaborate affair, but making offerings to the fire is the main part of the sacrifice as this offering is received directly by the Fire God and other Gods who find sustenance from it.

Other preliminaries such as doing Japa (repetition of Mantras) and different incantations did not cause much problem for the sages because they could do it silently without alerting the demons. But whenever they offered anything to the fire, fumes arose in the sky, and this obviously signaled to the demons that the fire sacrifice was in progress. They immediately attacked. So this time, the sages came out in the open and offered the Homa to the sacred fire.

The word in the text is “Jhaari” which means to pour liquid from a pitcher with an elongated neck and a spout at its end. This indicates that they were in a great hurry as they were quickly making the offerings, almost pouring them as fast as they could into the fire pit, to be able to complete it before the demons arrived.

The sages were performing the fire sacrifice at the designated place, while the two brothers stood guard outside, ready for battle with their bows and arrows in hand.]

सुनि मारीच निसाचर क्रोही । लै सहाय धावा मुनिद्रोही ॥ ३ ॥

बिनु फर बान राम तेहि मारा । सत जोजन गा सागर पारा ॥ ४ ॥

पावक सर सुबाहु पुनि मारा । अनुज निसाचर कटकु सँघारा ॥ ५ ॥

sunī mārīca nisācara krōhī. lai sahāya dhāvā munidrōhī. 3.
 binu phara bāna rāma tēhi mārā. sata jōjana gā sāgara pārā. 4.
 pāvaka sara subāhu puni mārā. anuja nisācara kaṭaku samghārā. 5.

As soon as the demon chief named Marich (mārīca)—who was an enemy of the sages and harboured animosity towards them—heard this news, he collected his companions and attacked<sup>1</sup>. (3)

Lord Ram shot at Marich with an arrow's shaft (i.e. an arrow that did not have its pointed tip). The thrust of the shaft flung him (Marich) a hundred Yujans away across into the ocean. [1 Yojan = roughly 8 miles on an average. There are different scales of measurements according to which 1 Yojan means 4, 8 or 16 miles.]<sup>2</sup> (4)

Then the Lord hit and killed Subahu with a fire-tipped arrow which burnt him to ashes<sup>3</sup>. Meanwhile, all the rest of the attacking demon army was killed and immediately eliminated by the Lord's younger brother (Laxman). (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Marich is said to have 'heard' and not 'seen' the sages doing the fire sacrifice. What does this mean? He was the chief commander of the demons who was appointed by their king Ravana of Lanka to prevent the sages of the area under his command from doing any religious activity. Being the chief commander, it is natural that he must have appointed demon guards and watches in different areas under his command to keep an eye on the developments and report to him at his command head-quarters should they observe any religious activity. So, as soon as the sages started offering Homa to the fire and fumes rose up into the sky, the demons who were appointed to watch these sages saw these fumes and immediately reported the matter to their chief, Marich. This is why Marich is said to have 'heard' and not personally 'seen' the sages doing the fire sacrifice.

So he collected his demon army and summoned his brother named Subahu (pronounced as Su-baa-hoo) to launch an attack.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Ram could have killed Marich with an arrow with a pointed tip. But the Lord needed him later on to accomplish the task of killing the chief of the demon race, their king Ravana. So he spared his life and merely flung him into the ocean.

When we read the story of the Ramayan we see that Ravana had approached Marich to force him to assume the form of a golden deer so that he can steal Sita from the forest. This would lead Lord Ram to Lanka in search of her, and will culminate in the epic war that would help the Lord to kill Ravana and the rest of the evil demon race.

Had Lord Ram killed Marich at this moment, the greater plan of the Lord would have suffered. If Marich survived, he is sure to inform his lord Ravana about the developments. If the entire demon army was killed there would be no one left to inform Ravana and hint him that his nemesis has arrived. Marich was the chief demon appointed by Ravana, so he had direct access to him. Therefore it was prudent for Lord Ram to spare him so that a direct message of challenge could be conveyed to Ravana, the demon king, that the days of his tyranny are over and that the sages would soon be able to perform religious duties without fear.

<sup>3</sup>Meanwhile it is significant that he killed Subahu by 'burning him'. In Hinduism, when a person dies his body is cremated in the fire, and it is reduced to ashes. This is believed to free the soul permanently from the snare of having to enter the gross body once again. Cremation is performing the last rite of the dead with great respect. Usually, the son performs the cremation of his father.

Thus, by ‘burning’ the gross body of Subahu instead of simply killing him, the merciful Lord Ram had symbolically done his last rites by ‘cremating’ him himself. How wonderful! How fortunate was Subahu that his soul was liberated after being freed from the snare of the gross body of a demon when Lord Ram killed him with his arrow, and the gross body itself was ‘cremated’ by getting burnt at the hands of none else but the Supreme Lord himself.

Remember: Laxman is Lord Vishnu’s Shakti in a personified form. So, while the main job was done by the Lord himself, his Shakti finished the rest of the job for him. Hence it is said that the rest of the demons were killed by Laxman.

There is another reason why Laxman killed the demon army. Lord Ram wished to give the message that no one should under-estimate Laxman and his powers in their enthusiasm for honouring and praising Lord Ram. Laxman deserves equal praise and equal honour as the Lord himself.]

tahaṁ puni kachuka divasa raghurāyā. rahē kīnhi bipranha para dāyā. 7.
bhagati hētu bahu kathā purānā. kahē bipra jadyapi prabhu jānā. 8.

After the demons were killed, all the Gods and the sages who were involved in doing fire sacrifices (that were being constantly defiled by the demons) got together to offer their prayers to the Lord who is committed to make the Brahmins free from fear<sup>1</sup>. (6)

The Lord of the Raghu dynasty (i.e. Lord Ram) stayed there for some more days to show grace upon the Brahmins and make them feel fortunate<sup>2</sup>. (7)

During the time the Lord stayed there at the hermitage, the sages (Brahmins; ‘Bipra’) entertained him by narrating many devotional stories* from the Purans (ancient history of the Hindus) though the all-knowing Lord knew them<sup>3</sup>.

[This line can be interpreted in another way as follows—‘Out of their devotion and love for the Lord, the sages (Brahmins; ‘Bipra’) narrated many glorious stories from the Purans to him to entertain him though the Lord knew all of them.’] (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The Gods came first to offer their obeisance and prayers to Lord Ram, and they were followed by the sages who did the fire sacrifices. This is because the Gods were exceptionally happy as it was after a very long time that they could find nourishment by way of successful offerings that were made to the sacred fire by the sages. The offerings that are made to the sacred fire of the sacrifice give sustenance to the Gods. The Gods were eternal enemies of the demons. This was one main reason why the demons defiled the fire sacrifices so that the Gods would be starved of food and become weak and unable to oppose them.

The sages became enemies of the demons because they performed fire sacrifices in which they offered food to the Gods, something which the demons wanted to stop. These facts are clearly mentioned in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 181 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 5-8.

Lord Vishnu had earlier promised the Gods, the sages, and Mother Earth that he would take birth as Lord Ram to give protection to them as well as the Brahmins who were being endlessly tormented by the demons. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that precede Doha no. 187.

Hence, both the Gods and the sages performing fire sacrifices assembled to say their thanks to Lord Ram and Laxman after the demons were eliminated.

<sup>2</sup>The Lord stayed for some more days to ensure that no new attacks from the demons are made. He wished to secure the area. The sages harboured doubt that though Marich and Subahu were killed, there was all probability that their king Ravana would order stronger demon force to attack and kill them the next time. So, they must have requested the Lord to stay for some more days to protect them and guard the fire sacrifices.

Now, the question arises: why did the demon king Ravana not order an attack on the hermitage again? Well, there are many possibilities. One is that all the commanders whom Ravana may have asked to go and take revenge must have pleaded that they be excused because all of them were terrified about their own safety after having learnt the fate of Marich, Subahu and their army. When Ravana apprehended a virtual mutiny or revolt in the ranks of the demon forces if he insisted and threatened them much, he decided to keep quiet and wait for an opportunity to take revenge himself later on. Another reason may have been that no one might have gathered enough courage to go and inform him directly about the elimination of the demon army at sage Vishwamitra's hermitage for fear of his own life because the angry Ravana might have killed the informer in a fit of rage. So everyone avoided him. That is why no one came to attack the sages again.

According to Adhyatma Ramayan of Veda Vyas, Lord Ram and Laxman stayed at the hermitage for three more days. On the fourth day, sage Vishwamitra asked Lord Ram to accompany him to witness the bow breaking ceremony at Janakpur. Refer: Adhyatma Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 5, verse nos. 11-12.

By staying for some more days instead of immediately returning to Ayodhya after having successfully finished the work for which he was brought to the hermitage by sage Vishwamitra, Lord Ram seemed to oblige the sages present there who were very eager to have the Lord in their midst for some more days in order to enjoy his divine and auspicious company. It would have been highly selfish and un-courteous for the sages to have allowed Lord Ram and Laxman to go back from their hermitage immediately after their objective of having the demons killed was accomplished. No good host would do that; it's against the principles of hospitality.

Besides this, the sages had by now realised that Lord Ram was no ordinary prince but some Divine Being, though they might not have been aware of the Lord's true identity as much as Vishwamitra was. So therefore, they must have requested him to give them the privilege of his company for some more days because no one knows that such a chance would ever come again in their lives or not.

<sup>3</sup>Some way had to be found to pass time away in a positive manner, and so instead of idling it away and gossiping unnecessarily, the sages decided to narrate many interesting stories from ancient history that laid stress on devotion, love and submission for the Lord God as it helped in their spiritual pursuit as well as passing time constructively. The sages would always talk about things that had some spiritual quotient in it; they would not waste time in worthless chatter or gossip.

Lord Ram had obliged the sages by coming all the way from Ayodhya to their hermitage to protect their fire sacrifice. So, now these sages felt that they must do something for him to show their gratitude and thanks to the Lord. For sages and seers the only way to do this is to give a discourse on the scriptures. They selected devotional stories instead of hard-core philosophy because they thought that stories are much more entertaining than philosophy. They had started treating Lord Ram and Laxman as their sons, like the case of sage Vishwamitra.

It is said in Adhyatma Ramayan that during this period sage Vishwamitra had affectionately fed Lord Ram sweet fruits and entertained him with stories from the Purans. Refer: Adhyatma Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 5, verse no. 11.

Though the Lord knew these stories he still listened to them patiently and politely to oblige the sages and keep them happy. A similar thing has happened when sage Vasistha narrated stories from the Purans and the Vedas. The Lord listened silently and attentively though he knew all of them. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 26.

The actual intent of the sages in telling these stories to the Lord was to express their own devotion and submission for him through the medium of these stories. This is the reason why the Lord heard them politely to indicate to these aged sages that he has got the hint.

*Remember: Lord Ram has himself declared that out of the many forms that Bhakti (devotion) takes, the first is to have company or communion with pious people and saints, and the second it to have deep interest in hearing and telling devotional stories related to me. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 35.

Both these conditions are met here—there is a community of sages who pious people, and there is narration and listening of devotional stories. This is why the word “Bhakti” is used first in this verse.]

तब मुनि सादर कहा बुझाई । चरित एक प्रभु देखिअ जाई ॥ ९ ॥

धनुषजग्य मुनि रघुकुल नाथा । हरषि चले मुनिबर के साथ ॥ १० ॥

taba muni sādara kahā bujhā'ī. carita ēka prabhu dēkhi'a jā'ī. 9.
dhanuṣajagya suni raghukula nāthā. haraṣi calē munibara kē sāthā. 10.

Then the sage (Vishwamitra) respectfully explained to the Lord (Sri Ram) that a wonderful and rare event is taking place (at Janakpur), and so let us go and see it. (9)

When the Lord of the Raghu's clan (i.e. Lord Ram) heard of the 'Dhanush Yagya' (the bow-breaking ceremony), he gladly accepted the offer to accompany the sage there. (10)

[Note—The Lord had stayed in the hermitage for three days, and when he was sure that there was no more threat from the demons, he sought permission from sage Vishwamitra to go back home. It was 'then' that the sage told him about the rare competitive event taking place at Janakpur where Lord Shiva's bow is to be lifted, strung and broken to determine who is the greatest warrior of that time in the world. It was to be like a modern-day Olympics. All the great kings and princes of the earth would assemble, and each of them would try his strength on the bow.

Surely there must be some great trophy reserved for the winner. In all probability the sage did not disclose that this 'trophy' would be the marriage of the winner with king Janak's daughter Sita. Why? Because if Lord Ram would have agreed to accompany the sage upon learning this, it would have meant that the Lord secretly wished to participate in the bow breaking ceremony and took chance at marrying Sita. Or that the Lord accepted to go to Janakpur to attend the ceremony because he secretly wished to see Sita and explore the chances of his marrying her by taking part in the bow-breaking ceremony. The wise sage did not wish the skeptical and suspicious world to get a wrong signal, to unnecessarily interpret things wrongly and doubt the immaculate and impeccable noble character of Lord Ram and Laxman.

The question arises, how did sage Vishwamitra come to know of the bow-breaking competition at Janakpur? Well, the answer is that when king Janak decided to host the bow-breaking ceremony, he had sent invitation to all the famous people of that time. The hermitage of sage Vishwamitra was not very far from Janakpur, and he was the most famous Kshatriya-turned-Brahmin sage of his time. So it is natural that the king's messengers must have arrived to invite the sage to the bow ceremony. The sage would never have gone there uninvited.

Further, the sage had the mystical power to see future events and developments. He knew that Lord Ram and his other brothers were destined to marry at Janakpur. So instead of making a polite excuse to the invitation of Janak, he accepted it and persuaded Lord Ram to come with him.

Ayodhya was far away, and the sage did not think it proper to allow the two young boys to go back unescorted. Suppose we do not take into consideration the fact that Vishwamitra had foresight to see the future course of developments at Janakpur where Lord Ram would break the bow and marry Sita as well as establish himself as an all-time great warrior, then it is logical to assume that he might have guessed that king Janak must have surely invited king Dasrath to the ceremony since he has invited all the great king for the ceremony. In that case, the sage planned, he will hand over Ram and Laxman to their father Dasrath there. Well, this is a possibility.

Then he might have motivated Lord Ram to accompany him to Janakpur by telling him that he will be seeing many new fascinating places, and that he would have the chance to witness a wonderful spectacle like the one he had never seen before—the breaking of a formidably strong bow. Like any other young prince of his age, the Lord readily agreed. He also agreed because he felt naturally excited about having a chance to witness a stiff competition, news that would automatically enthuse a brave warrior. The breaking of a huge bow was not an ordinary event, so the Lord enthusiastically agreed to accompany the sage to the venue.

All these things must have come into play simultaneously in a greater or lesser degree when sage Vishwamitra 'explained' to Lord Ram to come with him to attend the bow-breaking ceremony.

How do we know that it was a bow 'breaking' ceremony? Well, in ancient times when a great event took place that was attended by rituals and ceremony, and attended by a large number of invited guests, it was called a 'Yagya'. A special name was assigned to a particular type of Yagya—e.g. the 'Ashwamedha Yagya' meant the horse sacrifice where a horse was sacrificed at the end of the ceremonies. So, when this ceremony is called a 'Dhansuha Yagya' it clearly implies a ceremony where a bow is to be sacrificed. [‘Dhanusha = a bow; ‘Yagya = sacrifice.] And a bow can only be sacrificed by ‘breaking it into two’ because it would be tantamount to killing it.

Another reason for calling this particular ceremony a ‘sacrifice’ is that Janak’s daughter Sita was to be married to the successful contender. Giving away one’s daughter in marriage to the groom is regarded in Hinduism as a ‘Daan’ or a self-less gift. It is called ‘Kanya Daan’. [‘Kanaya’ = a virgin girl; ‘Daan’ = selfless gift or donation.]

In Adhyatma Ramayan of Veda Vyas, sage Vishwamitra has told Lord Ram in clear terms that Lord Shiva’s big and wonderful bow is kept with king Janak, and the king would welcome the Lord warmly and show great respect to him. So he must come along with him. Refer: Adhyatma Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 5, verse nos. 13-15; Canto 6, verse no. 1.

The sage then told Lord Ram that after watching this fascinating event at Janakpur, he can return to Ayodhya straight from there. Refer: Adhyatma Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 6, verse no. 2.

In this Tulsidas’ Ram Charit Manas it is clear that only sage Vishwamitra had gone to Janakpur with Lord Ram and Laxman; there is no mention of any other sage accompanying them. Refer: Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 212. This is also evident here in the present Chaupai line no. 10 that precedes Doha no. 210 which we are currently reading.

Later on also when they arrive at Janakpur, all narration of the subsequent events there refer only to sage Vishwamitra. Refer for instance, Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 214; Chaupai line nos. 9-10 that precede Doha no. 239.

But in Adhyatma Ramayan of Veda Vyas as well as Valmiki’s Ramayan it is said that a group of sages had accompanied Vishwamitra when he went to Janakpur with Lord Ram and Laxman. Refer: (i) Adhyatma Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 5, verse no. 14; and (ii) Valmiki’s Ramayan, Baal Kand, Sarga 31, verse no. 14.]

pūchā munihi silā prabhu dēkhī. sakala kathā muni kahā bisēṣī. 12.

On the way, they saw a lonely and unkempt hermitage that appeared to have been abandoned long ago. It had no animals, no birds, no insects, or any other sign of life in it.<sup>1</sup> (11)

The Lord (Sri Ram) saw a boulder or a slab of stone there, and out of curiosity, he asked the sage (Vishwamitra) about it. The sage narrated to him the entire story related to this stone boulder or slab.<sup>2</sup> (12)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The surrounding area was full of vibrant forest life—greenery, plants, birds, animals, insects etc. In this pleasant surrounding was this particular forlorn, decrepit and untended place which looked like it was a hermitage long ago.

As to the location of this hermitage, Adhyatma Ramayan says it was located on the banks of river Ganges. Refer: Adhyatma Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 5, verse no. 14.

According to Valmiki's Ramayan, it was located within the realm of the king of Janakpur. Refer: Valmiki's Ramayan, Baal Kand, Sarga/Canto 48, verse no. 11.

<sup>2</sup>The presence of a slab or a boulder in the center aroused the curiosity of Lord Ram because it had a certain aura of divinity or holiness about it that attracted his attention. Perhaps it was shaped like some figurine representing some person who had been turned into a stone. Amidst the ruins, this figurine was unexpected. So the Lord was naturally curious to know about its origin.

When he asked sage Vishwamitra, the learned and compassionate sage told him the whole pathetic story of how Ahilya, the wife of sage Gautam, had been turned into a stone by a curse. This story is narrated in (i) Adhyatma Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 5, verse nos. 19-34; and (ii) Valmiki's Ramayan, Baal Kand, Sarga/Canto 48, verse nos. 14-33.

When Lord Ram heard the story, he was full of sympathy for Ahilya because she was not at fault, and whatever sin or error she committed was out of ignorance of the truth and unawareness of the reality. But she had already suffered for her follies more than enough and has done enough of penance to repent for her sins. So therefore she deserves pardon and reprieve. Lord Ram is an epitome of mercy and compassion; he just could not turn his head away and walk on, leaving the poor Ahilya suffer any longer.

So naturally he sought to know from the sage how can she be redeemed. The wise sage then told him that when sage Gautam realised that Ahilya was not at fault after learning the truth of how the events unfolded, he had told her that though once the curse is made it cannot be taken back, but however he blesses her that she will find liberation from her cursed stone-like form when she would be touched by the holy dust of the feet of Lord Ram. Refer: Adhyatma Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 5, verse nos. 31-32.

So the Lord decided to put his holy and divine feet on the stone so that Ahilya is freed from her curse. This is narrated below in Doha no. 210 and the following Chanda. It ought to be noted that it was out of his merciful nature that Lord Ram decided to put his foot on the stone—refer Doha no. 211 below.

The Lord must have contemplated whether it would be proper and right to touch Ahilya with his foot. Normally this would be improper because she was the wife of a great sage, Gautam. But then the Lord realised that if he acted in a too formal way and tried to make excuses by saying that he cannot put his foot on a sage's wife, it would be against his vows of providing liberation and deliverance to those who suffer and are waiting for his mercy.

There were so many stones on the path on which the Lord walked; did he not touch them? So how does it matter if he touched one other stone if this act helped to provide immense relief to a suffering soul?

Then there were other factors in favour of his decision of touching that boulder of stone with his foot. For one, this is what sage Gautam had himself wanted—refer: Adhyatma Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 5, verse nos. 31-32; Valmiki's Ramayan, Canto 48, verse nos. 30-32. For another, sage Vishwamitra too wants him to touch the stone to liberate Ahilya—refer: (i) Doha no. 210 below. (ii) Adhyatma Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 5, verse nos. 35-36; (iii) Valmiki's Ramayan, Canto 49, verse nos. 11-18.

The story of Ahilya in brief is as follows—She was the devout and chaste wife of sage Gautam. According to legend, once it so happened that Indra, the lustful king of Gods, fell prey to the beauty of Ahilya, and attempted to outrage her modesty by assuming the form of her husband while the sage had gone out to the river to attend to his daily chores. When the sage returned, Indra tried to escape from the hermitage, but the sage caught him red-handed. So outraged was the sage that he cursed both his chaste wife Ahilya as well as the culprit Indra. He cursed Ahilya that she would become a stone. But when he found out that Indra, the king of Gods, was the real culprit who had deceitfully cheated his wife of her loyalty towards her husband, and that Ahilya was not to be blamed, the sage cursed Indra vehemently. Gautam realised that Indra had been so overcome with a rage of passion that he forgot all senses of ethics, propriety and probity and had assumed the form of the sage to cheat Ahilya. So the sage had then blessed her that when Lord Vishnu incarnated on the earth as Sri Ram, he would visit her place and would touch her with the holy dust of his feet, at which she will be absolved of her sins and her curse, and will resume her original form and come back to heaven. The sage promised her that after her penances and repentance, when she will be purified by Sri Ram's holy feet, he will accept her back as his wife.

Meanwhile, the sage vehemently cursed Indra that his body would be full of holes representing eyes, as he was so lascivious and promiscuous that he could see nothing but a woman's vagina, a virtual 'hole' in the body, with his lustful eyes, which were also equal to a 'hole'. So, let him see whatever he wishes with his whole body, and let the world know about his deformed mentality when it watches him with thousands of holes on his body. As a result, Indra's body became ugly by being perforated with thousands of tiny holes resembling the scars of Chicken Pocks.

The story of Ahilya's liberation is narrated by Goswami Tulsidas in—(a) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 11 that precedes Doha no. 210—to Doha 211; (b) Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse nos. 57-60; (c) Janki Mangal, verse nos. 39-40; (d) Adhyatma Ramayan of Veda Vyas, Baal Kand, Canto 5, verse nos. 19-61; and (e) Valmiki's Ramayan, Baal Kand, from Sarga/Canto 48, verse nos. 14-33—to Sarga/Canto 49, verse nos. 1-21.]

The sage advised Lord Ram—‘Oh Raghubir (the brave warrior of king Raghu's dynasty)! The wife of sage Gautam has lived here patiently in the form of a stone due to a curse cast upon her, expecting that one day she will be freed from this curse when the dust of your holy feet will touch her. So she deserves the holy dust of your feet, and so please be merciful upon her and remove the curse from which she has been suffering for so long. (Doha no. 210)

[Note—Refer to the detailed note appended to Chaupai line nos. 11-12 herein above.

Liberation of Ahilya has been beautifully narrated in Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse nos. 57—59.]

छं०. परसत पद पावन सोक नसावन प्रगट भई तपपुंज सही । १ ॥

dēkhata raghunāyaka jana sukhadāyaka sanamukha hō'i kara jōri rahī. 2.

As soon as Lord Ram's holy and divine feet, which are all-purifying and destroyer of all sorrows and miseries, touched the stone, she (Ahilya) revealed herself in her true glorious form that was like a glowing image of Tapa (austerity and penance). (1)

When she observed that Raghunayak (Lord Ram, the chief of the Raghu dynasty) was standing in front, she immediately stood up and folded her hands reverentially. (2)

[Note—The touch of the holy feet of Lord Ram removed the stubborn effects of the curse that had turned Ahilya into a lifeless stone. They sort of washed off the curse that had covered Ahilya and made her a lifeless being. They purified her soul and freed it from the miserable condition in which it had got trapped and remained so since thousand of years.

The vow of chastity of Ahilya had been violated by Indra without her knowledge. This had made her 'impure'. So when she was touched by Lord Ram's feet which have the power to purify the most impure, she was now 'purified'.

She had been miserable and suffered horribly as a stone. So when Lord Ram touched her with his feet, this misery and suffering also vanished.

As soon as the curse was removed, Ahilya could see and feel. It was like she had been in an unconscious state for so long, and had suddenly regained consciousness. Life sprung back into her gross body. Then she slowly opened her eyes and saw a marvelous sight—her redeemer Lord Ram was standing right in front, smiling cheerfully down at her. Overwhelmed with joy and gratitude, she stood up and brought her two hands together, with palms touching each other, as a gesture of extreme reverence and submission for the Lord.

Sage Valmiki has described in his Ramayan that inspite of turning into a stone, Ahilya was deemed to be doing a form of Tapa which was so severe that her form glowed like a fire. Perhaps this is the reason which attracted Lord Ram's attention to her. Refer: Valmiki's Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 49, verse nos. 13-16. She looked like the flame of a fire that is covered with smoke; or like the moon that is obscured by the cloud or fog; or like the sun that is seen in murky water.

Therefore, as soon as this curse-like smoke was removed, the flame leapt back to life; as soon as the cloud was removed the moon appeared with all its beauty; and as soon as the sun was seen in clear water, its reflection turned splendorous as the sun in the sky.

In Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse nos. 57-60, Tulsidas has wonderfully described the restoration of Ahilya into her original divine form of unmatched beauty and radiance by the touch of Lord Ram's holy feet.]

ati prēma adhīrā pulaka sarīrā mukha nahim āva'i bacana kahī. 3.
 atisaya baṛabhāgī carananhi lāgī jugala nayana jaladhāra bahī. 4.

She was so overwhelmed with love, devotion and gratitude for the Lord that her entire body was thrilled beyond measure, covering it with goose-flesh. She was so dumbfounded and stunned that she could not utter a word. (3)

She regarded herself as being extremely fortunate and lucky. She fell at the holy feet of Lord Ram with tears streaming down from both her eyes. (4)

[Note—It was the most happy moment in the life of Ahilya. The Supreme Lord was standing right before her eyes, her curse of ages was wiped clean, her torments and miseries vanished, and she was restored to her original radiant divine form as a great sage's wife. What more could she want or expect.

She was overjoyed and ecstatic. She fell at the Lord's feet to thank him. Tears gushed out of her eyes in sheer joy and happiness. It was a spontaneous emotional reaction which she could not hide.

She wanted to thank the Lord, but her throat was choked and she could not speak anything. She was shaking with emotion and her knees buckled, so she fell at the Lord's feet to express her surrender and seek the Lord's blessing as well as forgiveness for all her past mistakes. She also fell at his feet to indicate that she is not able to use words to pray to him or thank him, and is hugely obliged to him.

Falling at someone's feet is a sign of greatest respect and absolute surrender.]

धीरजु मन कीन्हा प्रभु कहँ चीन्हा रघुपति कृपाँ भगति पाई । ५ ॥
 अति निर्मल बानीं अस्तुति ठानी ग्यानगञ्ज जय रघुराई ॥ ६ ॥ dhīraju mana kīnhā prabhu kahum' cīnhā raghupati kṛpām' bhagati pā'ī. 5.

 ati nirmala bānīm astuti ṭhānī gyānagamya jaya raghurā'ī. 6.

Ahilya recovered her poise, became calm, and gathered courage in her heart. She recognized the Lord, and by his grace Bhakti (devotion) sprouted in her.<sup>1</sup> (5)

She decided to offer prayers to the Lord in a very sweet voice that lacked any kind of pretensions and deceit. She said—‘Oh Lord of the Raghu dynasty (i.e. Lord Ram). Glory to you! You are accessible only through spiritual knowledge<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In the initial phases she was absolutely shocked and dumbfounded. What had happened was beyond her imagination. This is because after having lived as a stone for thousands of years and remaining submerged in deep meditation during this long time, all her senses had become numb. She was completely unaware of her surroundings. Then suddenly she gained consciousness as if person who had been in coma for a long time suddenly regains his awareness of the world and retrieves his senses and begins to see, feel, hear and move. She was too stunned to react. This is clear from reading line nos. 3-4.

But after some time when the first moments of shock and disbelief passed over, she was able to regain her senses and poise. She thought to herself that she must at least offer her thanks to her redeemer and saviour, the Lord whom, she recollected, her husband Gautam had told her about. Gautam had told her that Lord would one day come and touch her stone-like form with the dust of his holy feet, and that then she would be freed from her curse. Refer: (i) Adhyatma Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 5, verse nos. 30-32; and (ii) Valmiki Ramayan, Baal Kand, Sarga 48, verse nos. 30-32. So since this has actually happened, Ahilya deduced that the person standing before her must surely be Lord Ram. This is how she 'recognized' the Lord.

And when a devotee recognizes his beloved Lord, what happens? A huge wave of devotion, love and submission sweeps the person off his or her feet. So, as soon as Ahilya realised that Lord Ram, the Supreme Lord, is standing before her, she was blessed by devotion and love for the Lord in her heart.

<sup>2</sup>It is significant to say that the Lord is known by spiritual knowledge. Ahilya is referring to the teaching of the Upanishads that stress that in order to have knowledge of Brahm one must have knowledge of the Absolute Truth and Reality through self-knowledge and realisation of the Atma, the soul, which is pure Consciousness residing in one's own heart, in one's own inner-self. This knowledge is the true knowledge of Brahm, the cosmic Consciousness and the only Absolute Truth and Reality in creation.

Hence, the idea is that the real 'Ram', the real Supreme Being who is the redeemer and saviour of the devotee's soul, the entity that is worthy of adoration and worship is the pure conscious supreme Soul that resides in the physical gross body that was visible to the world in the form of a prince of Ayodhya known as Lord Ram.

The 'physical Ram' known as the prince of Ayodhya, the son of king Dasrath and a great warrior of the Raghu dynasty, acted like any other human being, so one must not be misled by his worldly deeds and actions to get confused and harbour doubts about the Lord's divinity and holiness. The 'actual Ram' lived hidden behind the external façade of the gross body in the form of an invisible, subtle and sublime entity known as the Supreme Atma, the Supreme Being, who is the redeemer and saviour of the world. This 'real Ram' is nothing but pure cosmic Consciousness in a personified form, whom the Upanishads and the Vedas and other scriptures refer to as 'Brahm', the Supreme Being.]

मैं नारि अपावन प्रभु जग पावन रावन रिपु जन सुखदाई । ७ ॥

राजीव बिलोचन भव भय मोचन पाहि पाहि सरनहि आई ॥ ८ ॥

mairṁ nāri apāvana prabhu jaga pāvana rāvana ripu jana sukhadā'ī. 7.
rājīva bilōcana bhava bhaya mōcana pāhi pāhi saranahī ā'ī. 8.

Ahilya prayed—'I am an impure woman, and oh Lord you are the purifier of the whole world.<sup>1</sup> You are an enemy of Ravana<sup>2</sup> (the demon king) but a friend of all other creatures who are your devotees. (7)

Oh Lord with a lotus-like eyes, and a remover of the formidable fear arising from this horrifying world consisting of an endless cycle of birth and death with their attendant horrors<sup>3</sup>. I have come to seek refuge at your holy feet. Please save me; please protect me. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>As soon as Ahilya recollected her poise, she remembered the events of her past life. This is, as we have seen above in the note appended to line no. 5, the reason why she could recognize Lord Ram. Therefore, she also recollected why she was cursed in the first place; her chastity had been violated. This is the reason why she accepts that she is an impure woman. But immediately she says two things—one, that Lord Ram is the purifier of the world, and two, that she is seeking humble refuge in his feet.

To wit, she pleaded with Lord Ram that though it is undeniable that she is impure, but that is the thing of the past. Now since she has come seeking surrender and refuge, the Lord being the purifier of the world is morally bound to wash her clean of her past sins and accept her as his devotee and grant her his fellowship.

Remember: This is Lord Ram's own declaration and vow that no matter how sinful a person is, if he comes to surrender before the Lord with a true heart then the Lord will willingly accept him and forgive all his misdemeanours. The Lord had made this clear in the context of Vibhishan, the brother of Ravana, when the former came to seek refuge with the Lord. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Doha no. 43—44.

<sup>2</sup>In all probability the fact that Lord Ram would kill Ravana when he goes to the forest to fulfill all the works of the Gods, and once this is accomplished, all the creatures would be able to live in peace wherever they lived was known to her. This is because all the great sages of the time knew of these developments—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precedes Doha no. 285 where it is said that all these future developments had been predicted by sage Yagyawalkya and learned sage's words cannot go in vain. So Ahilya's husband, sage Gautam, must surely have known it, and he must have told her this sometimes during their interaction.

<sup>3</sup>Lord Ram is the supreme Brahm himself personified. As such, he is indeed the supreme liberator of all the creatures from the endless cycle of birth and death.]

The sage (Gautam) had done a great favour upon me by cursing me, because it is due to that curse that I am able to have your divine communion and vision today. (9)

[Otherwise, where was it ever possible?] It is due to that curse that today I feel myself so fortunate that I can see Lord Hari (Lord Vishnu)<sup>1</sup> till my eyes are completely filled with this divine sight. Even Lord Shiva (who is considered as the most enlightened God) has regarded this (vision of Lord Vishnu in the personified form as Lord Ram) the greatest good fortune and the most precious gift for the eye<sup>2</sup>. (10)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This shows that Ahilya had realised that Lord Ram is no one else but Lord Vishnu himself personified. Lord Vishnu is the cosmic invisible form of the Supreme Being, and in that form Vishnu is also known as the ‘Viraat Purush’, the colossal, the all-encompassing, the all-pervading cosmic invisible form of the Supreme Being, the form that whose head is the heaven, the body is the sky, and the foot is the earth, the form in which each hair represents a world. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chanda line no. 9 that precedes Doha no. 192; and (ii) Doha no. 201—to Chaupai line no. 2 which precedes Doha no. 202.

Mother Kaushalya had the divine vision of Lord Vishnu in all his splendorous form at the time of the Lord’s revelation as Lord Ram—refer: Adhyatma Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto no. 3, verse nos. 16-18.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Shiva enshrines Lord Ram in his heart. Shiva eternally meditates upon the divine form and holy name “RAM” of the Lord. In fact, out of the thousands of holy names, Lord Shiva had selected this name as the only spiritual formula that cures all spiritual problems for the creature—including giving him liberation from the endless cycle of birth and death. This is the reason why Lord Shiva utters the holy name of Lord Ram into the ears of a dying creature on the banks of river Ganges at Kashi so that the dying can find liberation and deliverance. Shiva’s devotion and love for Lord Ram surpasses all, and therefore the Lord has himself said that if someone wants to have devotion for him and wishes to attain him, then he must first offer his obeisance to Lord Shiva and please him. Even the story of the Ramayan was first conceived or revealed in the heart and mind of Lord Shiva. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 3, 8 that precede Doha no. 19; (ii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 30; (iii) Chaupai line no. 11 that precedes Doha no. 35; (iv) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 46; (v) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 246; Lanka Kand—(vi) from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 2—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 3.

There is a wonderful Upanishad named ‘Ram Utttar Tapini Upanishad’ in which the same thing about Lord Shiva’s devotion and faith in Lord Ram is reiterated; this Upanishad is a part of the Atharva Veda. Refer also to Tripura Tapini Upanishad, Canto 4, verse no. 5 where it is said that Lord Shiva provides liberation and deliverance to the soul of a dying man on the banks of river Ganges by uttering Lord Ram’s holy name in his ears.]

बिनती प्रभु मोरी मैं मति भोरी नाथ न मागउँ बर आना । ११ ॥

pada kamala parāgā rasa anurāgā mama mana madhupa karai pānā. 12.

Oh Lord! I am not erudite or wise (like the great sages and seers), and so I don’t know what to ask you, except for making one request.<sup>1</sup> (11)

And it is that ‘let my Mana (mind and heart) become a bee that continuously enjoys the divine bliss that comes by sucking at the nectar that effuses from your lotus-like holy feet.’<sup>2</sup> (12)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Ahilya told the Lord that she is not much educated and does not know how to offer elaborate worship or prayers to him. She is of a low wisdom and intellect—for had it not been so then why would she have allowed herself to be so easily cheated by Indra in her earlier life which led to her being cursed to become a stone?

This logic made Lord Ram speechless!

<sup>2</sup>Then she continued—‘Oh Lord. In this situation, don’t expect much from me. I can’t recite the hymns of the scriptures to pray to you. But in simple language, what I want is this: let me be your absolute devotee so much so that let my mind and heart remains submerged in your thoughts, and let me lose awareness of everything else in the bliss that I get by fixing my mind and heart in remembering your holy and divine feet which are like lotus. Just like the bee forgets everything else when it sights the open lotus flower and hovers over it and remains oblivious of the world while it sucks the flower’s nectar, let my existence be like this bee—lost in the thoughts of your holy feet and remain blissful in it. I don’t want anything other than this.’

It is to be noted here that normally when someone offered worship to the Lord, he requests what he wants only when the Lord asks him to do so. This is the norm. For instance, when Manu and Satrupa had done Tapa for having a divine vision of Lord Hari, it was only after Lord Vishnu requesting them to ask for something that they expressed their desire to have the Lord as their son. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 148—to Doha no. 149.

But in the case of Ahilya, she has asked Lord Ram what she wants even before the Lord asked her to do so. That is why she says that she is not wise and intelligent, and therefore the Lord must forgive her for being unable to observe formalities!

She comes straight to the point, without wasting any time, lest some more mischief is created by someone. She is very apprehensive after her bad past experience where her innocence was exploited by Indra.]

--- I am so privileged and honoured today to have the same divine feet that is also worshipped by Brahma (the creator of the world) being placed on my own head.

Oh the most merciful Lord, you have been exceptionally kind, merciful and gracious upon me today.’ (14)

In this way, the wife of sage Gautam fell at the feet of Lord Hari (Ram) repeatedly. (15)

After having received the blessings that she had cherished (and thereby feeling fully contented), she then cheerfully went back to the hermitage of her husband, sage Gautam. (16)

[Note—What did she want? She wanted eternal devotion for Lord Ram and love for the Lord's holy feet; she wanted her mind and heart to remain engrossed in the memory and thoughts of the Lord's holy feet. Refer line no. 12.

Then she fearlessly went back to her husband, sage Gautam, because he had also personally told her that after her curse is removed by the touch of Lord Ram's holy feet she could come back to him.

Lord (Ram) is such a merciful and compassionate one that he shows grace and kindness selflessly, without expecting any thing or any service or any sort of obligation in return. [Lord Ram shows mercy, compassion and grace to others just for the sake of it, and not that he expects the beneficiary to feel obliged to the Lord in any way whatsoever. It is of course another matter that the creature who is benefited by the benevolence and magnanimity of the munificent Lord should, and must, feel exceedingly obliged and thankful to him.]

Tulsidas addresses his himself and says—‘Oh my foolish and stubborn self (which is a reference to the ‘Mana’, the mind and the heart)<sup>1</sup>! You must abandon all sorts of pretensions, conceit and deceit as well delusions and worldly entanglements, and instead inculcate steady and profound love and devotion for Lord Ram who is so kind, magnanimous, benevolent, gracious and merciful.’ (Doha no. 211)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>There are several instances in Ram Charit Manas where Tulsidas addresses his own self and calls his Mana stupid and stubborn because it would take interest in the mortal and perishable world which never gives peace, instead of focusing its attention on Lord Ram and developing devotion for the Lord as it would give it eternal peace and bliss. Refer: Ram Charit Manas—(i) Sundar Kand, Chanda line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 60; (ii) Uttar Kand, Chanda line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 130.

Oftentimes he has also called himself stupid because he does not develop strong devotion for Lord Ram who is eager to fulfill all his wishes—Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, line no. 1 of Doha no. 28 Ka.]

Lord Ram moved ahead from there with Laxman and the sage (Vishwamitra) accompanying him. He went to the place where there was river Ganga (Ganges)* which is a purifier of the whole world<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Gaadhi's son (i.e. sage Vishwamitra) narrated to Lord Ram (and Laxman) as to how the river of Gods, 'Sursari', descended upon earth<sup>2</sup>. (2)

(i) The first important point to note here is that it was sage Vishwamitra who was in the lead, walking in the front with the two brothers Lord Ram and Laxman following him when he brought them from Ayodhya to his hermitage. But now Lord Ram is leading them. This is significant. Till now the sage thought that the Lord was a child, a young boy after all. But now, after so many developments such as the killing of Taadaka, Subahu and the army of Marich, the flinging of Marich away from the hermitage, and now the magical conversion of a lifeless stone into a living woman convinced the sage that Lord Ram is not a child but the Supreme Lord himself. So he must be allowed to lead. Besides this, the sage had already given Lord Ram all the weapons he had (refer: Doha no. 209), so the sage permitted the Lord to walk ahead of him so that if any demon attacked them on the way, the leading man, Lord Ram, would be there to take care.

(ii) The second point important point is this: At the time of Lord Ram's departure from Ayodhya with the sage, it is said that he "cheerfully accompanied the sage to remove his fears" (refer: line no. 1 of Doha no. 208 Ka), but now no such enthusiasm is observed. He simply "moved ahead". So why is it so? Well, Lord Ram had some regrets in his mind that he had to touch a woman, especially a sage's Brahmin wife (Ahilya), with his foot. This is not a good thing on the face of it, though the intention was noble and the result was also noble. But then the Lord comforted himself with the argument that if he had refrained from doing so it would have not been the right thing either—because that would have meant that Ayilya would remain as a stone for the rest of the time and continue to suffer. It would have gone against the Lord's own vows that he would take birth upon the earth to provide liberation and deliverance to the suffering creatures.

Then he was instructed by sage Vishwamitra to touch Ahilya with his foot (refer: Doha no. 210), and the Lord could not disobey the sage. So it was alright. Yet the Lord was not very happy at this event. That is why he moved ahead without showing any cheer this time.

(iii) The third important point is this—The Lord felt guilty of having to touch Ahilya with his feet. So he wanted to wash them. Nearby was the holy river Ganges. So he decided to proceed there to take a bath and clean himself of the wrong that he was forced to do. River Ganges is the purifier of the world, so it is fully competent to clean the taint that has got stuck on the otherwise holy feet of Lord Ram.

Obviously, Lord Ram had asked sage Vishwamitra to tell him the story of river Ganges. So the sage narrated the whole story to him.

A remarkable thing here is that instead of addressing Vishwamitra as a 'sage', he is called 'the son of Gaadhi'. Well, the plausible reason is that Gaadhi was a great king, and therefore he must have known about all the wonderful deeds done by great ancient kings. The kings were supposed to gather information about other kings for the purpose of knowledge, and also to remain updated about what other kings were doing for the purpose of security and mutual dealings as well. So his descendent, Vishwamitra, was, in all likelihood, most competent to tell the story of king Sagar and how his great grandson Bhagirath was able to bring the holy river Ganges to earth.

*The story of the origin of the holy river Ganges is narrated in Srimad Bhagwat Mahapurana, Skandha 5, Canto 17, verse nos. 1-10.

It was contained in the Kamandalu (water pot) of Brahma, the creator. This is said in Srimad Bhagwat Mahapurana, Skandha 8, Canto 21, verse no. 4.

Then, its acceptance on the head of Lord Shiva where it was locked in the mat of thick hairs on the Lord's head is narrated in Valmiki's Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 42, verse nos. 23-25, and Canto 43, verse no. 1.

The story of why Bhagirath did Tapa to bring Ganges upon the earth is narrated in detail in Valmiki's Ramayan, Baal Kand, Sarga 38—44.

Briefly, the story of the holy river Ganges is this: When Lord Vishnu had incarnated as Lord Vaaman, the dwarf mendicant, to crush the haughtiness of king Bali and prevent him from declaring himself the emperor of the entire universe, the Lord had expended his left foot so much that its toe nail had ruptured the outer shell of the galaxy, creating a hole. The inter-galactic river flowing outside the known galaxy gushed in through this hole to fill the whole space. When this celestial river touched the feet of Lord Vishnu, it turned reddish due to the colour of the Lord's feet which are like the red or pink lotus. Because it had its origin from the foot of Lord Vishnu, the primary name of river Ganges was 'Bhawatpadi'. ['Bhagwat' = Lord Vishnu; 'Padi' = from foot.]

After the passage of thousands of Yugas (eras), it established itself in the northern edge of the heaven where the Polar Star is situated. This area is known as 'Vishnu-pad'. It is here that the Lord's great devotee Dhruv accepts the water of this holy river as sanctified water, and the seven celestial sages known as the Sapta-rishis hold it in the lock of hairs on their head. Meanwhile, when the celestial water poured in from the hole in the galaxy, the creator Brahma was alarmed because he realised that its fierce currents would sweep everything away, both in the heaven as well as on the earth where it descended to wash the feet of Lord Vaaman immediately after its entrance in the habitable galaxy. So Brahma used his Kamandalu, the water pot, to contain river Ganges within it.

From the summit of the heaven, i.e. from its northern fringes, Ganges cascaded down to the abode of the Moon God, went past it and fell on the summit of Mt. Meru (the golden mountain where the Gods live, including their king Indra) which is situated within the realm of Brahma, the creator.

From there it divides into four branches—named Sita, Alaknanda, Chakchu and Bhadra. Out of these, Sita descends from Brahma-puri to the summit of Mt. Kesaraachal, then goes further down and falls upon the summit of Mt. Gandhamadan, and from there flows through the area known as Bhadraa-shwa-varsha to finally fall into the salty ocean in the east.

The second branch Alkananda falls to the south of Brahma-puri, goes past countless summits of mountains to finally arrive at the summit of Mt. Hemkut. From there, it cascades down with tremendous speed and force down upon the plains of India (known as Bharat-varsha). Then it traverses the length of the land to fall and merge with the ocean in the south.

Chakchu, the third branch, reaches the summit of Mt. Malyawaan, and from there it flows through the area known as Ketumal-varsha, heading in the western direction to finally fall in the sour ocean in the west.

The fourth branch, Bhadra, falls from the summit of Mt Meru and descends to its north. Falling from one mountain upon another, it reaches the summit of Mt. Srunga-waan. From there it flows through the area of the land known as Kuru-desh to finally fall in the northern ocean.

This river is known as the River of Gods or river Gangaa. This is the origin of the river in its celestial form. Refer: Smd. Bhagwat, 5/17/1-9.

When Lord Vaaman's feet were being washed as part of the ritual to honour the guest Brahmin by king Vaaman, Brahma the creator had collected this water in his Kamandalu (water pot) because it was very holy. Refer. Smd. Bhagwat, 8/21/4.

Later on, when king Bhagirath had done severe Tapa (penance) to bring this holy river on the earth so that his ancestors who lay dead due to the curse of sage Kapil could be revived, Brahma told him that he must first prepare Lord Shiva to accept river Ganges on his head because when the river descends from heaven upon earth, it will do so with such tremendous force that the earth would not be able to bear it and would split into two. So Bhagirath did Tapa to please Lord Shiva who agreed to accept the cascading river on the lock of hairs on his head. Then he will gradually allow to let it down upon the plains is a stream that lacks the force by which the river falls thousands of miles from heaven. Refer: Valmiki Ramayan, 1/42/23-25, and 1/43/1.

The story of why Bhagirath did Tapa to bring Ganges upon the earth is narrated in detail in Valmiki's Ramayan, Baal Kand, Sarga 38—44.

Briefly this part of the story is as follows: King Sagar had done a great horse sacrifice known as 'Ashwamedh Yagya'. This sacrificial horse was stolen by Indra, the king of Gods who was renowned for his mischief and jealous nature, in the guise of a demon. The reason was that king Sagar had already done 99 such sacrifices, and if he successfully completed this 100th sacrifice, he would have become eligible for the stature of Indra. This Indra could not tolerate.

Now, king Sagar ordered his sixty thousand sons to go and find the horse. They dug up the entire earth in search of the horse, pursuing Indra relentlessly. During the process all the creatures who lived on the earth suffered immensely because their homes were demolished and they were uprooted from their natural habitats. This was what Indra wanted—to instigate Sagar to commit some sort of blunder that would invite the wrath of the creatures and the Brahmins, thereby inviting his own ruin. The Gods rushed to their patriarch Brahma, complaining about the developments. Brahma comforted them that they should not worry because Lord Vishnu who is responsible for the welfare of the creation would certainly do something to rectify the damage and punish the perpetrator.

Meanwhile, even after searching the earth the sons could not find the sacrificial horse. When they reported this to their father, king Sagar, he strongly rebuked them and ordered them to go back and search once again. This time around, they dug up the subterranean world. Ultimately, they reached the hermitage of sage Kapil on the shore of the eastern ocean. The mischievous Indra had hidden the horse there, but sage Kapil had no idea that it was a stolen sacrificial horse. So, when Sagar's sons saw the horse there, they concluded that it was stolen by the sage, and they haughtily challenged him. The sage was very angry, and he cursed them, reducing them to ashes.

When these sixty thousand sons did not return even after a long time, king Sagar ordered his grandson Anshumaan to go and find out what had happened. Anshumaan followed the path taken by his uncles, and finally reached the place where he saw their ashes in a huge mound. Lamenting and grieving, he wanted to perform their last rites. He also found the horse grazing nearby. For doing the last rites he needed water. Just at that time, Lord Garud (the mount of Lord Vishnu), who was the maternal uncle of his own uncles, came there and told Anshumaan that ordinary water won't liberate his uncles because they were reduced to ashes by the curse of a great sage named Kapil. For this, the water of the holy river Ganges is needed. So he must go and make an effort to bring Ganges to earth so that its water can flow over the ashes and provide your uncles deliverance. Meanwhile, he should take the sacrificial horse and go home to his grandfather.

King Sagar completed his sacrifice and returned to his capital. He did not know how to bring the celestial river of Gods to earth, and he died without accomplishing the task. After his death, Anshumaan ascended the throne. His son was king Dilip. Anshumaan abdicated the throne in favour of his son and went to the Himalayas to do severe Tapa, and died there.

King Dilip had a son named Bhagirath. Dilip did many sacrifices in order to bring river Ganges to earth so that his ancestor's souls could find deliverance, but failed. Worried and frustrated he fell sick and died.

Meanwhile, Bhagirath had no sons, but he still was determined to bring Ganges to earth and fulfill the long cherished desire of his father, grandfather and great grandfather. So he handed over the reins of the kingdom to his wise ministers and went to do the severest form of Tapa one can imagine of. His determination and noble resolve pleased Brahma, the creator, who revealed himself before him and asked him to request for a boon. Bhagirath replied that if Brahma really wants to grant him something then he should bless him that he be able to bring Ganges to earth and wash his ancestors with its holy water so that they can find deliverance. Brahma advised him that he must please Lord Shiva and request him to accept the river on his head prior to its reaching the surface of the earth—because if the river fell directly upon the earth it would split the latter into two with its tremendous force.

So, Bhagirath prayed to Shiva who was more than willing to accept Ganges on his head because the Lord knew that the river had its origin in the foot of Lord

Vishnu. As soon as Shiva gave his consent to bear the river on his head, Brahma let his Kamandalu tilt and thus the mighty river Ganges came cascading down with a thunderous force to land upon the matted hairs of Lord Shiva. Ganges was very proud of its own origin and powers, so it thought that it will push Shiva to the under-world by its sheer force. Shiva wanted to teach Ganges a lesson not to be haughty, so the Lord contained the might of the swirling waters of the haughty Ganges in the lock of hairs on his head so much so that the river almost got lost amidst its huge crevices.

Bhagirath was confounded: after all the efforts made by him, the river still failed to reach the ground. So he did Tapa again to please Lord Shiva and ask him to allow Ganges to fall down to earth. Pleased with his sincerity and devotion, Lord Shiva allowed a thin stream of Ganges to escape from his head and fall in the 'Bindu-sarovar (lake)'. Immediately upon reaching this lake, Ganges branched off into seven streams. The seventh stream followed king Bhagirath who lead its path on a chariot to the spot where the ashes of his ancestors lay. As soon as the holy water of the Ganges touched the ashes, the souls of the sixty thousand sons of king Sagar found liberation and deliverance.

At that time, Brahma appeared and blessed Bhagirath that henceforth Ganges would be deemed to be his daughter and bear his name. It would be known by three names—viz. 'Tripatha-gaa', 'Dibyaa' and 'Bhagirathi'. Hence, the holy river Ganges also came to be known as 'Bhagirathi', the daughter of Bhagirath. Since it flows in the whole of the three worlds, the heaven, the earth and the subterranean world, it is known as 'Tripatha-gaa'—that which flows on three paths. And since it is a holy and divine river, it is known as 'Dibya'—the divine and holy one.

There is another version narrated in Padma Puran, Srishthi Khand. Here, sage Veda Vyas, who was narrating the Puran to Brahmin audience, told the story of the origin and descent upon the earth of the holy river Ganges in detail when they asked him about it. Briefly this story is as follows:

Veda Vyas said—'In some ancient time, when sage Narad asked Brahma how creation came into being, Brahma told him that at the time of creation, he had requested the Paraa-Prakriti, the primary-primordial Mother Nature, to become the primary cause of creation. Brahma told her that he would use her to create everything.

Hearing this, the Paraa-Prakriti divided herself into seven forms. These seven forms are the following—(i) Gayatri (from which were produced all the Vedas, Swasti, Swaha, Swadha, and Diksha—i.e. all things related to the fire sacrifice), (ii) Vaag-devi or Saraswati, the goddess of speech and knowledge, through whom knowledge and scriptures spread, (iii) Laxmi (the goddess of wealth and prosperity that was needed to sustain and take care of the needs of the creation), (iv) Uma (the consort of Lord Shiva and said to be Mother Goddess from whom all other Gods and Goddesses originated; she is also the one who became instrumental in spread of knowledge), (v) Shakti-beeja (cosmic dynamic energy that gives all the Mantras their inherent mystical powers and is responsible for injecting vitality, energy and force into this creation), (vi) Tapaswini (the patron goddess or the cosmic force overlooking Tapa—austerity and penances), (vii) and Dharma-dravaa (the inherent powers of Dharma—everything that is in accordance to the laws of auspiciousness, righteousness, probity, propriety, ethics and morality).

Brahma thought that the last form, i.e. 'Dharma-dravaa', was the best of the seven forms, and since it was in a liquid form ('Dravaa' = liquid), he stored it into his Kamandalu (water pot).

Now, during the Lord's incarnation as Vaaman (the dwarf mendicant) when he had spread his left foot to measure the entire universe during the sacrifice of king Bali, this foot ruptured the sky and the heaven and appeared before Brahma. It was then that he washed the Lord's holy foot with the water that he had stored in his Kamandalu at the time of creation.

After the Lord's holy foot had been washed, this water fell on Mt. Hemkut. From there this water reached Lord Shiva who immediately placed it on his head because he realised it to be sanctified and holy as it had been used to wash the foot of Lord Vishnu in his incarnation as Lord Vaaman. So, this water now was established on the thick lock of hairs on the head of Lord Shiva.

Later on when king Bhagirath had done severe Tapa with the intention of bringing this holy river on earth so that his dead ancestors could be revived and their souls could find peace, he had prayed to Lord Shiva to let the Ganges come down upon the earth. The Lord allowed its stream to descend upon the earth and follow Bhagirath across the land to the place where his ancestors lay dead. This is how the holy river descended upon earth and traversed eastwards following Bhagirath to finally merge into the ocean.]

Then the Lord took bath (in the holy river Ganges) along with the sages<sup>1</sup>.

The Brahmins (who were present on the banks of the river Ganges) got alms (donations, gifts) of various kinds<sup>2</sup>. (3)

After that, the Lord who is a helper of the sages<sup>3</sup>, cheerfully<sup>4</sup> proceeded from there, moving swiftly ahead to approach the city of Videha<sup>5</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The word 'Rishi-nha' means 'in the company of or along with other sages', and it obviously refers to more than one sage. There are many reasons for use of the plural common noun here.

The fame and glory of Lord Ram had already spread far and wide. The story of sage Vishwamitra going to Ayodhya to bring Lord Ram and Laxman to his hermitage, killing of Tadakaa, Subahu and the rest of the demon army, and the magical feat of converting a stone into a lady, i.e. the liberation of Ahilya from her curse, was no longer a secret. This news must have spread like wild fire by word of mouth. The sages, hermits and other holy men of that part of the land were awe-struck and realised that the two princes were no ordinary humans, but surely they possessed some super-human divine powers.

So, as soon as the word spread that the great sage Vishwamitra is headed towards Janakpur with Lord Ram and Laxman, a lot many holy men who lived along the route or even in areas from where they could manage to reach them, hurried to have a holy glimpse of the two divine brothers as well as sage Vishwamitra. Some of them met the trio on the way, some decided to assemble on the banks of river Ganges where they were sure that the three would come on their way to Janakpur. This is because it is a normal practice that when one goes somewhere and his path passes near some holy river or a pilgrim place, the traveler makes it a point to visit these places, pay his obeisance, take a bath in the river, and then move on with his journey.

So a huge throng of sages and other holy men had either joined them on the way or had assembled on the banks of river Ganges by the time Lord Ram, Laxman and Vishwamitra arrived there.

Besides being eager to see Lord Ram because of his glorious and most magical deeds, the Lord's astounding charm and beauty was also instrumental in motivating the holy men to have a rare glimpse of the brothers. The holy men decided that they were no ordinary princes because they had seen so many of them, and they had also seen many great kings performing marvelous feats, but the divine aura that surrounded these brothers was unique and set them apart from the rest. The sages concluded therefore that they surely are the Supreme Being in a human form as predicted earlier by the scriptures. Otherwise, it is not a joke to kill the ferocious demons and liberate Ahilya so easily.

To add to this incentive was the privilege of meeting a great sage, Vishwamitra. Even today when some renowned holy men visit some place, huge crowd gathers to see him and take his blessings.

Added to this is another factor. It is observed as a routine affair that on the banks of holy rivers, especially Ganges which is regarded as the holiest, a large number of men, holy and ordinary, are always present to take a bath to purify themselves and perform religious rituals. Since giving donations and gifts and making charities is part of such rituals, a large number of Brahmins collect there in the hope of a regular source of income and benefiting from such religious obligations. This is a daily routine affair that one can observe on the banks of this holy river anywhere in India. The banks are usually crowded by devotees, saints and Brahmins etc. who have come to make their ablutions.

Now, when Lord Ram and Laxman took their purification bath in the holy Ganges, they were accompanied by all these sages, seers, hermits and other holy men. The wise and learned sages and holy men had come to see Lord Ram because they knew that they are viewing a personified form of the Holy Spirit, the Supreme Being, and added to this was the bonus of seeking their divine blessings. Then there was the attraction of meeting sage Vishwamitra, an enlightened sage of immense spiritual powers.

One more remarkable point to note is this: A large number of sages and holy men are said to have done their ablutions in the company of Lord Ram. Then what happened? Did they accompany them onwards to Janakpur? Yes, they did. It is said that when sage Vishwamitra reached the outskirts of Janakpur, he saw a pleasant mango orchard, and asked Lord Ram and Laxman to stay there. They put up their camp at this site "along with the other sages" who were with them. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-7 that precede Doha no. 214.

Remember: Only sages and holy men are said to have joined Lord Ram in taking the bath in the river Ganges. No mention is made of 'any princes or even the Brahmins'. Well, the answer is clear—(a) The princes of the realm had no insight to realise who Lord Ram and Laxman were; for them they were like any other son of a king, and hence worthy of no special attention. This is proved later on at the marriage venue at Janakpur when only some of the wise aged kings could realise the divinity of Lord Ram because they had heard of the Lord's glorious deeds, but the majority of the assembled kings and princes were only interested in breaking the bow and marrying Sita. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) from Chaupai line no. 8 that precede Doha no. 245—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precede Doha no. 246; (ii) from Chaupai line no. 6 that precede Doha no. 266—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precede Doha no. 267.

(b) The Brahmins were professional men; they knew how to perform rituals in a mechanical fashion but had no spiritual insight or acumen. They thronged banks of holy rivers and pilgrim places to earn money, and not to seek salvation. This is even true today as it was then, and has been ever since the dawn of civilization. There is vast difference between professional Brahmins who perform rituals and those who are known as true sages, seers and holy men.

<sup>2</sup>An important point here is that Lord Ram had nothing with him in material terms at that time to donate or gift to the Brahmins. So what did he do? He promised them that after he returns to his home at Ayodhya, he will fulfill his obligations and redeem his promises of gifts made to these Brahmins. This was and is still a routine practice—that if one cannot pay immediately, he gives an understanding that as soon as he reaches home he will send the money to the other person.

Hence, after making ablutions, Lord Ram promised the assembled Brahmins that he will make gifts to them later on when he returns home. This is why it is said that the ‘Brahmins got gifts’ instead of saying ‘Lord Ram made gifts to Brahmins’. These Brahmins ‘got an assurance of gifts from the Lord’ by way of a promise or vow, which was to be redeemed later on.

<sup>3</sup>The phrase used in the text is “Muni Brinda Sahaayaa’ which means ‘helper of the sages’, or one who comes to aid of the sages in times of need. In other words, the two brothers Ram and Laxman were always available to help the countless sages whenever they needed them.

<sup>4</sup>Here it is said that the Lord moved ahead ‘cheerfully’ after bathing in river Ganges. It is important to observe that while he moved from the place where Ahilya was liberated to the banks of river Ganges in a somber mood, the Lord now becomes cheerful once again.

This is because now he has taken a bath in the holy, all-purifying river Ganges, and has therefore symbolically washed-off his guilt of having had to touch a Brahmin woman, Ahilya, with his feet. He is also cheerful and happy because he has been able to take a bath in the company of so many sages and holy men. Then again, he has been able to make charity to Brahmins. All these things gave him a lot of satisfaction, and he became joyous once again.

Another reason to be cheerful and excited was that now they were very near the great city of Videha, where a great spectacle of the bow-breaking ceremony was awaiting them. Like any boys of their age, it was natural for Lord Ram and Laxman to become excited as they neared the city.

The third reason for their cheerfulness is that after bathing and relaxing on the banks of the Ganges, they felt very refreshed after the tiring journey from the hermitage of sage Vishwamitra.

<sup>5</sup>In Adhyatma Ramayan of Veda Vyas it is said that Lord Ram, Laxman and sage Vishwamitra crossed the river Ganges on a boat to proceed ahead to Janakpur. Refer: Adhyatma Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 6, verse nos. 2, 5.

This appears very logical because Janakpur is situated in the foothills of the Himalayan mountain range, on the other side of the river Ganges, whereas sage

Vishwamitra's hermitage and Ayodhya both were located on this side of the river's bank.]

When Lord Ram saw the beauty, the magnificence and the grandeur of the city (of king Videha, also known as the city of Janak after its king Janak) as he approached it, he was highly delighted together with his younger brother (Laxman)<sup>1</sup>. (5)

[In these following verses, the beauty of the city of Videha or Janakpur, the capital of king Janak, is being described:-]<sup>2</sup>

There were many large water tanks (or step-wells), wells, rivers and ponds that were filled with water as sweet as nectar. Their steps were studded with precious gems. (6)

Bees which had become intoxicated by drinking nectar to their fill were buzzing everywhere. Beautiful birds of different kinds were hopping, cooing and chirping around merrily. (7)

Lotus flowers of different shades of colours bloomed, and a delightful breeze that was sweet, fragrant and soft constantly blew. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The two brothers were princes of a rich kingdom of Ayodhya. They knew how a great city, the capital of an important kingdom, should look like. When one approaches a capital city of a big country, its ambience and aura of importance begins to be felt from a distance. One gets the feeling that he is fast approaching a great city, a huge metropolis.

The Lord and his brother were excited because when they saw that the approaches to the city of Videha were so beautifully laid out and charming, it is sure that the city proper would naturally be a magnificent one. It is quite natural for and expected from boys of their age to be excited at the prospect of visiting a wonderful city and go sightseeing in it. Hence, both Lord Ram and his younger brother Laxman became excited.

<sup>2</sup>The general scene is that of plenty of verdant greenery and abundance of vibrant plant and animal life that thrived in Janakpur; there was cheerfulness and happiness all around. There were lots of water bodies, birds and insects, flowers and sweet breeze, and all other components that are symbols of Nature which make one's heart jump in joy and ecstasy.

To wit, the city of Janakpur was a veritable paradise on earth; it was a beautiful city with emphasis on greenery and great for respect for protection of Nature as was evident in its expansive cover of verdant forests and colourful gardens, with lots of trees and flowers and fruits that abounded in them, both within the city as well as on its outskirts. Alongside the trees and plants and water bodies that flourished in Janakpur, there was also a rich presence of flora and fauna of all imaginable varieties. The city as a whole thus was a treat for the eyes of all visitors who came there.]

Countless flower gardens, parks, orchards, groves and mini-forests that were verdant with greenery and brimming with animal and plant life, where birds of different varieties lived cheerfully, and which were all rich with blossoming trees, blooming flowers, verdant leaves etc., flourished all around the city, and adorned (circled) it from all sides. (Doha no. 212)

[Note—To wit, the sprawling city was rich in greenery and had a vibrant animal and plant life. It wasn't a concrete jungle or an over-crowded city with no green space for parks and gardens which are like lungs for a place.

Till this Doha, the outside of the city of Videha has been described. In other words, Lord Ram, Laxman and sage Vishwamitra have reached the outskirts of the city, but they have not entered the city proper; this is proved by the fact that they had stopped and encamped near a mango orchard outside the city: refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-7 that precedes Doha no. 214 which we shall be reading below shortly.

But the whole set of verses next, extending from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 213—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 214 describe the city of Janakpur proper. How did this happen given the fact that Lord Ram and his group are still in the suburbs?

Well, the answer is that the narrator of this epic Ram Charit Manas, saint Goswami Tulsidas, treats himself as a scribe—and not as a poet or an author—who follows his revered Lord Sri Ram closely from behind, penning down silently for posterity whatever he heard and saw. This fact that Tulsidas does not regard himself as a great scholar or poet, but is writing this story merely to clean and purify his mind and pen, is clearly asserted by him in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Doha no. 9 and its preceding Chaupai line nos. 8, 11; (ii) Doha no. 10 and its Chaupai line nos. 7 as well as Chanda line nos. 1-2; (iii) Doha no. 13 and its preceding Chaupai line nos. 4-10; and finally (iv) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 14.

Now therefore, why does he describe the inner part of the city of Janakpur though his Lord Ram is still on its outskirts? The answer to this question is this: It is quite possible that when Lord Ram and other sages who were accompanying him were walking to Janakpur, others travelers who were also going there joined them on the way. When a group of new visitors who are on their way to a place meet other fellow travelers who are well acquainted with that place, it is quite natural that a conversation starts whereby the old hands tell the newcomers about the city and its wonderful sights. This is what might have happened in this case. Tulsidas is just narrating the events as they happened, so it looks odd that he will add something from his own side before it actually happened. So this eventuality seems most probable—that the fellow travelers had described the city of Janakpur to Lord Ram and Laxman on the way. This description continues in the next three lines.

When Laxman heard about the fascinating city, he desired in his heart to go and see it. This is clear later on in Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 218 that we shall be reading below.

Now, the next question arises that when Lord Ram, Laxman and sage Vishwamitra had started on their journey for Janakpur, they were alone; no one had accompanied them at the start of the journey. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 212. Then how did a group form in which there were many sages and holy men who would be telling Lord Ram and Laxman about the city of Janakpur and its delights? The fact that a group had formed after the Lord took a bath in the river Ganges and moved ahead from there, as well as at the time when he reached Janakpur is endorsed in (i) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 212, and (ii) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 214 respectively.

So, what may have happened? The fame and glory of Lord Ram had already spread far and wide. The story of sage Vishwamitra going to Ayodhya to bring Lord Ram and Laxman to his hermitage, killing of Tadakaa, Subahu and the rest of the demon army, and the magical feat of converting a stone into a lady, i.e. the liberation of Ahilya from her curse, was no longer a secret. This news must have spread like wild fire by word of mouth. The sages, hermits and other holy men of that part of the land were awe-struck and realised that the two princes were no ordinary humans, but surely they possessed some super-human divine powers. They were all aware of the prophesy that the Supreme Lord would one day come to eliminate the demons and free the earth from their terror. So obviously they deduced that these two boys must be the Lord for the simple reason that killing of Tadakaa, Subahu and the huge demon army by two princes without any other help was unthinkable and impossible. Added to this was the liberation of Ahilya which itself was proof of the divine nature of Lord Ram.

So, as soon as the word spread that the great sage Vishwamitra is headed towards Janakpur with Lord Ram and Laxman, a lot many holy men who lived along the route or even in areas from where they could manage to reach them, hurried to have a holy glimpse of the two divine brothers as well as sage Vishwamitra. Some of them met the trio on the way, some decided to assemble on the banks of river Ganges where they were sure that the three would come to take a bath on their way to Janakpur.

Eager to remain with the Lord for as long as they practically could, they told him and sage Vishwamitra that they were all headed for Janakpur to attend the bow ceremony. And that like journeymen joining others headed in a common direction, they all formed a group moving to Janakpur. The group must have swelled as more and more sages joined in the hope of having a divine sight of Lord Ram and spending some wonderful days in his company.

So a huge throng of sages and other holy men had formed on the way to Janakpur. All were eager to talk with the two brothers and be close to them. So what sort of conversation must have been struck? As is normal in the case of tourists and visitors to new cities, when they learnt that the two brothers were going to Janakpur for the first time, they began their narration of the city and its wonderful charms to Lord Ram and Laxman. This is a normal thing amongst travelers; old hands give their advice to newcomers into a city. After all, some excuse had to be found by these sages to talk with Lord Ram and Laxman.

Sage Vishwamitra, meanwhile, kept quiet, for he did not want to prevent these aged and devoted sages and holy men to enjoy the Lord's company for a while; why would he. After all, they too had the right for spiritual bliss and happiness like he has. Tulsidas was mentally following his Lord Sri Ram quietly from behind. He heard this conversation, and like a true scribe, he jotted down the dialogue, and is now telling us what he heard about Janakpur in the following verses.]

चौ०. बनइ न बरनत नगर निकाई । जहाँ जाइ मन तहँई लोभाई ॥ १ ॥

cāru bajāru bicitra am̐bārī. manimaya bidhi janu svakara sam̐vārī. 2.

The charm, beauty and attractiveness of the city (of Janakpur) surpassed all imagination. Wherever one went, one's heart and mind were fascinated and captivated by it (and for all practical purposes it appeared to be a virtual heavenly city on earth)<sup>1</sup>.
(1)

The well planned and clean markets (i.e. the shops that lined the two sides of the streets in an orderly manner) and the market places (i.e. the areas designated for shops and other business activities) were well laid out and very magnificent to behold. There were wonderful balconies studded with priceless gems, and looked as if the creator (Brahma) had himself crafted them with his own hands<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Whereas it was possible to describe the general view of the outskirts of the city as narrated in the previous verses, it is not possible to do so for the inside of the city because it is so fascinating and wonderful that wherever one rests his eyes, one is awe-struck by its beauty and charm. One part of the city is so diverse and different from the other that the mind and intellect fail to find words to describe them properly and correctly. So it is better to just outline the main features as narrated in the following verses.

<sup>2</sup>After having entered the outer limits of the great city, Lord Ram, Laxman and Vishwamitra are moving through its outer market area. There are rows of shops on the ground floor, and the upper floors have balconies. These were probably residential quarters.

Remember: A great capital city has many far-flung areas that we like to call the greater metropolitan areas of the city. The city's municipal boundaries extend for many miles around the city center where the central government offices and other power centers such as the secretariat, the presidential buildings, the prime minister's and other ministers' residences and offices etc. are located. The same thing applies to countries ruled by monarchs. The king's palace is located usually in the center of a planned city which extends for tens of miles around.

If one enters a large city he will observe that there are numerous market places and residential colonies that are self-sufficient and complete towns in themselves, spreading for miles away from the central hub, the power center, of the main city.

This is exactly what we read here about Janakpur. This will be evident soon when we read that the invited kings and princes pitched their camps near ponds and rivers on the outskirts of the city. And when sage Vishwamitra saw a pleasant site, which was a mango orchard, he decided to stay there with Lord Ram and Laxman. Refer: Chaupai line nos. 4-7 that precede Doha no. 214.

It will be pertinent to compare the magnificence and beauty of Janakpur, as is being described presently, with that of Ayodhya, the capital city of Lord Ram, which is described later on in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Doha no. 23 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-10 that precede it; and (ii) Chanda line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 28—to Doha no. 29. We will discover a similarity between the two cities in as far as their grandeur, magnificence, charm and beauty are concerned.]

In the shops, rich merchants who were like personified forms of the patron god of wealth, known as Kuber or “dhanada”, sit with their wares and merchandise of all kinds<sup>1</sup>. (3)

The city squares and its lanes and by-lanes were lovely (like its main streets). They were washed, cleaned, spruced up and sprayed with perfumes on a regular basis. (4)

All the buildings (residences, shops, places of worship etc.) had an auspicious aura about them; they were so wonderful to behold that they appeared to be beautiful paintings made by Kamdeo, the husband of Rati and the patron god of the virtues of beauty, charm and magnificence, who appears to have painted them himself<sup>2</sup>. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The shops are well-stocked and the shop-keepers look well-off. This is expected. As soon as the word spread that the king has invited a large number of kings and princes for the marriage of his daughter, all the business families of the city stocked up and piled their goods in anticipation of the huge crowd of visitors, and its consequent opportunity for windfall transactions.

This is a normal practice even in today's modern world: whenever there is a sports meet or some other occasion for huge gatherings such as some religious festival, businesses of shopkeepers' boom.

<sup>2</sup>Kamdeo is the patron god of things that are characterized by beauty and charm. The buildings of the city were so magnificent and wondrous to look at that they appear to be picture-post card perfect. Even in our current time, we have so many beautiful cities with so many charming buildings that tourists take away their photos as mementos. Tourist spots are flooded with post-cards of beautiful buildings that are landmarks of a city or characterize it in general terms.

Janakpur had large city squares which were well tended. Its lanes and by-lanes were washed and kept clean; there weren't stinking and full of filth.]

The residents of the city were noble, honest and of a simple nature, being free from pretensions and deceit (subhaga). They were of a clean and pure heart and mind (suci); they were saintly, pious and holy (santā); they were followers of the law of Dharma (righteousness, probity, propriety, morality and ethics) (dharamasīla); they were wise, intelligent and learned (gyānī); and they possessed good virtues of all kinds (gunavantā)<sup>1</sup>. (6)

[Now, the immediate area around the king's palace is being described briefly.]

The place where king Janak's palace was situated was exceptionally marvelous and fabulous, and it stood apart from the rest of the city in its beauty and magnificence. Even the Gods were awe-struck by its splendour and grandeur. (7)

The fortification walls around the palace held the mind enthralled, and it looked that it has enclosed within its walls all the magnificence and beauty of the universe<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>No matter how beautiful a city is and how wonderful it is managed, but all this is useless if its inhabitants are unworthy of it. If the citizens of a city are unruly and unethical, if they are utterly selfish and exploitative, if they are cruel and ruthless, if they lack civil sense and do not show respect to each other—then obviously such a city becomes one like Lanka, the golden city of the demons.

Who will like to live with ruffians, scoundrels and thugs as neighbours? Everyone wishes to live in a neighbourhood where the people are friendly, helpful, courteous and law-abiding.

Any city could be artificially decked up for some special occasion, but the nature of its citizens can't be changed.

It's like the case of a human body. What is the good of having a well-built and handsome physical body if the man himself is cruel, selfish and animal-like? Everyone hates him. So is the case with a city. If its residents are nice, others flock to this city. On the other hand, no matter what good prospects city offers, if the guest feels he is unwelcome and is afraid every other moment for his own safety, he will abandon the city forthwith.

<sup>2</sup>If the city is so exceedingly magnificent and wondrous that wherever one looks he finds it more enchanting than the other places as all the places are uniquely beautiful and charming exceedingly, with their glamour and beauty holding the beholder's mind and heart spell-bound as no where else such a city of equal comparison exists in this world, it is no wonder that the palace of the city's king and the area surrounding it would be special and more striking than the rest of the city.

Some of the capitals of kings were built within the walls of the fort—like the case of Lanka, the capital of the demon kingdom. It was a huge fort surrounded from the outside with a high wall. It had four massive doors or gates at its four corners. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (i) Sundar Kand, Chaupai line no. 10 that precedes Doha no. 3; and (ii) Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 39.

The same was the design of Ayodhya, the capital city of king Dasrath, the father of Lord Ram. It was surrounded by high walls on all its sides. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 27.

But in the case of Janakpur, only the central area around the king's palace was surrounded by a wall, and the rest of the city spilled out far beyond its ramparts for miles on end. The immediate area around the king's palace resembled like a small fortress or castle, while the rest of the city sprawled beyond it.]

[This Doha describes the palace where Sita, the eldest daughter of king Janak, lived.]

The palace where Sita ("Siya") lived had clean white walls which reflected light to make them appear radiant. The palace had golden doors and windows studded with gems, and over those hanged curtains of different varieties with fine golden embroidery, and embellished with gems and pearls.

How can one describe the opulence, the beauty and the magnificence of the personal residence of Sita? [That is, it is impossible to describe its glamour and beauty in words.] (Doha no. 213)

[Note—Sita was a manifestation of goddess Laxmi, the divine consort of Lord Vishnu and the patron goddess of material wealth and prosperity. Obviously then, her personal quarters is expected to be marvelous. Its opulence was beyond description.

If the doors were made of gold, the walls cannot be simple brick structures. They were also studded with diamonds and crystal, giving them a shiny, glittering appearance.

Remember: Lord Ram, Laxman and sage Vishwamitra are still on the outskirts of the city; they haven't reached its central area. Refer: Chaupai line nos. 4-7 that precede Doha no. 214 which we will be reading shortly.

Hence this description of the king's palace and that of his daughter's must not be construed as being watched by the Lord himself. Actually, Goswami Tulsidas, the author of this epic, is giving us a preview of the city. It's almost like going through a brochure describing a fascinating capital city. See note appended to Doha no. 212 herein above.]

All the doors were beautiful and were studded with diamonds. [Or it may mean that the outer doors of the palace and the gates of the fortress wall had armour plates on them. These armoured plates were made of diamond.]<sup>1</sup>

These doors and gates were always crowded by throngs of feudal princes (junior or subordinate kings) as well as dancers, bards, minstrels and heralds. [They stood there for their turn to be heard by the king.]<sup>1</sup> (1)

There were huge stables for horses and large grounds earmarked for elephants. They were always full with horses, elephants and chariots. (2)

There were many palaces belonging to brave warriors, ministers and army commanders which were similar in beauty and grandeur to the palace of the king.

[The king made it a point to let his ministers and chief army commanders feel important and respected because he was wise enough to understand that he depends upon them for his own survival.]<sup>2</sup> (3)*

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The entire objective of this narration is to highlight the opulence, majesty and grandeur of the king and his capital. This was no ordinary king; he was like an emperor because so many feudal lords were waiting at the door to have an audience with him.

<sup>2</sup>The king had a huge army consisting of cavalry that had war horses, elephant brigades, as well as infantry made up of strong and brave warriors.

*One very important to note is that Tulsidas has described the cities of Lord Ram and Sita, i.e. Ayodhya and Janakpur respectively, in almost identical terms. This is because both are equally adorable for him; because they are manifestations of Lord Vishnu and goddess Laxmi respectively. Tulsidas cannot insult one by making it look that the other is superior. Even a cursory reading of how Ayodhya looks and comparing it with the description with Janakpur will clear all doubts in this respect. Both the cities mightily amazed the Gods; both were equally magnificent and wonderful; both defied description.

Whereas Janakpur is described in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand at the following places—(i) from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 212—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 214; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 224; (iii) from Doha no. 287—to Doha no. 289, the grandeur of Ayodhya is narrated in the following places—(i) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 194; (ii) Baal Kand, from Chaupai line nos. 2-8 that precede Doha no. 195; (iii) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 296—to Doha no. 297; (iv) Uttar Kand, from Chaupai line nos. 2-7 that precede Doha no. 4; (v) Uttar Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 20—to Doha no. 23; and (vi) Uttar Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 26—to Doha no. 29.]

[Now, we go back to where Lord Ram and his group of travelers are on the outskirts of the city.]

On the outskirts of the city, countless invited kings and princes had pitched their camps near ponds and rivers and other water bodies. (1)

There was a beautiful mango orchard. It was very comfortable for staying (as all the necessary basic things needed for a comfortable stay were available there—such as water, shade, fruits, a general pleasant environment, and open ground that was clean, even and soft enough to pitch up a camp). (2)

Seeing it, Kaushik (sage Vishwamitra) told Lord Ram—‘Oh Raghubir (i.e. the brave Raghu, Lord Ram)! I like this place. Let us stop here for our stay during the course of the bow breaking ceremony.<sup>1</sup>’ (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The wise sage Vishwamitra did not wish to enter the city right away. Had he been alone he might have thought of going straight to the palace of the king, Janak, as he had done at Ayodhya. When a great sage or seer goes to a king, he does not stay outside the city, waiting for the king to come and invite him. Instead, they go straight to the king who rushes out of the palace as soon as he hears that a sage is standing at his palace door.

But in this case the situation was different. Vishwamitra was not alone; he was accompanied by two princes, Ram and Laxman. They were not ordinary princes, but belonged to another great kingdom of Ayodhya. King Janak had not invited them. This will be very clear later on when the king actually meets Vishwamitra and asks him about these two boys. Refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 216.

Vishwamitra observed that the invited kings and princes were pitching their camps here and there outside the city. So he decided to stop somewhere nearby to maintain the dignity and respect of Lord Ram and Laxman who their father, king Dasrath, had entrusted him with. It would not be proper and dignified to go to the gate of king Janak with these two noble princes in tow. They were not his junior sages or students, for then it would have been alright for him to go straight to Janak’s palace as great sages were always accompanied by their junior sages or students or followers.

To go to the king direct would be insulting for Lord Ram and Laxman's dignity and self-respect.

Vishwamitra decided therefore to stay outside the city in deference to the self-respect and dignity of two great princes Ram and Laxman, and wait for king Janak to come himself and welcome them.]

भलेहिं नाथ कहि कृपानिकेता । उतरे तहँ मुनिबृंद समेता ॥ ७ ॥ bhalēhiṁ nātha kahi kṛpānikētā. utarē taham̐ munibṛnda samētā. 7.

bisvāmitra mahāmuni ā'ē. samācāra mithilāpati pā'ē. 8.

The Lord (Ram), who is like a treasury and abode of grace, mercy and compassion, replied—‘Alright Lord, so be it.’ Then the Lord, along with his brother Laxman and sage Vishwamitra, stopped at the selected place to stay during their visit to Janakpur<sup>1</sup>. (7)

Meanwhile, the king of Mithila (king Janak) heard the news that the great sage Vishwamitra has come<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Ram is described as being merciful and gracious here because he realised that all the sages in the group were tired and wanted to rest. If he insisted to move further ahead in his eagerness to enter the city, they will not find rest. Besides this, sages are accustomed to live in natural surroundings, and not in congested places or guest houses of a city. So even if they moved ahead and actually entered the city to take up lodging in some guest house or inn specially prepared to host visitors coming to attend the bow-ceremony, it will cause great inconvenience to the accompanying sages.

Hence, he readily agreed at once to the suggestion of Vishwamitra to pitch camp in the mango grove. Surely, if it was to the liking of sage Vishwamitra it would also be to the liking of other sages in the group, the Lord deduced.

It is important to note here that the ‘merciful and compassionate’ Lord gave precedence to the convenience of the sages over his own comfort. Personally he would have been more comfortable in a building with all facilities as he was a prince accustomed to material comforts, but the happiness of sages was of priority for him. Therefore instead of suggesting politely that it would be better to enter the city and find accommodation in some inn or lodging place, he agreed to encamp in the open ground.

It is obvious here that sage Vishwamitra came to Janakpur without making any fuss; he came in unnoticed and quietly with the two brothers without any prior knowledge of king Janak. Numerous sages, kings and princes were coming to attend the Bow-breaking ceremony, and all the roads leading to Janakpur were filled with numerous entourages of kings who were accompanied by their royal paraphernalia and retinue of attendants and train of courtiers, as well as sages and seers who came with their disciples and juniors. Hence, no one paid any attention to the three visitors. They selected a place for their stay, spread their sitting mats on the ground, and put down the little provisions that they carried with them for the journey. The wise and learned sage wished to keep a low profile as is the wont of those who are truly elevated in stature, for they don't want to show-off themselves anywhere. But as it is hard for the sun to hide its presence, so it is also hard for such illustrious souls as sage Vishwamitra to remain incognito for a long time, for their glorious reputation and name would almost always make their presence known inspite of their best effort to avoid publicity.

So it happened that king Janak had appointed countless servants and ushers to welcome all visitors and make sure they are well looked after and proper arrangements are made for them in accordance to their status and likings. Some of them approached sage Vishwamitra to enquire who he was; as for Lord Ram and Laxman they deemed them to be the sage's disciples. When they came to know who this sage was, one of them ran to inform the king, that the great sage named Vishwamitra has come. Remember: Vishwamitra was not an ordinary sage; he was well known in the world of that time. Though the servants and ushers may not have recognized him in the beginning as all the sages and seers who had come more or less had the same outwardly appearances, but as soon as they heard his name they immediately recognized him, and wasted no time to rush to inform their king, Janak, of the sage's arrival.]

As soon as he (Janak) got this news, the king summoned his senior ministers who were wise and noble-hearted, as well as many senior warriors, army commanders, noble Brahmins, his Guru (royal priest, Shatanand), and other senior members of the royal family and members of the society, and proceeded very cheerfully to meet the great sage (Vishwamitra) who himself was like a king amongst sages. (Doha no. 214)

[Note—It is noteworthy here that Vishwamitra is described as being a 'king amongst sages'. The idea is that one great king (Janak) is going to meet another great king (Vishwamitra), albeit they belonged to two different vocations in life—for one was a sovereign of a kingdom, and the other was a sovereign amongst sages and seers! They were outstanding examples of great, noble, illustrious and accomplished souls in their respective fields.

Remember: King Janak was highly regarded as an enlightened king of his time. He was well versed in metaphysics and was a highly realised soul. This proof lies in the fact that he used to hold regular religious conclaves in a grand scale where not only discourses were given by great seers, sages and scriptural scholars but special sessions for debates and discussions were held where great prizes were announced for the winner. This is evident when we study the Brihad Aranyaka Upanishad of the Shukla Yajur Veda where one such episode is narrated in its Canto 3.

It is also described in the same Upanishad how Janak had discussed profound metaphysical topics with the great sage Yagyawalkya in Canto 4.

Another place where sage Yagyawalkya teaches king Janak is the Brihajjabal Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition. In its Brahman (Canto) 7, verse nos. 1-4, the king is taught on the spiritual importance of the sacred ash known as the Bhasma. Verse no. 5 of this Brahman 7 says that king Janak accompanied sage Pippallaad to the divine abode of Prajapati Brahma, the creator, to learn more about the Bhasma. This shows that Janak was a contemporary of sage Pippallaad.

The level of Janak's learning and erudition is evident from another incident when sage Shukdeo, the enlightened son of sage Veda Vyas who had classified the Vedas, compiled the Upanishads, and written the voluminous Purans, was advised by his learned father to go to king Janak to learn profound principles of metaphysics and spiritualism. Janak had tested Shukdeo's eligibility, aptitude and competence by making him wait for prolonged time before even giving him a hearing. The entire episode along with the profound teachings of Janak forms the subject matter of the text of Canto 2 of the Maho-panishad of the Sam Veda tradition.]

[As soon as king Janak came to know that the great sage Vishwamitra has come to pay a visit, he made haste to go and receive the sage without any waste of time. It was a matter of great honour for the king that Vishwamitra has come at a time when the Bow-breaking ceremony was to be held, and it would be rare chance that the king would get to receive the great sage's blessings on this auspicious occasion. It would be a matter of great privilege and honour that a great sage of Vishwamitra's stature would attend the ceremony and sit by the side of the king during the course of the ceremony, as it would bestow him immense respect in the community of his peers, the great kings and princes of the world.

The following verses describe the meeting between sage Vishwamitra and king Janak.]<sup>1</sup>

The king (Janak) bowed before the sage (Vishwamitra) by putting his head on his feet. The sage on his part cheerfully blessed the king. (1)

The king then paid his respects to all the accompanying sages, and felt very privileged and glad to have the opportunity to pay his obeisance to so many great holy men who have come to visit him. (2)

Then sage Vishwamitra repeatedly asked the king about his welfare and respectfully gave him a seat to sit down near him. (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Meeting of Janak and sage Vishwamitra has also been briefly described in Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 61.

It is a normal practice that when a group of noble men or holy men arrive at someone's place, the host shows special honours to the chief of the group. In this case, the chief was sage Vishwamitra, so king put his head on his feet to honour him and pay his respects to him. For the rest of the sages he may have simply bowed his head and offered his greetings.

Similarly, sage Vishwamitra reciprocated Janak's gesture by giving him special blessings and asking about his welfare. This does not mean that he neglected others in the king's company—there were senior ministers, army commanders, Brahmins, members of the royal family and even the royal priest. All of them were shown due respect, but special attention was paid to their king, Janak.

A very significant point is to be noted here. When sage Vishwamitra met king Dasrath, he did not either bless him or asked for his welfare, whereas here he is doing it with respect to Janak. [Refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 207 with respect to the sage's meeting with Dasrath.]

The reason is that in the case of Dasrath, the sage was under great mental tension as he was unsure whether or not the king would accept his request to send Ram and Laxman with him. The sage wanted to maintain his dignified posture and the external appearance of not being too submissive before the king to hint him that he is serious on the matter for which he has come, and would not tolerate dithering and fooling around. The sage willingly created a stern atmosphere about himself so that Dasrath would think thrice before denying. But the sage learnt a bitter lesson there. He discovered to his horror that the king did not fear him at all, and he straight away refused to send Ram and Laxman with him.

Then the sage must have realised that had he been courteous and shown due respect to the king, there were greater chances of him accepting his request. The sage deduced that the king was afraid of the sage's stern manners, and that he did not wish to send his beloved sons with such a stern-looking sage who did not even know how to smile. The king feared that his sons would be treated roughly and without the basic respect they deserved as princes if he did send them with Vishwamitra who does not know how to properly treat kings and their family members.

So this time when he met Janak he acted courteously and showed due respect to the king. Then again, on this occasion he had no mental tension, and was in a cheerful mood. There was no element of uncertainty this time around, as he knew the forthcoming developments due to his foresight.

Another factor was that this time he had Lord Ram and Laxman with him, and he had already discovered their potentials and might. So he was very certain that he would not go empty-handed from the bow-breaking ceremony. The very fact that Janak was the father of Sita, the personified form of goddess Laxmi and the divine consort of Lord Ram was one other factor for the sage showing so much respect to him.

But the most important factor which made Vishwamitra show so much respect to him as compared to Dasrath was the fact that the sage knew about the level of Janak's spiritual enlightenment, his erudition and sagacity, his knowledge of metaphysical principles and scriptures. So Janak deserved this respect. Refer to note of Doha no. 214 above. Unfortunately, though Lord Vishnu became a son of Dasrath in the form of Lord Ram, the king was no match with Janak in this respect. And this is the reason why Vishwamitra desisted in showing great respect to Dasrath other than mere formalities.]

At that moment, the two brothers (Ram and Laxman) arrived there. They had gone away to see the flower garden<sup>1</sup>. (4)

They had dark and fair complexions respectively, were of a young age, delicate in countenance, and presented a sight that provided bliss to the eyes of the beholder. There is no wonder in it because their charm was so astounding that it held the entire world enthralled and captivated. (5)

When the Lord of the Raghu's dynasty (i.e. Lord Ram) came, everyone stood up. [Wonderful! It was a spontaneous response. The two brothers had such a dynamic personality, an air of elegance, authority and dignity around them that all the assembled people were instantly impressed and concluded that some great prince has walked in. This is what Vishwamitra had really wanted—that the brothers' should make a dramatic presence before king Janak and his courtiers when they had finished their formal exchange of pleasantries with the guest sage so that their undivided attention could be focused on Lord Ram and Laxman.]<sup>2</sup>

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When Janak came, Lord Ram and Laxman were out visiting some garden. They arrived at the scene when all were seated. As soon as they came, all eyes turned towards them, and all those present were dumb-struck by their charm and bewitching beauty. Their eyes seemed to be riveted at Lord Ram and Laxman.

Perhaps the two brothers had gone to fetch flowers for sage Vishwamitra so that he can do his worship rituals. Or perhaps they had gone out of curiosity to see the nearby garden while the sages did their daily worship rituals and rested.

Sage Vishwamitra had purposely sent them the garden to avoid their presence at the time Janak arrives. This is because the wise sage correctly thought that at the moment the king arrives, the latter's attention would be focused on the sage, wishing him and paying his obeisance to him. This would mean that Ram and Laxman, who were not only great princes but ones with astounding potentials and divine powers to whom special treatment should be normally given, would be neglected. There were many other sages in the group, and the king would not pay equal attention to each of them; it is practically not possible. The king would naturally think that these two boys were some students of Vishwamitra who have accompanied him to Janakpur like so many other sages in the group.

Vishwamitra would not like this to happen. He planned things in such a way that when Lord Ram and Laxman are first seen by the king and his retinue, all attention is focused on these two brothers. So he told them to go to the garden to bring flowers for his worship formalities, timing their coming back so that the king would have completed his welcoming formalities and would be in a relaxed mind.

<sup>2</sup>As has been noted above in the note of verse no. 5, Vishwamitra's tactic worked extremely well. When Lord Ram and Laxman arrived, all those present were stunned by their dynamic personality. It was obvious to them that they were not ordinary princes but some exalted and highly acclaimed personalities who deserve respect and honour. This is proved by all of them standing up spontaneously.

<sup>3</sup>Vishwamitra wanted to be sure that the assembled persons understood that these two boys are very special. So he called them and gave them a seat close to himself—indicating that he loves them and they are very dear and close to him.

The assembly, which was already wonderstruck by the two princes, was more awed when they saw that the great sage Vishwamitra was showing such love and affection to them, treating them with respect himself by calling them near and giving them a seat near his own. That means, they obviously deduced, that these two princes were very special.

Once Lord Ram and Laxman were seated, all the rest also took their respective seats and sat down before the sage.]

mūrati madhura manōhara dēkhī. bhaya'u bidēhu bidēhu bisēṣī. 8.

When the assembled people (i.e. king Janak, his courtiers, ministers, the royal priest and the Brahmins who had accompanied the king to welcome the sage) saw the two brothers, all of them felt extremely glad and exhilarated so much so that tears of ecstasy gushed out of their eyes and their bodies become thrilled. (7)

King Janak was known as 'Videha' (literally one who has no awareness of his gross physical body because he is enlightened and remains submerged in the thoughts of the Atma, the pure conscious soul, by being virtually in a state of perpetual Samadhi, a trance-like state of transcendental existence). When he (Videha) saw the extremely sweet, bewitchingly beautiful and very enchanting image (form) of the Lord, he was so ecstatic that he lost whatever awareness he had of himself and his surroundings. That is, he truly became a 'Videha'—one who has no awareness or consciousness of the existence of the physical body and his surroundings.

[Lord Ram's enigmatic beauty and magnetic charm that were of an esoteric and enigmatic nature had completely bowled-over Janak, and for once he forgot that he is supposed to be immune to physical charms and attractions, a virtue that has given him the name of 'Videha'—i.e. one who is not aware of his physical body and the senses of perception that make this body aware of the gross outside world and become attracted to or attached with it, for it is supposed that Janak was a highly self-realised soul who was a true ascetic from the within, while acting the role of a king from the without.] (8)

[Note—Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 61, stanza no. 3 also.

We see with our eyes; the perception of beauty is the subject matter of the eye. So when the assembly saw Lord Ram and Laxman's beautiful forms, their eyes responded with tears of joy. The august assembly became ecstatic and emotional upon seeing them. It was a natural surge of love and affection that heaved in their hearts, forcing tears to well-up and stream out of their eyes spontaneously in response.

King Janak too was ecstatic, but his condition was far more emotional than the rest of assembled people. This is because he was highly self-realised and always remained engrossed in perpetual meditation. The Atma, a person's soul, is pure consciousness, and it is a microcosmic form of the cosmic Consciousness. This cosmic Consciousness is represented by Lord Ram as he is a personified form of the Supreme Being.

Just like the case of the mighty ocean heaving at the sight of the full moon, causing high tides, the blissful state of Janak reached a new high of ecstasy when he saw Lord Ram. His individual Atma heaved and surged forward when it came near the supreme Atma, the 'Parmatma' represented by Lord Ram, attempting to extend its reach to subtly touch it and draw in from the eternal fountain of supreme bliss.

This situation can be understood by another example. When a very powerful and huge piece of magnet is brought near smaller pieces of magnets, it is the latter that are attracted to the former, and not the other way round. So, when the cosmic Consciousness, the supreme Atma known as the Parmatma, was so near, the fraction of it that lived in the body of Janak as his individual Atma was instantly attracted to it like the smaller magnet getting pulled towards the large magnet.

The condition of Janak can be compared to the bird known as Chakor. When this bird sees the full moon, it forgets about everything else and fixes its gaze on it. When the moon travels across the sky, the Chakor too follows its path, bending its head and slowly turning it to follow the moon.

Janak was stunned and amazed beyond measure; he became speechless and immobile. This condition of his is being so immobilised and speechless is summarized here by saying that 'he truly became a Videha'—one who has lost complete awareness of his physical body and its surroundings; one who loses all consciousness of the presence of his body.

We shall read later on that the wise king Janak had once again forgot about his reputation as a wise and enlightened king who is detached from the world and neutral towards all its attractions when he had become emotional at the time of Sita's departure with Lord Ram for Ayodhya after their marriage—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 338. At that time also, the erudite poet-bard Tulsidas has used the word "Videha" to drive home the point that inspite of being detached and dispassionate towards this gross world, Janak had for once lost all self-control out of his love for Sita and Lord Ram.]

When the king realised that his Mana (mind and heart) have become overwhelmed with surging waves of love and affections, he used his wisdom and prudence to regain his poise and recover his senses.

He bowed at the feet of the sage (Vishwamitra), and, recollecting himself, said the following words in a voice soaked in emotions and with a throat that was choked. (Doha no. 215)

[Note—Janak was not a child. For some moments he was so overcome with spiritual bliss and emotions that came to him on coming into contact with Lord Ram that he couldn't control himself, and inspite of being aware that there were so many people watching him closely, Janak fell into a trance like state that comes with attainment of spiritual bliss and ecstasy when one reaches a higher state of transcendental existence in meditation, which are called Turiya and Turiyateet.

From the perspective of the mortal world, it was like the case of tired man coming under the cool shade of a tree where a soft breeze blows and the fragrance of its flowers pervades the surrounding area; this tired and weary person cannot remain uninfluenced or unaffected or unimpressed by this rejuvenating and reinvigorating atmosphere. He is bound to soak in it, and forget about everything else in the world.

So it was with Janak, but nevertheless he soon recovered his poise for he remembered that so many things have to be done at that moment, and it was not the right time to enter into trance like state of spiritual bliss and ecstasy. He became practical, and waking up from his dream-like state of ecstasy and bliss by breaking free from its overwhelming spell after a short while, he gathered himself sufficiently to speak to sage Vishwamitra.

The following verses narrate what Janak told Vishwamitra, and what the sage replied.]

चौ०. कहहु नाथ सुंदर दोउ बालक । मुनिकुल तिलक कि नृप कुल पालक ॥१॥

ब्रह्म जो निगम नेति कहि गावा । उभय बेष धरि की सोइ आवा ॥ २ ॥ brahma jō nigama nēti kahi gāvā. ubhaya bēṣa dhari kī sō'i āvā. 2.

King Janak asked sage Vishwamitra—‘Oh Lord, tell me who these two charming, pretty boys are. Are they the exalted sons of some sage’s family, or are they the princes of some great king?’<sup>1</sup> (1)

Or is it that Brahm, the Supreme Being whom the Vedas describe as being ‘Neti-Neti’ (not that; not this)<sup>2</sup>, have himself taken two physical forms (as these two princes)<sup>3</sup>? (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse nos. 64—65 also.

The king had observed that sage Vishwamitra had lovingly called and seated the two brothers close to him. Refer Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 215. So he thought that they may be the sons of some great sage.

But then he changed his view because the two boys had the appearance of princes—they had bows and arrows in their hands, and a quiver tied to the waist.

Their demeanours and attitudes were like dignified princes of some noble dynasty. So he asked the sage whether they belonged to some kingly family.

<sup>2</sup>But again he thought the matter over and changed his view. The way his heart and mind felt instant ecstasy when he saw them made him sure that they can't be ordinary human beings. Remember: Janak was not an ordinary king; he was exceptionally wise and highly enlightened. So it was not possible that his mind and heart would jump with joy as they did for ordinary mortals. The king deduced that the Atma residing in the body of these two princes was very powerful, strong enough to attract his own Atma. For a self-realised and enlightened man, this is only possible if he comes in contact with a superior Being. So the king deduced that in all probability, these two boys were personified forms of Brahm.

The word 'Neti' is used universally by the scriptures to describe Brahm. The word means 'not this not that'. In other words, the scriptures try their best to explain who or what this mysterious cosmic entity known as 'Brahm' is by giving examples and citing instances from the visible world as well as the subtle world beyond vision. But all their attempts to fully describe Brahm fail miserably.

To understand this phenomenon we can take a well-known example. A blind man wants to learn what an elephant looks like. He touches the elephant's leg and then its tail and then its trunk. To him, all feel alike. He asks another man who can see if what he touches is the 'elephant'. The answer is yes and no. Similarly, since everything that exists is a manifestation of Brahm, it represents a minute fraction of the cosmic form of Brahm. But the knowledge of this fractional entity of Brahm does not mean that the person who is acquainted with it is also acquainted with Brahm in its entirety, in its vast, all-encompassing cosmic form. That is why the scriptures ultimately declare that whatever they have said about the Supreme Being does not describe him in entirety. In other words, Brahm is what is visible, understandable and perceptible, as well as that which is invisible, that which is incomprehensible, and that which is imperceptible. It is therefore neither this nor that; it cannot be confined to some criterion and measurable unit. Brahm is present as the life-force in a single-celled organism as he is present in the huge elephant and the most complex of animals, the human race. He is revealed as a stone as much as in the form of air, water, sky and fire.

The existence of Brahm is said to be at two levels: one that is macrocosmic, and the other that is microcosmic. Brahm is invisible like air, as well as visible in the form of the visible world. Brahm is the cosmic Consciousness, that is a subtle entity that uniformly pervades throughout this creation, and at the same time it is also known as the individual creature with an independent Atma which is also pure consciousness that resides in his physical gross body. This simply means that Brahm has a dual existence.

This is what Janak means here. He wonders if the supreme Atma known as Parmatma or Brahm has revealed himself in the body of these two princes. There is an interesting interpretation here. If it is true that Brahm has indeed revealed himself in a physical form, Janak's words assume special meaning: if that is the case, then Lord Ram represents Brahm and Laxman represents his image, like the case of the creature being an image of the Viraat Purush, the cosmic form of Brahm.

An image is a virtual reflection of the principal object; it is like the case of an object's reflection in a mirror. The reflection follows the principal object; if the latter moves then the image or the reflection also moves. This is absolutely true and applicable with Laxman vis-à-vis Lord Ram. Laxman is like the shadow of Lord Ram; he never leaves the Lord even for a moment. Even when Lord Ram had to go to the forest to kill the demons, Laxman followed him like his shadow.

<sup>3</sup>Lord Ram is a personified form of Brahm, the Supreme Being, and Laxman represents Prakriti, Nature. ‘Brahm, who is the Supreme Being and the cosmic Consciousness, is an invisible entity, but ‘Prakriti’ or Nature is the visible aspect of this Brahm. Both these two entities—Brahm and Prakriti—are infinite and beyond the limited viewing field of a creature’s gross body consisting of the organ of perceiving the sights of the world that is known as the eye, as well as his subtle organ known as the mind and intellect that can see and understand things not seen and perceived by any of the physical organs of the body besides the eye.

So, Janak means that his wisdom tells him that in all probability the same Brahm and Prakriti have manifested themselves in the body of Lord Ram and Laxman respectively.]

[Janak continued—] ‘My mind and heart (Mana) are completely dispassionate towards and detached from this world, but suddenly I find them so extremely enchanted and captivated by them (Ram and Laxman) as if the Chakor bird is watching the full moon. [Chakor, the Indian red-legged partridge) is so enamoured of the moon that it fixes its sight on the latter when it rises in the east, and turns its head to maintain its gaze on the moon till it sets in the west. Janak means that like this bird, he is also unable to move his attention away from Lord Ram and Laxman.] (3)

That is why, oh Lord, I am asking you this question. Please be kind to enlighten me, and do not conceal anything from me. (4)

I have developed immense affection for them as soon as I saw them. Their divine vision has forced my mind and heart to leave the bliss that they obtain by remaining submerged in the thoughts of Brahm (by meditating and remaining in a perpetual state of Samadhi, a transcendental state of blissful existence), and instead focus their attention on them.

[This is quite uncharacteristic for me. This has made me perplexed as to why it has come to happen at all. This is the reason why I am asking you to tell me truthfully who these two boys are.]’ (5)

[Note—King Janak effectively told sage Vishwamitra that—“Oh sage, I remain submerged in a virtual state of Samadhi, a transcendental state of existence when a person goes about his normal duties in this physical world but remains engrossed in meditating upon his ‘self’, the pure conscious Atma. Hence, it is not easily that I am disturbed. But I am astonished that in the case of these two brothers, once I looked at them I feel that I have been rewarded for my meditation. This can only happen when my Atma witnesses the presence of the Parmatma, the supreme Atma. This is why I am confused and want to know from you who they are.”

Being self-realised and spiritually enlightened, it is not possible for Janak to be enchanted by anything pertaining to this mortal world. The very fact that it did happen, the very fact that his mind and heart have become so enchanted by the sight of Ram and Laxman, is a sufficient proof that these two princes are not ordinary humans. They are sure to be divine Spirit in a human body.

King Janak was aware that sage Vishwamitra might question his assumption that these two brothers are a personified form of Brahm. So the wise king himself pre-empted this by telling the reason for this assumption of his—he says that he is a dispassionate person who has no attractions for the world, and therefore he is not charmed by the physical features of the two brothers. There must certainly be some hidden cause that has attracted his mind and heart to them.]

The sage smiled politely and replied to the king—‘Oh king! What you have said cannot be wrong (because you are wise and enlightened). You have said the correct thing<sup>1</sup>. (6)

(The sage continued) ‘They are dear to all the creatures; they are loved by all living beings.<sup>2</sup>

When Lord Ram heard this, he smiled softly to himself.<sup>2</sup> (7)

The sage then told king Janak—‘These two boys are like gems of king Raghu’s dynasty, and are the sons of king Dasrath. The king has sent them for my cause, to help me.<sup>3</sup>’ (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse nos. 66—67 also.

This is a remarkable reply of the sage. In a single sentence he has endorsed what the wise king had said about Ram—that is, Lord Ram is sure to be a visible manifestation of Brahm, and Laxman is another form of Brahm. This subtly endorses the theory of ‘duality’ that Janak was referring to. That is, the sage agreed that the formless supreme Brahm has indeed come down to reveal himself in a physical form. At the same time the sage remained silent about openly endorsing that Lord Ram was indeed Brahm personified. It was essential to keep the true identity of Lord Ram a secret because the main purpose of Lord Vishnu coming down to earth was to kill the cruel and sinful demons, and if his true identity was revealed then the whole planning would go for a toss. The demons would run away and hide somewhere, or they would come and surrender before the Lord, bidding for their time when Lord Ram would wind up his earthly sojourn and ascend to the heaven when they would once again surface with renewed vigour and resume their tyranny.

Besides this, the Lord had to perform many acts as an ordinary human to set an example for other human beings to follow in their daily lives. The Lord had planned to act as a living example of the principles of Dharma (laws of auspicious living, laws of righteousness, probity, propriety, ethics and morality) so that other people could emulate him in their own lives when they faced similar situation. Indeed, the entire story of the Ramayan is pregnant with instances of Dharma being practiced in daily life, as well as of the different opposing situations that confront a man in this world and leave him confused as to what is right and what is wrong. In such vexing circumstances, the life and times of Lord Ram stand him in good stead and act like a lighthouse for the boat trapped in the choppy ocean of the world.

This noble objective would have been defeated if the Lord's cosmic supreme form had been revealed. It is left for the future generation to bask in the divinity and sublimity of the Lord's glory just like the case of Lord Jesus Christ whose divinity was known only to a selected few while he was alive, but his glory, his fame and his message became immortal after his physical death on the cross.

The sage hinted to the wise king that after having known who Lord Ram truly is, he too must keep quiet and retain this revelation within his heart, without disclosing it to anyone else. The king got this hint, because all future events show that he acted normally and treated Ram and Laxman like normal princes.

It clearly refers to the 'Atma' which is the pure conscious soul and the life-giving entity of any living being. All the scriptures universally say that a creature's Atma is a fraction of the supreme Atma known as the Parmatma. Only those who are self-realised and enlightened know this fact, and this is why they remain submerged in meditating upon this Atma because it gives them the bliss of Brahm-realisation.

The gross body of a living being is of no use either to him or the rest of the world if this body has no 'life or consciousness' in it; it would be dead and decay rapidly. Every single living being loves his own life, called his 'Pran'. This Pran is dear to all. The word 'Pran' however, also means the vital life-sustaining winds that live inside the body of the creature. But one word has many connotations and cannot be restricted to mean only one particular thing. Hence, Pran means life as well as anything which is extremely dear to someone.

Therefore, the 'Atma', the pure consciousness, is also the 'Pran', the dearest thing for any living being, because the body cannot survive without the Atma.

<sup>2</sup>When Lord Ram heard this, he smiled—for one he hinted to both sage Vishwamitra and to king Janak that it is indeed so, and second, he was embarrassed that he is being praised on his face. When Janak got this stamp of endorsement from the learned sage, his gaze upon Ram became more intense and penetrating. This was one more cause for Lord Ram to smile and subtly acknowledge Janak's respect and love for him.

The Lord subtly told Janak that "Wait, like my father Dasrath all your wisdom will soon vanish in thin air. Soon you will forget who I am, and you will start treating me as a prince and later on as your son-in-law. Wait and watch my maverick Maya cast its net upon your wisdom."

<sup>3</sup>The sage had previously told Janak that his words can't be wrong. Janak and Vishwamitra were both enlightened souls. So the first thing that mattered to them was the fact that Lord Ram was Brahm personified. In all probability, the sage disclosed this fact to Janak in a confidential tone. This was actually possible because they were sitting close by, and when two chiefs are having some confidential discussion, their attendants are not supposed to poke their ears to listen what is being discussed or said. The attendants stand at a respectable distance and let the two chiefs talk.

So, no one else, either the accompanying sages of Vishwamitra, or the king's ministers, officials and Brahmins who accompanied him in his entourage, knew what answer sage Vishwamitra gave in relation to Janak's question "are these brothers Brahm personified".

This fact settled, they then came to more practical things. Yes, the sage told the king, these two boys were princes belonging to a noble and reputed lineage of kings of the Raghu dynasty.

The first question of the king "are they some great sage's son" is also answered subtly here. Remember: when Dasrath had handed Ram and Laxman to sage Vishwamitra, he had told him that now onwards, the sage is like their father. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 208 above. Hence, for all practical purposes, the sage is the father of Lord Ram and Laxman at present.

This also solves the mystery why the sage had affectionately called the two brothers near him and gave him a seat beside him. The exalted sage is like their 'father' at the moment. And like a loving father, he lovingly seated the two brothers near him. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 215 above.

Thus we see that all the three things that Janak had said were true—i.e. that Lord Ram and Laxman were like the sons of a great sage Vishwamitra, they were also the sons of a great king Dasrath, and they were personified forms of the Supreme Being known as Brahm.]

दो०. रामु लखनु दोउ बंधुबर रूप सील बल धाम ।

The sage concluded introducing the two brothers to king Janak by saying—"Their names are Ram and Laxman, and they are brothers. They are like a treasury of politeness and humbleness, as well as of strength and valour.

The whole world is witness to the fact that they have protected my fire sacrifice by defeating and conquering the demons who had been defiling it.' (Doha no. 216)

[Note—In order to impress upon king Janak that the two brothers are not merely princes of a great kingdom, but they deserve special mention as they have protected his fire sacrifice by killing fierce demons, the sage concluded their introduction with this final comment.

Kings honour warriors; great warriors are respected and honoured everywhere. When a king comes to learn that the person standing in front of him is a renowned warrior of great strength and valour, and he has done certain valorous deeds no one has yet dared to do, he develops special respect for that person. The sage also wanted to hint that this is one of the many reasons why he loves Lord Ram and Laxman so much as if they were like his own sons.

This last statement of introduction by the sage immediately inspired great respect for the two brothers in members of the king's entourage.

The sage knew very well that the king had organized the bow-breaking ceremony to select a warrior for his daughter Sita. Only someone of exceptional strength and power would be able to lift the bow which was anyhow not an ordinary one but one that belonged to Lord Shiva. Lifting it, stringing it and then breaking it was no child's play. Janak was in search for a strong prince as groom for his daughter, for otherwise he would have made some other condition. So one purpose of sage Vishwamitra telling Janak about these marvelous feats of Lord Ram (protecting his fire sacrifice and killing the fierce demons) was to make him aware that his search for a brave warrior has ended, though the sage knew that Janak is very steadfast in his vows and would not so easily go back on his own declaration.

But at the same time it must not be forgotten that sage Vishwamitra was said to 'Trikaalagya'—one who knew about the past, the present and the future. So in effect he was hinting to king Janak that he need not worry if no other prince is able to break the bow and marry Sita according to his vows. His wishes would be fulfilled as Lord Ram is there to step in at the correct time. Unfortunately, king Janak could not decipher this message of the sage as is proved by subsequent developments during the actual bow-breaking ceremony. When no one was able to lift the bow, the king was confounded and heart-broken. He angrily chided all of them and went to the extent of calling them impotent. He had forgotten about this subtle hint of Vishwamitra at that time—that the greatest warrior of the land, Lord Ram, is sitting in their midst and the Lord has not been given a chance yet before Janak started fretting so much about no one being able to move the bow even by a fraction of a millimeter. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 251—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 252.

This goes to confirm the view that Lord Ram smiled at Janak when sage Vishwamitra agreed with him that Lord Ram is indeed the Supreme Being himself in a human form. The Lord's smile was mischievous—he smiled because he knew that soon all this wisdom and realisation would vanish in thin air, and under the influence of his stupendous Maya, the same king who knows that he is the Supreme Being, and who will be told in express terms about his worldly valour of having killed formidable demons, would wail and lament that the earth is devoid of warriors who would lift Shiva's bow! Refer: Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 216 above.

This is also the primary reason why Laxman became very angry and strongly admonished king Janak in open court when the latter lamented and said that he is dismayed to find that the earth is void of warriors. Laxman was astonished that Janak—who only the previous day when he had come to meet and welcome them at their camp on the outskirts of the city, seemed to be so wise and enlightened that he said that he knows who Lord Ram actually was, and sage Vishwamitra had also endorsed his views, and added to this was the sage's telling him about the fantastic deed of killing the demon army by the two brothers, Lord Ram and Laxman—should now make such an insinuating remark that the earth is devoid of true warrior. Refer:

Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 252—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 254.]

The king (Janak) thanked his good luck and told sage Vishwamitra—‘Oh sage! When I have seen your holy feet I feel so honoured and privileged that I am unable to say what good deeds I had done in my previous life that has rewarded me with this good fortune.’<sup>1</sup> (1)

‘The sight of these two lovely (pretty) brothers, who are of a dark and fair complexion respectively, immensely add to the intensity of delight and happiness that one has. [This verse can be read as follows as well—“These two beautiful brothers of a dark and fair complexion respectively add glory, depth and immensity to the emotions of delight and happiness that exist anywhere in this world.”]<sup>2</sup> (2)

The mutual love and affection that these two brothers have for each other is indeed exemplary. Their brotherly attitude is extremely pleasant to experience and so remarkable that I (Janak) cannot describe it in words.’ (3)

The king further said very cheerfully, ‘Listen Lord (sage Vishwamitra). Their mutual affection for each other is like what the Jiva has for Brahm.’<sup>2</sup> (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When one does some meritorious deed, reward becomes due to him. Janak thanks his past good deeds that have entitled him to have the rare spiritual reward of having the privilege of meeting not only sage Vishwamitra but also Lord Ram and Laxman whom the king himself recognized as personified forms of the Supreme Being. What more can any living being expect for his meritorious deeds?

Without some auspicious deed no spiritual reward accumulates, and without it it's not possible to meet a saint and holy man. Company of saints, sages and pious men is a harbinger of all good fortunes. It's a sort of a chain reaction—one does good deeds and becomes entitled for rewards, then he meets saints, and their auspicious company acts as a catalyst for more good deeds. This results in exponentially increasing the spiritual rewards that become due to the person.

King Janak also considers himself lucky because he had met a great sage and saint of the stature of Vishwamitra which is not possible without the blessing and the wish of the Lord God. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 7.

It is only when one meets that he is blessed with Bhakti (devotion for Lord God). This is exactly what has happened here. The king has first met sage Vishwamitra and got his profuse blessings, and then only was he able to meet Lord Ram and Laxman. Refer to the sequence of events as narrated above in Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 215.

Communion with saints and sages leads to wisdom, and both of these are not possible without the grace of Lord Ram. Company of saints and sages is the root of all auspiciousness and good fortunes, and it opens the gates for acquisition of many mystical and spiritual achievements. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 3.

Without accumulation of auspicious effects of ritheous and meritorious deeds, it is not possible to meet saints, and without them no delusions regarding this existential world can be eliminated. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 45.

So it is clear now that king Janak thanks his immense good luck that first he was able to meet the great sage Vishwamitra, and as a result of this auspicious meeting he was able not only to meet Lord Ram and Laxman but was fortunate enough to recognize them as personified form of Brahm, the Supreme Being. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 216.

So, in effect, Janak told sage Vishwamitra—"Oh sage, I have had the privilege of seeing your holy feet as a reward of some great good deeds that I have done in the past of which I myself am unaware of. Then, as a result of seeing your holy feet I was further blessed to be able to see the two pretty boys, Lord Ram and Laxman, who my heart says are no one other than Brahm personified. How lucky I am!"

<sup>2</sup>In this line, the virtues of delight and happiness have been personified. Hence it means that if 'delight' and 'happiness' were persons, then they themselves would be delighted and happy to see and meet Lord Ram who has a dark complexion, and Laxman who has a fair complexion.

The king has already acknowledged that his Mana (mind and heart) are captivated and enchanted at the sight of the two brothers. So here he reiterates this once again. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 215 and its preceding Chaupai line no. 8, as well as Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 216.

<sup>2</sup>This is a very remarkable observation of the enlightened king Janak. When Janak realised that Lord Ram was Brahm personified, and when he watched the love between him and Laxman, he became contemplative and pensive. For all this time, Janak had been watching Ram and Laxman very closely. He had observed that the two brothers stayed very close to each other, every now and then glanced at each other and smiled. Laxman's demeanours showed that he was eager to do anything if Lord Ram as much as hinted him with a slight gesture of the eye or hand, even without actually telling him to do it. The affable nature and brotherly attitude of the two brothers was infectious.

While Lord Ram represented Brahm, the Supreme Being and the Parmatma, the supreme Atma, Laxman represented the Jiva, the creature, the living being. The Jiva cannot live without the Parmatma because the Jiva's Atma, his soul and very existence, is directly related to the Parmatma, the supreme Atma as it is the latter that lives in a fractional form as the individual Atma of the Jiva.

The Parmatma loves the Jiva just like the father loves his offspring. The Jiva loves the Parmatma as his only means of life and sustenance, as the only one who selflessly cares for him and looks for his welfare in a world surrounded by selfishness and vested interests. It is like the case of the sun and the moon. The moon, the Jiva, derives its glory and shine because of the sun, and the sun gets its importance as a brilliant source of light when it is compared to the moon which also shines but lacks the brilliance of the sun and its energy.

The question ‘who is a Jiva’ and ‘what is the relationship between the Jiva and Brahm’ is a subject discussed at length in the Upanishads.

“Who is a Jiva” (a living being) has been explained in the following Upanishads—(i) Atharva Veda = Pashupat Brahm Upanishad, Canto 1, verse no. 12; Naradparivrajak Upanishad, Canto 6, verse no. 3; Tripadvibhut Maha-Narayan Upanishad, Canto 4, paragraph no. 9, 11-13. (ii) Krishna Yajur Veda = Saraswati Upanishad, verse nos. 47-48; Rudra Hridaya Upanishad, verse nos. 41-45; Shaarirako-panishad, verse no. 15; Skand Upanishad, verse nos. 6-7. (iii) Shukla Yajur Veda’s Paingal Upanishad, Canto 1, verse no. 12, and the whole of Canto 2.

The “relation between a Jiva and Brahm/Ishwar/Parmatma” has been explained in the following Upanishads—(i) Atharva Veda = Narad Parivrajak Upanishad, Canto 6, verse no. 4 (difference between Jiva and Parmatma); Canto 9, verse no. 10 (difference between Jiva and Prakriti); Tripadvibhut Maha-Narayan Upanishad, Canto 4, paragraph no. 9, 11-13; Annapurna Upanishad, Canto 5, verse no. 77; Par Brahm Upanishad, verse nos. 2, 5 (Jiva and Brahm are one). (ii) Krishna Yajur Veda = Rudra Hridaya Upanishad, verse nos. 41-45; Skanda Upanishad, verse no. 5; Varaaha Upanishad, Canto 2, verse nos. 52-53, 70, 73. (iii) Shukla Yajur Veda = Paingal Upanishad, Canto 1, verse no. 12, and the whole of Canto 2 (subject of Jiva vis-à-vis Brahm).

Srimad Bhagvat Mahapurāṇ, 4/9/6 describes this concept of a “Jiva being a reflection of the Supreme Brahm” as follows—‘My salutations to the Supreme Being who is almighty and all-powerful. The Lord has entered my heart, enlivens my vital Pran (breath), my limbs and my sense organs, and also empowers my faculty of speech—all of which would otherwise have remained dormant and ineffective.’]

The king was completely held enthralled by the sight of Lord Ram and Laxman. He could not move his eyes away from Lord Ram, and glanced at him repeatedly. All the while his body was thrilled, and his heart overflowed with emotions and was ecstatic<sup>1</sup>.
 (5)

The king praised the sage and knelt down to touch his feet with his head. Then he escorted the sage (and of course Lord Ram and Laxman with him) to the city. (6)

There, in the city, the king lodged him at a place that was comfortable at all times<sup>2</sup>. (7)

After paying his obeisance to the sage and arranging for his service in all possible ways, the king took his leave (permission) and went back to his palace. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The condition of Janak was like a Jiva, a living being, who has found the objective of all his spiritual pursuit. Janak has already accepted that it is not easy to captivate his mind as he is a dispassionate person who has no attractions for the charms of the material, physical world. But in the case of Lord Ram he does not understand why he is unable to control himself, he wonders, and says this to sage Vishwamitra clearly. Refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that precede Doha no. 216.

In reply the sage told him that his suspicion that Lord Ram is Brahm personified is indeed true. Refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 216.

So it was confirmed now that Janak's mind and heart was captivated not by the physical beauty of Lord Ram and Laxman but because they were personified forms of Brahm. If this is the case it is natural for Janak to keep glancing at Lord Ram repeatedly because he is getting the reward of his lifetime of spiritual practices and metaphysical discussions.

The more he sees Lord Ram, the more intense his devotion and love for the Supreme Being sitting right in his front becomes. The fire of devotion and love for the Lord is kindled with renewed intensity each time the king glances at Lord Ram and tries to force his eyes and mind away from him.

But this could not continue indefinitely—because a big ceremony was to be held the next day, invited kings and princes were coming in in a steady stream, and a lot of administrative nitty-gritty had to be taken care of. So, the king finally brought himself together and extricated his mind from the spiritual reverie it was submerged in till now.

The king therefore sighed and got up to take his leave from the sage. Now, let us read what happened next.

<sup>2</sup>We have already observed earlier that sage Vishwamitra was not alone. For one, he was accompanied by Lord Ram and Laxman, and secondly, a lot many other sages and holy men may have also come along with them while they were on their way to Janakpur from the hermitage of sage Vishwamitra. Some of these sages may have joined them at river Ganges where the three had stopped to take a bath, and many others joined them on the road leading up to Janakpur. It is a normal feature with travelers that when different groups meet on the highway to the same destination, they join hands to travel together; it helps them all in many ways.

So therefore, it is obvious that the king took the entire group along to give them a suitable and comfortable lodging place in the city, in all probability close to the venue of the bow-breaking ceremony.

At the time of taking his leave, the king once again worshipped the sage, offered his respects to him, and appointed attendants to look after the needs of the sage, the two brothers, as well as other member-sages of the group.]

Lord Ram, who was like a gem in the dynasty of king Raghu, ate his meals together with the accompanying sages (and of course with Laxman), and then took some rest.

After that, the Lord (Ram) sat down with his brother (Laxman) during the late afternoon hours when a quarter of the day was still left. (Doha no. 217)

[Note—This means clearly that the king had gone to meet sage Vishwamitra in the early hours of the day, brought him in the city before noon so that the sage and other members of his group could take their lunch and rest, and then Lord Ram and Laxman sat down together around 4 O'clock in the late afternoon hours.

This also means that the two brothers wanted to have some private time together to talk with each other, away from the sages. By all indications which will be clear from the very next line that follows below, Laxman had quietly told Lord Ram that he wanted to have some thing to request him, so will he please come aside. Laxman wanted to see the sights of the city, which we will read now.

Obviously therefore, the two brothers had gone sight-seeing in the city during the early evening hours when the sun was in the west and the atmosphere was cool and pleasant.]

चौ०. लखन हृदयँ लालसा बिसेषी । जाइ जनकपुर आइअ देखी ॥ १ ॥

prabhu bhaya bahuri munihi sakucāhīm. pragaṭa na kahahīm manahīm musukāhīm. 2.

Laxman had a great desire to go and see the city and its sights. (1)

But he was afraid of Lord Ram and hesitated to speak before the sage for the fear of annoying them. [That is why he quietly took the Lord away from the place where they were resting with the other sages.]

Laxman could not gather enough courage to express his desire to Lord Ram openly, so smiled shyly (to indicate that he wants something but is hesitant to speak) (2)

[Note—We have already read the description of the wonderful city earlier from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 212—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 214, and have also analysed how Lord Ram and Laxman had seen the beauty of the suburban areas but have only heard about the fabulous city's inner majesty. So it was natural that Laxman wanted to see it.

But he was too shy to tell his elder brother Ram because he was afraid that the latter would get annoyed at his childishness. They had just arrived in the city, and were in the group of great sages. It would not be dignified for them to wander alone, unguided and unescorted, in the city like ordinary tourists.

Remember: King Janak had not assigned anyone to take them around the city, and being princes of a great kingdom it would be under their dignity to roam around like laymen. Laxman thought that this might annoy the sage also. The sage had never let them alone ever since they accompanied him from Ayodhya, and so he might not approve of the idea of the two brothers roaming alone in an alien city. What if something goes wrong and they are either lost or hurt?

This was the reason why Laxman was hesitant to speak of his desire before the sage. So he took his elder brother aside and hinted to him that he wants to see the city. They won't have another chance tomorrow because the bow-breaking ceremony is to be held on that day, and in all probability it will last the entire day. On the following day it will be time to leave. Even if they stayed for one more day at the request of Janak, it would be highly shameful and undignified for them to go around the city when some other warrior had won the bow-breaking competition and all attention in the city would be focused on him. They would be completely neglected. Therefore, the only time slot that was available for the sight-seeing was now, thought Laxman.

Another reason for Laxman's hesitation was that Lord Ram may admonish him for his childishness because the sages would gather in the evening hours to have religious discourses or discussions, and to go to enjoy the city sights while neglecting this attendance might anger sage Vishwamitra.

There are numerous instances where Laxman has maintained great respect for his elder brother by not speaking without his permission. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, line no. 1 of Doha no. 252; Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 276.]

राम अनुज मन की गति जानी । भगत बछलता हियँ हुलसानी ॥ ३ ॥ kahahīm. 5.

 jaurṁ rā'ura āyasu maim pāvaum. nagara dēkhā'i turata lai āvaum. 6.

Lord Ram understood what was in the mind of Laxman. Love for his devotee was inherent to the character of the Lord who could understand their inner feelings (because the Lord is the Parmatma, the cosmic Consciousness that lives in the heart of all living beings as their own Atma, and as such the subtle and sublime form of the Lord knew all that the Jiva thought and felt; nothing is hidden from him).

Therefore, the Lord immediately realised what Laxman was thinking (even without his expressing his desires in clear terms)<sup>1</sup>. (30)

Lord Ram approached sage Vishwamitra very politely, and smiled hesitantly. The wise sage realised that he wants to say something, so he gave his permission to the Lord to speak about what he wants. Then, upon receiving the Guru's permission<sup>2</sup>, the Lord said—(4)

‘Oh Lord! Laxman wishes to see the city. He does not express this clearly as he is hesitant because it might annoy you. [So, Laxman has approached me to seek your permission on his behalf so that he could go and visit the city to see its sights.] (5)

If I get your kind permission, then I will go with him, take him around the city quickly, and then come back to you soon.’<sup>3</sup> (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It's a wonderful verse of immense spiritual import. Laxman had merely smiled and the Lord knew what he wants. Earlier we have read that Lord Ram is the Supreme Being, the Parmatma, and Laxman represents the Jiva, the living being. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 217.

The Parmatma definitely knows what the Jiva wants because the former lives in the inner-self of the latter in the form of his Atma. We have a great message here—it is that the Lord knows about the inner feelings of his devotees, the Lord knows what goes inside their mind and what they think. Therefore, it is not possible to cheat on the Lord. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 314, and line no. 1 of Doha no. 256 where Bharat has told the Lord that he knows what is in the heart of all living beings. This is also asserted in Vinai Patrika of Tulsidas, verse no. 107, line no. 2 of stanza no. 5 which says “He (Lord Ram) is the Lord of all, lives in the inner-self of all living beings, and knows the inner-feeling of all”.

Besides this, another important point is that a true devotee need not tell the Lord that he needs this or that. Does he not realise that the Lord knows about his wants? Another important message is this—prayers come from within the heart, they do not require words to be understood by the Lord; prayer is not something to be chanting like a parrot from some printed texts of some book!

So, Lord Ram could immediately realise what was going on in the mind of Laxman without his saying anything.

<sup>2</sup>It is to be noted that sage Vishwamitra has been called a ‘Guru’, a teacher. It is apt to address him with this title because he had earlier taught the two brothers many things, including the art and science of warfare and weapons. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 209 and its preceding Chaupai line no. 7.

The Lord has approached the sage very politely because he has great respect for him and also because he had to take permission from him to go and see the city. If one asks for some favour politely, there are better chances of it being accepted.

The Lord smiled, indicating to the sage that he wants to say something. The Lord waited for the sage's permission before speaking. This gives us a message how to treat elders and seniors. One should be polite and smiling when one approaches them, and not speak out of turn.

<sup>3</sup>This entire episode of Laxman silently smiling, Lord Ram understanding what he wants, and then the Lord approaching sage Vishwamitra on Laxman's behalf to seek his permission to go and see the city has great implication and conveys a great message.

It implies that a true devotee totally depends upon his chosen deity for all his spiritual and worldly needs. He does not go from door to door to beg or plead with others to help him or fulfill his needs. He leaves all things upon his Lord. When the Lord finds that this devotee is completely dependent upon him, the Lord takes proper care of him, and acts as his representative, advocate and council. This frees the devotee of so much hassle and problems, as well as embarrassments.

We see that in Ram Charit Manas, as opposed to other versions of the story of Lord Ram that is universally known as the “Ramayana”, countless spiritual messages are subtly weaved into its fabric, only to be unraveled and understood in the correct light.

A very interesting development has occurred here. While Lord Ram could understand the meaning of the ‘smile’ of Laxman, sage Vishwamitra, though he was so wise and enlightened, on the other hand could not understand the meaning of the ‘smile’ of Lord Ram. The sage had to be told in specific terms by the Lord what he wants to say.

This incident points out the difference between the Parmatma and the Jiva. While the Parmatma knows what the living being wants, the living being is unable to know what the Parmatma wants. The meaning of the smile of Laxman was understood by Lord Ram, but the sage, being a Jiva no matter how exalted and enlightened he may have been, could not understand the meaning of the smile on Lord Ram’s face.

If we recall, Lord Ram had smiled earlier when king Janak was talking with sage Vishwamitra. Refer: Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 216. There that smile had a different meaning as discussed in the note appended to that verse.]

सुनि मुनीसु कह बचन सप्रीती । कस न राम तुह राखहु नीती ॥ ७ ॥
धरम सेतु पालक तुह ताता । प्रेम बिबस सेवक सुखदाता ॥ ८ ॥

sunī munīsu kaha bacana saprītī. kasa na rāma tumha rākhahu nītī. 7.
dharama sētu pālaka tumha tātā. prēma bibasa sēvaka sukhadātā. 8.

When the sage heard the Lord’s request, he replied most affectionately—‘Oh Ram, it is no wonder that you obey the laws of right behaviour, good manners and principles of exemplary etiquette (by politely asking my permission to go to the city with Laxman). (7)

You are the protector of the Bridge of Dharma. [To wit, you always uphold righteousness, proper conduct, propriety, morality and ethics in every sphere of life. Indeed, you always act in the proper way, never violating even for once the codes set for good manners and etiquette.]<sup>1</sup>

You become influenced by love and devotion, and you give joy and happiness to your devotees.<sup>2</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The sage is referring to Lord Ram politely seeking his permission to go with Laxman to see the city of Janakpur. Lord Ram has always ensured that all his actions and words are in accordance to the laws of Dharma. While giving a discourse to the citizens of Ayodhya after his coronation, he has told them that if they find him saying anything that is violative of the laws of Dharma then they should fearlessly point it out to him. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 43.

There are many other instances where it is stressed that Lord Ram was an expert in the laws of Dharma. Some of the references in Ram Charit Manas are the following: (i) Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 6; (ii) Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 254; (iii) Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 323.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Ram respects no other relations except love and devotion. It is the only way to influence the Lord. And the Lord is ever eager to honour the wishes of his devotees. Those who are completely devoted to the Lord and know no one else except the him, the Lord always protects them and honours their wish. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (i) Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 219; (ii) Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 4-6 that precede Doha no. 35 where Lord Ram tells this fact to Sabari, (iii) Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 43 where it is reiterated to sage Narad, and (iv) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-9 that precede Doha no. 86, as well as Doha no. 87 Ka, where Lord Ram tells the crow sage Kaagbhusund the same thing.]

The sage gave them his clear permission by saying—‘You two brothers are like an abode of bliss, comfort, happiness and joy. Go to the city and come back soon after seeing it.

Bless all the citizens of the city by giving them an opportunity to enjoy their faculty of sight by showing them your charming countenance and enchanting form.’ (Doha no. 218)

[Note—The sage understood that the two brothers want to go to the city to enable its citizens to derive immense pleasure by beholding their divine form. Going there for sight-seeing was merely an excuse for this. The wise sage thought to himself that he has no moral right to obstruct the Lord in this divine mission. Every single Jiva had an equal right to have a divine glimpse of the Supreme Being in a visible form living in their midst, and the sage should not come in the way.

Remember: Sage Vishwamitra was aware of who Lord Ram was; that he was Brahm personified. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 4 and 7 that precede Doha no. 209; and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 2-3, and 7 that precede Doha no. 216.

Lord Ram and Laxman are personified forms of bliss and happiness; by seeing them one gets the bliss of Brahm-realisation. Refer King Janak’s declaration in this respect in Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precede Doha no. 216.

The sight of the Lord purifies the eyes and makes the person who behold them feel very privileged as if he has got the reward of all his auspicious and meritorious deeds. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 9 that precedes Doha no. 10 in relation with sage Sutikshan; (ii) Chanda line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 26 in relation with Marich; and (iii) Sundar Kand, Doha no. 42 and its preceding Chaupai line nos. 4-8 in relations with Vibhishan, the brother of Ravana, the demon king.

This fact has been reiterated again in the very next line that we shall be reading now.]

चौ०. मुनि पद कमल बंदि दोउ भ्राता । चले लोक लोचन सुख दाता ॥ १ ॥

bālaka br̥nda dēkhi ati sōbhā. lagē saṅga lōcana manu lōbhā. 2.

Paying their obeisance to the lotus-like feet of the sage (i.e. after touching the holy feet of sage Vishwamitra to show their thanks to him for granting his permission), the two brothers who provide joy and bliss to the eyes of the world (i.e. all those who see them), went to visit the city for sightseeing<sup>1</sup>. (1)

In the city, big groups of children of all ages were attracted by their (Lord Ram and Laxman's) beauty and charm. So, these children rushed towards them (Lord Ram and Laxman) to join them, following them and talking animatedly with them. The mind and the heart (Mana) of these groups of children were captivated by the two brothers<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Ram and Laxman observed the principles of etiquette by touching the feet of their guardian and Guru, sage Vishwamitra, and thanking him for giving them permission to go and see the sights of the city. We will see that when they come back they again touch his feet to say that they have come back.

The sage had commented (in Doha no. 218) that they should go to please the eyes of the citizens of the city. So they moved out to fulfill his wishes or obey his orders.

<sup>2</sup>It is natural for young children to get attracted by anything charming and unusual. They would leave their studies, rush out of their homes, and even abandon their plays if they happen to glance at some unusual spectacle that is interesting. So, when groups of children in the city of Janakpur saw that two lovely dignified princes of approximate their own age and dressed in fine royal livery were walking down the streets majestically, they were awed. The charm of the two brothers was so magnetic that their naturally pulled the children towards them.

Remember: The city was thronged by other dignitaries; great princes had come to attend the bow ceremony, and in all probability the city was chock-a-block with them and their attendants and guards. The same children of the city watched them from a distance, gawking at them and marveling at the spectacular sight of so many different kinds of people from so many far-off places, representing so many societies and cultures of the sort they had never seen or heard of in their lifetimes. They were in awe of these visiting kings and princes, but did not dare go close to them as they were put off by their royal demeanours and over-jealous attendants who would behave as if their masters were the greatest majesties on earth, with each retinue trying to outdo the other.

Against this background, these city children saw two pretty princes walking normally like ordinary boys of their age, without any sort of ‘airs’ about them, but who stood out in the crowd by their excellent dignity and superb charm, like the ones the citizens had never heard of or seen ever before. These two princes were alone; they were pleasantly smiling at each other and at anyone with whom they made eye contact. There was no air of haughtiness or pride with them. They appeared very friendly and welcoming. So the children of the city rushed towards Lord Ram and Laxman when they saw them walking down the streets of Janakpur.

Instead of acting with indifference or pretentiously that they are someone special and therefore want to maintain a distance with the laity, not wanting to mix with ordinary people because they were ‘princes’ and shooing the city children away, the two brothers cheerfully welcomed these children, smiled at them, perhaps held the hands of some in a playful manner, asking them their names and where they lived, and in general making small talk with these children like they themselves were ordinary boys like them.

Thus, Lord Ram and Laxman immediately established a rapport with the children of the city. Other children who were initially reluctant to come near and watched them from a distance like other guests too overcame their hesitation when they saw that their friends were cheerfully talking with these two guest princes and all of them were enjoying each other’s company.

So as the Lord progressed on his sight-seeing tour of the city, by and by a huge crowd of excited children gathered around him and followed the two brothers everywhere. When Lord Ram and Laxman had moved out of their lodging place they were alone, with no escorts, but by the time they reached the city center it appeared that a huge army of local ‘escorts’ of giggling and electrified children had surrounded them. These boy ‘escorts’ took the two brothers around the city, pointing out the landmarks to them and showing them the venue of the bow-breaking ceremony. After the tour of the city was completed, Lord Ram saw that it was getting too late and that they must now return to their lodging place. So he politely took his leave from the children accompanying him and Laxman by sweetly thanking them, and then returned to where they were lodged with sage Vishwamitra. This is not a mere conjecture; it is exactly what is said in the text of the Ram Charit Manas itself. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 220; and (ii) from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 224—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 225.]

[Verse/Chaupai line nos. 3-8 describe the beauty of Lord Ram and Laxman's form when they went out for sight-seeing in the city of Janakpur. Refer also to Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 62, stanza nos. 1-2; verse no. 63, stanza nos. 2-3; verse no. 64, stanza no. 1.]

They (Ram and Laxman) wore a yellow silk cloth, known as the 'Pitambar', around their waists, with quiver also tied around it (and over the Pitambar). They each held a beautiful bow and a matching arrow in their hands. [To wit, in one hand, the left, they held a bow which was slung loosely around the shoulder, and in the other hand, the right, an arrow was held.] (3)

To match the beauty and countenance of their forms, which were of a dark and fair hue respectively, they had the paste of sandalwood smeared (rubbed) all over their bodies in a fine shade. This sandalwood was also applied on their forehead in the form of a thin coating of its paste. (4)

[Note—The children and other citizens of the city were spell-bound and amazed by the beautiful sight of Lord Ram and Laxman walking down the streets. Now, in these verses, from Chaupai line no. 3 to 8, we read what the brothers looked like. They presented a divine sight that was not only fabulous and beautiful but had a heavenly divine aura about it. This sight charmed the city's children who were drawn towards the two brothers like iron is towards a magnet, thronging and jostling around them in their enthusiasm to be as close to them as was possible. In fact, the whole city of Janakpur was so much bewitched and mesmerized by the pretty sight of the two brothers that people from all walks of life and vocations, the men and the women, the young and the elderly, the noble and the laity, came rushing out to have a glimpse of Lord Ram and Laxman walking side by side and almost drowned in the sea of excited children who crowded around and virtually swamped them from all the sides.

In this way, the procession, with Lord Ram and Laxman in the middle, moved slowly through the streets and avenues of the city, towards the venue of the bow-breaking ceremony. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 220—to Doha no. 224.}

In ancient times, and in traditional homes even today, noble men wear a silk cloth around their waist that covers the lower part of the body. It is the attire of Lord Vishnu, and all Vaishnavites follow this tradition.

The quiver was tied with a golden string around the waist.

This distinguishing attire of the Lord has been referred to repeatedly in Ram Charit Manas. For instance, refer to: (i) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 209; (ii) Baal Kand, line no. 1 of Doha no. 233; (iii) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 244; (iv) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 316; (v) Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3, 7 that precede Doha no. 327; (v) Uttar Kand, Chanda line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 12.]

Their eyes were bewitchingly beautiful like the red (pink) lotus flower. Their faces were like the full moon, and they removed all sorts of torments arising from the three types of existential fears<sup>3</sup>. (5)

[Note—*It is a usual practice with all of Tulsidas’ books, including Ram Charit Manas, that he concentrates his attention on his revered Lord Sri Ram, and though at many a times he refers to Laxman as well, as is clear from Chaupai line no. 4 immediately above where he clearly refers to the two brothers by citing their complexions which are dark and fair for Lord Ram and Laxman respectively, he switches to focusing his attention to Lord Ram in this as well as the following verses.

However, I have preferred to use the pleural number and pleural pronouns such as the word “their” to mean both Lord Ram and Laxman, instead of the singular number and singular pronoun “he” to mean only Lord Ram, to imply that Tulsidas’ real intention was to describe the fabulous divine beauty of both the brothers, and not only of Lord Ram. This is absolutely clear just after a few lines in Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 220 where Tulsidas says that the citizens of the city of Janakup found immense happiness and bliss by watching the ‘two brothers’—and not only Lord Ram.

By neglecting Laxman it would sound insulting for him, and we must remember this—that the Lord loves his devotees more than he loves himself. Brahma, the creator, had told this in clear terms to Indra, the king of Gods, in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-6 that precede Doha no. 218. He said—“Listen Indra. Lord Ram does not get angry if someone insults him or offends him, but the Lord never tolerates such treatment to his devotees. Should anyone offend any of his devotees, the offender is burnt by the wrath of Lord Ram. This is well known fact in this world; it is well established in the Itihaas and Purans; it is well known to sage Durbasa.”

The Lord has clearly stated this fact that the only relation he gives importance to and respects is that of ‘Bhakti’ or devotion, love and submission for him for which Laxman is an exemplary example. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 35 where Lord Ram tells Sabari exactly this thing.

Laxman’s unflinching and single-minded devotion for Lord Ram is clear in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, from Doha no. 71—to Doha no. 72.

Hence, I have used the pleural number “their” to include both Lord Ram and Laxman while describing their beauteous physical form.

<sup>1</sup>Their arms were long, robust, muscular and well-built like an elephant’s trunk. Refer: Ram Charit Manas—(i) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 147; (ii) Uttar Kand, Chand stanza no. 2, line no. 4 that precede Doha no. 12; and (iii) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 77.

The same thing is reiterated in Valmiki Ramayan, Baal Kand, Sarga 1, verse no. 9—but here it refers only to Lord Ram.

The strength of Lord Ram’s arms is as immeasurable as the vast ocean. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 260.

Refer also to Tulsidas' following books in this context—(i) Geetawali, Uttar Kand, verse nos. 13-14; (ii) Kavitawali, Uttar Kand, verse no. 115; and (iii) Vinai Patrika, verse no. 138.

An elephant's trunk is the most powerful part of its body. The elephant uses its trunk to uproot huge trees and fling its enemies by wrapping it around them and then throwing them away like a football. The spiritual significance of this allusion is that the devotee need not worry about his well-being as the Lord is always there to extend his helping hand to him. And the Lord's hand is not weak; it is the best 'arm' a person can hope to find in this world which would give him a rock-solid support at all times.

<sup>2</sup>The 'Naag-mani' is a secretion from the hood of a special category of serpents that forms a lumniscient sac. It is of a shape and size of a piece of pearl. Its rarity makes it priceless, more costly than actual pearl. The word 'Naag' means a snake; and 'Mani' means a gem.

<sup>3</sup>The three torments that create misery for all living beings are called 'Trai-taap'. They have been outlined in (i) Rig Veda's Mudgal Upanishad, Canto 4, verse no. 2; and (ii) Atharva Veda's Sharva Upanishad, verse no. 17.

The Mudgal Upanishad, Canto 4, verse no. 2 expressly enumerates them as follows—The 3 'Traitaps' mentioned above are the following— (i) Adhyatmik, (ii) Adhibhautik and (iii) Adhidaivik.

The word 'Trividhum' also refers to the distinction between the three independent entities— (a) The doer, the act and the action, (b) Gyan (knowledge; gnosis), the one who knows and the object of that knowledge, and (c) the sufferer or enjoyer, the suffering or enjoyment and the object which causes the suffering or is the source of that enjoyment. Though each entity in a particular group appears to be indistinguishable or inseparable from the other, in fact they are quite distinct from each other (2).

{(i) 'Adhyatmik' problems are those that the creature faces in his spiritual pursuits, (ii) 'Adhibhautik' problems are created by terrestrial creatures like enemies, wild animals, cruel kings, thieves, bodily afflictions such as old age and diseases etc., (iii) 'Adhidaivik' are the problems created by unfavourable Gods and malignant stars. (iv) The 'doer' is quite distinct from the 'work to be done' and the 'physical actions of doing that work' though all appear to be interlinked. The doer suffers misery if he gets involved in the actions, but he remains peaceful if he does the deed without any emotional attachment to it or its results. (v) Similarly, 'knowledge' links the 'seeker of knowledge' to the 'object of knowledge'. The seeker remains dissatisfied and agitated only till the time he does not realise his objective of acquiring full knowledge that he and Brahma are one. This knowledge removes all agitations and restlessness, and makes him peaceful and calm. (vi) In the same vein, a person suffers or enjoys only till he is attracted or affected by any circumstance or any object of the world which is the cause of his sufferings or enjoyments. As soon as he detaches himself from them, there is neither any misery nor any enjoyment for him.}

According to the Sharva Upanishad of Atharva Veda, verse no. 17, the three sufferings also refer to the pains of birth, death and old age.

Lord Ram is a personified form of the Supreme Being, and like the full moon that soothes the heat caused by the scorching sun, a creature finds bliss and comfort by meditating upon the Lord and remembering his smiling face that silently assures him that he need not worry as the Lord is there to protect him.

Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 63 where Kumbhkaran, the brother of Ravana, feels glad that he would be able to see Lord Ram with a dark complexion whose auspicious vision provides liberation from the three Taaps—which are the three forms of sufferings that a creature goes through in his life in this mortal world. ]

The ears were decorated by golden ear-rings designed like flowers. They were so charming that they immediately stole (captured, snatched away) the attention of the beholder. [In other words, when anyone watches the ear-rings on the Lord's face, his mind gets hooked to them and stops wandering.] (7)

Their glances were bewitching and captivated the mind and the heart of those on whom they fell<sup>1</sup>, and their eyebrows were beautifully arched (like the curves of a majestic bow). The lines of the 'Tilak Mark'<sup>2</sup> on their foreheads shined like the dazzle of lightening (whenever they moved their heads). (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The bewitching glances of the Lord: Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 243.

The head was adorned by a magnificent rectangular cap which was placed on the lock of curly black hairs.

The beauty and charm of the two brothers are not restricted to any particular part of their bodies, but apply to their entire form—from the head to the toe-nail. Each part has the charm and attractiveness befitting it. (Doha no. 219)

[Note—It ought to be noted that the fabulous divine charm of Lord Ram has been described at various places in Ram Charit Manas. A sampling is as follows: (i) Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that precede Doha no. 233; (ii) Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 244; (iii) Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 316; (iv) Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-10 and Chanda line no. 1 that precede Doha no. 327; (v) Uttar Kand, Chanda line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no. 12; and (vi) Uttar Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 76—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 77.

This is in addition to the present narration in Baal Kand, Doha no. 219 and its preceding Chaupai line nos. 3-8.

By saying that ‘each part of the body has a charm befitting it’ it is meant that all of them possess respective virtues most suitable to them. For instance, the beauty of the head is highlighted by the curly black lock of hairs and the decorated cap on it; the ears find their beauty with the golden ear-ring moulded to resemble a flower; the eyebrows are majestically curved like the arch of the bow; the arms find their glory if they are muscular and well-built; the chest is adorned with wonderful garlands; and so on and so forth.

Tulsidas’ book “Geetawali Ramayan” has countless verses describing the fabulous beauty and charm of Lord Ram. Some of the instances are the following:

Geetawali Ramayan—(i) Baal Kand, verse nos. 52-54, 56, 62-63, 73-77, 82, 108; and (ii) Uttar Kand, verse nos. 2-17.

Besides these, sage Valmiki’s famous epic Ramayana also describes the Lord’s beauteous form in its Baal Kand, Sarga/Canto 1, verse nos. 8-12.]

चौ०. देखन नगरु भूपसुत आए । समाचार पुरबासिन्ह पाए ॥ १ ॥

धाए धाम काम सब त्यागी । मनहुँ रंक निधि लूटन लागी ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

dēkhana nagaru bhūpasuta ā'ē. samācāra purabāsinha pā'ē. 1.

dhā'ē dhāma kāma saba tyāgī. manahum̐ raṅka nidhi lūṭana lāgī. 2.

#When the residents of the city heard that the two princes (‘bhūpasuta’ = sons of a king) have come to see the city [1], they rushed out of their homes, leaving aside whatever they were doing at that moment<sup>1</sup> as if a pauper has been given a free-hand to loot a vast treasury<sup>2</sup>. [2] (1-2)

[Note—#The euphoria and the sense of extreme wonderment that swept through the city of Janakpur was of such an extent that as soon as the word went out that Lord Ram and Laxman are visiting the city, every single individual rushed out to have their glimpse. The excitement was very marked as the citizens had known by then that some very special guests have come whom their king Janak had personally gone to welcome and escort back to the city, and then he had lodged them in his palace that is reserved for state guests. Then the marvelous and fantastic deeds of the two brothers, such as their eliminating ferocious demoness Tadka and the entire demon army led by their chief commanders Marich and Subahu, and the liberation of Ahilya, had already reached the ears of the citizens. To this news, which in itself was no less wondrous, was added the information about the stupendous beauty and charm of the two princes. So everyone was highly eager and excited to see who these two princes were.

The awe and charm of Lord Ram and Laxman, and the spell they cast on all and sundry, have been beautifully described in Geetawali, Baal Kand, verse nos. 1/62—1/63.

<sup>1</sup>When the city's children poured out of their homes and ran towards Lord Ram and Laxman, some of them ran back home excitedly to their parents to inform them that two wonderful princes have come to visit the city, and they tugged and pulled at their parents to come out and see the spectacle themselves and be convinced of what they had said.

Earlier, when king Janak had gone to welcome sage Vishwamitra on the outskirts of the city, he was accompanied by many noble people of the city besides attendants, guards and others. He brought the sage and the rest of the group, including the two brothers, and lodged them at some palace inside the city. Since they were royal guests, the king must have appointed guards at the door for their security and as a mark of honour.

Meanwhile, all those who had accompanied Janak came back and spread the word inside the city that two princes of excellent charm have come to attend the bow ceremony. Though the citizens would have liked to see these two princes, but the presence of the royal guards at the door of the lodging place must have kept the crowd at bay. So, when the citizens learnt that the two brothers have ventured out for sight-seeing, it is natural that they rushed to have a glimpse.

Obviously there was a big crowd eager to have the Lord's 'Darshan'—a divine glimpse. So those who heard first rushed out to avoid the jostling of the surging crowd. Another reason for their rushing out of their houses and leaving aside the work they were currently engaged in was that Lord Ram and Laxman were walking briskly ahead because they had to see the city and return to the sage before sun-set; they could not afford a leisurely stroll. So the people thought that if they wasted time, they would miss the opportunity.

This is a normal course the way things happen even today. If some important dignitary is visiting any town or city, the citizens keep on hold their personal work and line up on the roadside to see him.

It is said later that if one likes his homestead at the cost of having love and devotion for Lord Ram, Laxman and Sita then surely the creator has turned away from such a man and has corrupted his intellect—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 280.

We also find that when Lord Ram is moving towards the forest from Ayodhya, all the people who lived in the villages and hamlets on the way rushed out to have the Lord's divine glimpse. All of them wanted to be near the Lord, talk with him and serve him in the best possible they can. There were instances when someone could not reach in time, then he would ask others in which direction the Lord and his brother Laxman and the Lord's consort Sita had gone, and then they would try to rush there to see the three of them. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 110; (ii) from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 111—to Doha no. 122.

The love and affection as well as the eagerness with which the citizens of Janakpur rushed out to see and meet Lord Ram and Laxman is similar to the scene witnessed while the Lord passed through the villages on his way to the forest as cited in the above references.

It is to be noted that in both the instances, that of the citizens of Janakpur and the villagers living alongside the path of Lord Ram to the forest, the people have rushed out to see the Lord leaving aside the work they were engaged at that moment.

Compare: Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 220 with respect to the citizens of Janakpur, and Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 221 with respect to the people who lived along the Lord's forest route. The similarity is absolutely striking.

The message that we get from this discussion is that having devotion and love for the Supreme Being should take precedence over all affairs of this mundane world. Refer: Ram Charit Manas—(i) Kishkindha Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 23; (ii) Sundar Kand, Doha no. 46; (iii) Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 73; and (iv) Uttar Kand, Doha no. 104 Ka.

<sup>2</sup>Now, the condition of the citizens is compared to lifelong paupers who suddenly find the doors of a great treasury open for a limited time when they are allowed to loot as much as they can. There would be a huge crowd, pushing, shoving, jostling, elbowing and even tramping over each other in order to get in, fill their bags and pockets as fast as they can, and rush out to call in their friends who may have missed out.

So, the citizens pushed and shoved each other to come up front to view Lord Ram and Laxman at close quarters, to be as close to the two charming brothers as was practically possible, and to strike a pleasant conversation with them—such as saying a mere 'hello' or asking them from where they have come, their names, and so on. There was a great deal of bonhomie and friendly bonding between the two brothers and the people of Janakpur, and this affection took such a deep root amongst the masses that everyone rooted for Lord Ram as the only one who was suited to become a groom for their princess Sita. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 222—to Doha no. 223.}]

निरखि सहज सुंदर दोउ भाई । होहिं सुखी लोचन फल पाई ॥ ३ ॥
जुबतीं भवन झरोखन्हि लागीं । निरखहिं राम रूप अनुरागीं ॥ ४ ॥ nirakhi sahaja sundara dō'u bhā'ī. hōhiṁ sukhī lōcana phala pā'ī. 3.

jubatīṁ bhavana jharōkhanhi lāgīṁ. nirakhahiṁ rāma rūpa anurāgīṁ. 4.

The citizens of Janakpur derive immense happiness, pleasure and joy by considering themselves exceptionally fortunate that they have been able to see the naturally pretty form of the two brothers which was like getting the reward of their eyes.<sup>1</sup> (3)

The women-folk of the city flocked the balconies and windows of their homes, and watched fascinated and awe-struck at the enchanting beauty of Lord Ram's glorious form<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The eyes are the organs by which one sees this world. A person sees so many things, both pleasant as well as unpleasant. His eyes feel happy and enjoy looking at pleasant things, and would avoid looing at unpleasant sights, wincing at them. So, when the citizens watched the divine form of Lord Ram and Laxman, they felt that their eyes have been fully rewarded today because they have never seen such a wonderful form earlier and would never see any such form in the future.

In other words, the divine sight of the two brothers captivated the mind and the heart of the citizens of Janakpur. They were enamoured of Lord Ram and Laxman's beautiful form, and were completely enchanted and enthralled by the sight. The two brothers are in their normal day-to-day attire. They do not wear anything flashy or pretentious. The importance of this line is to highlight the natural beauty and charm of Lord Ram and Laxman. This charm is free from any artificiality.

Lord Ram is a personified form of Brahm, the Supreme Being, and Laxman represents Prakriti, Nature. The significance of this verse is that the Lord's visible creation that is known as 'Nature' is naturally and inherently most beautiful and fabulously wonderful. The towering mountains, rolling hills, verdant forests and green valleys, cascading waterfalls, absolutely fascinating variety of colourful flowers, fruits and trees, the astounding number of various forms of flora and fauna that decorate the earth, and the wonders we see in the visible sky and beyond it in its invisible parts—are all the creations of Brahm, and all of them are beautiful beyond description.

This is Lord's 'natural' form, a form that is 'naturally beautiful'. It also means that Brahm is beautiful because whatever exists in the form of Nature, or 'Prakriti', is a manifested form of Brahm himself.

The women-folk of the city were exceedingly enamoured by the Lord's pretty form and, as we shall see right below in the next verses (from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 220—to Doha no. 223) chatted animatedly amongst themselves about him. They were excited and electrified by the bewitching charm of Lord Ram.

One important point to note is this: While the city's children and men-folk were overjoyed by looking at both Lord Ram and Laxman (refer: Chaupai no. 3 immediately above, as well as Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 241 later on below), the women-folk were more focused on Lord Ram alone (refer also to Doha no. 241 below).

There is subtle reason behind it. A woman represents the Lord's Maya—his mystical powers that entangle a creature in worldly affairs and incites passion and desires in him. Maya is compared to a 'female dancer', and not a male dancer. She dances to the tune of her master and lord, Sri Ram. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 116.

A woman is compared to Maya, the delusion creating powers of Brahm that keeps a person entangled in this web-like world, and is the most ferocious and powerful tormentor. Refer: Ram Charit Manas—(i) Aranya Kand, from Doha no. 43—to Doha no. 44 where Lord Ram tells Narad why he did not allow him to get married; and (ii) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 99 where sage Kaagbhusund is describing the deluding affects of Kali-Yug.

Now the obvious question is "why were they not attracted to Laxman"? Well, the answer lies in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 116 Ka and its preceding Chaupai line nos. 3-8. In brief they say that both 'Bhakti' and 'Maya' come under the category of being a female. Their lord is Brahm, who in this case has manifested himself as Lord Ram. Now, Bhakti is very dear to Lord Ram, and Maya is like a maid. The Maya, being a 'maid', is always afraid to annoy 'Bhakti', the Lord's favourite. Laxman represents 'Bhakti', and therefore the women-folk, who represent 'Maya' are afraid to raise their eyes towards him for the fear of annoying Lord Ram. So they let Laxman be alone.

One female is not attracted to another female as much as she is to a male. This is the universal law of Nature. Since Laxman represents Bhakti, a symbolic female, while the women-folk represent Maya, another symbolic female, the latter weren't attracted to Laxman. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 116.

These observations must not be misconstrued on any count, for we shall be soon reading that these women-folk also refer to the two brothers though the main focus of their attention is Lord Ram. In this context, please see note appended to Doha no. 220 herein below.]

कहहिं परसपर बचन सप्रीती । सखि इन्ह कोटि काम छबि जीती ॥ ५ ॥
सुर नर असुर नाग मुनि माहीं । सोभा असि कहूँ सुनिअति नाहीं ॥ ६ ॥ kahahim parasapara bacana saprītī. sakhi inha kōṭi kāma chabi jītī. 5.

sura nara asura nāga muni māhīm. sōbhā asi kahum'suni'ati nāhīm. 6.

[The following narration tells us about the excitement amongst the women-folk of the city of Janakpur as they saw Lord Ram and Laxman walking down the streets. While the children and the males had poured on the streets to have a close interaction with the two brothers, the women remained in their homes and looked from balconies, windows, terraces etc. Being enthralled at the fabulous sight of the two pretty princes walking majestically, with a huge crowd of children and adults following them and talking with them, smiling and gesturing affectionately, the women too got electrified and wondered if king Janak would still stick to his vows of marrying Sita to someone who broke the bow or would cancel the event and marry her directly to the elder of the two princes. These ladies had never seen such a wonderful sight in their lives or even imagined that they would be lucky to ever see it any time in their lives. The divine sight of Lord Ram and Laxman completely left them spell-bound and dumb-founded.]

These women-folk talk with each other affectionately and animatedly—‘Oh friend! They (Ram and Laxman) appear to have overtaken (surpassed) the beauty of many thousand Kamdeos (cupids) taken together. It appears that they have defeated all of them and taken over their charm and beauty for themselves.’<sup>1</sup> (5)

We have not heard<sup>2</sup> of such divine beauty and charm anywhere in this creation—not even amongst the gods, the human beings, the demons, the serpents (subterranean creatures) and the sages and seers. [Here, all senior classes of living beings whose members have a form that may have attractive physical features have been cited.]<sup>2</sup> (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The women open up their hearts and have no inhibitions in expressing their feelings. All of them had developed instant ‘affection’ for Lord Ram, implying that their Atma (i.e. their soul) immediately got attracted to the Parmatma (the Supreme Atma) who was before them. This is also what happened with king Janak when he first saw Lord Ram and Laxman at the time of his going to welcome sage Vishwamitra. The king too was bowled over by the divine charm of the two brothers, and he too could not resist himself to ask the sage if they were personified forms of Brahm. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 216.

If this can happen to the enlightened king Janak, what is the wonder if the ordinary women are also overwhelmed by the pretty sight and the divine halo effusing out of the Lord like rays from the sun or the soothing light of the moon?

There is a wild chatter; everyone seems to have an opinion and everyone seems to share her views with great excitement.

‘Kamdeo’ is the most handsome of all the gods. So he has been cited to indicate that Lord Ram’s beauty is thousands of times more than this god. In other words, Lord Ram is extremely beautiful, and the Lord’s beauty and charm are so bewitching and fabulous that they surpass anything imaginable and known in the entire creation consisting of the heaven, the earth and the subterranean world. Refer: Ram Charit Manas—(i) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 119; (ii) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 327; (iii) Baal Kand, Doha no. 220; (iv) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 76; (v) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 91.

A same idea is expressed in—(i) Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 68, line no. 2 of stanza no. 10; and (ii) Janki Mangal, verse no. 50, line no. 2.

This is the first lady who is speaking. As we progress through the discussion between these enchanted ladies of Janakpur, we will discover that there are eight who have expressed their opinions. These eight represent all the women-folk of Janakpur; they are like their spokespersons. These eight women symbolize the eight forms that the subtle aspect of Nature has taken to praise their Lord, the cosmic Supreme Being known as the Viraat Purush. This would be the metaphysical interpretation of the chief eight spokeswomen who speak on the behalf of the entire creation.

Remember: In metaphysics, Nature, or ‘Prakriti’, has been visualized as a female, and the Viraat Purush is their male counterpart. Together, by their union, they caused the coming into being of this creation.

The eight subtle aspects of Nature are the following—earth, water, fire, air, sky, Mana (mind), Buddhi (intellect), and Ahankar (ego). These are called the ‘eight Tattwas’ or the eight fundamental elements of creation.

They are represented by their eight manifested forms called ‘Sakhi’ or a female friend. Their names appear in a book titled “Janki Rahasya”, in its Canto 8. The name of these eight female ‘friends’ are the following—Laxmana, Shubhrashila, Bhadra, Maanwati, Leela, Shyaama, Shaanta, and Sushila. Laxmana was also known as Chaarushila.

The first amongst them to speak is Laxmana. She represents the first of the eight Tattwas starting from the subtlest one, i.e. the ‘Ahankar element’.

Out of them, only the following three were believed to be married, and the rest were still unmarried. The three married Sakhis and their husbands are the following—(i) Chaarushila or Laxmana was married to Virsen; (ii) Shubhrashila to Subhadra; and (iii) Shaanta to Virmani.

<sup>2</sup>It is to be noted here that the women use the word ‘heard’ when expressing about their knowledge of persons of exceptional physical charm, instead of using the word ‘seen’. This is significant because these women maintained the dignity of their families and respect for tradition of the time when women of cultured families abstained from venturing out into the public, and never roamed around gaping at other men. They had only ‘heard’ about the charming appearances of gods, kings, princes, demons, sages and seers, as well as the legendary serpents who are said to have ruled the subterranean world from tales and stories told down the generations.

Compare this to other women of loose moral character, such as the female demon named Supernakha, the sister of Ravana who was also enamoured of the beauty of Lord Ram when she saw the Lord in the forest so much so that she had the temerity to propose to marry him. At that time she had told Lord Ram that she had been wondering all over the world but has never found someone suitable for her so that she can marry him. Now, the word ‘found’ implies that she had been ‘closely looking’ at each eligible person whom she would propose, but even after searching and roaming the whole world she did not ‘see’ anyone that suited her heart. But now she said that she is very fascinated by Lord Ram’s beauteous form, and has decided that he is most suitable to married by her. So she proposed to the Lord. Supernakha hasn’t ‘heard’, but actually roamed around the world searching for a suitable groom for herself. It simply means that she had been ‘gazing’ at men, looking them up closely, scrutinizing their physical features, and therefore had ‘seen’ all the handsome men in the world. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. that precedes Doha no. 327.

It was expected of Supernakha as she was a female demon who lacked all moral scruples, but it cannot be ever expected from women of a cultured society.

<sup>3</sup>By citing gods, humans, demons, serpents and sages, the women-folk mean the ‘entire creation’. The heaven is represented by the gods, the earth is represented by the humans, the demons and the sages, and the subterranean world by the serpents. Refer also—Ram Charit Manas—(i) Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 19; (ii) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 80.]

बिष्णु चारि भुज बिधि मुख चारी । बिकट बेष मुख पंच पुरारी ॥ ७ ॥
अपर देउ अस कोउ न आही । यह छबि सखी पटतरिअ जाही ॥ ८ ॥

biṣṇu cāri bhuja bidhi mukha cārī. bikaṭa bēṣa mukha pañca purārī. 7.
apara dē'u asa kō'u na āhī. yaha chabi sakhī paṭatari'a jāhī. 8.

Lord Vishnu has four hands, the creator Brahma has four heads, and Lord Shiva, the slayer of the demon Tripura, has five mouths (faces) and attire that is most odd and horrfying.<sup>1</sup> (7)

There are no Gods senior to these three, and there are none with whom this astounding beauty and charm (of Lord Ram) can be compared. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>These three Gods constitute the Trinity. They are the senior-most Gods. All of them have unconventional forms—e.g. Lord Vishnu, the sustainer, has four arms; the creator Brahma has four heads; and Lord Shiva is the oddest of the three. Shiva not only has five faces but remains almost naked, has elephant hide and serpents wrapped around his body, wears a garland of skulls, has ash smeared all over his body, and lives like a recluse hermit.

If this is the situation with the senior Gods, no one can expect their juniors to be better than them. So the women-folk reject them as criterion or standards with which the beauty of Lord Ram can be judged or compared.

The most handsome of the Gods, i.e. Kamdeo (cupid), automatically comes within the purview of this comparison as he is a junior God.

What to talk of Lord Ram, these Gods are no match for the charm that ordinary citizens of Janakpur have—Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 314.]

The two princes, one of a dark complexion and the other of a fair complexion<sup>1</sup>, are young and in their adolescence (i.e. in their teens), and are not only treasures of fabulous beauty and divine charm but also providers of immense bliss, joy and happiness.

Their beauty is so stupendous, so bewitching and profound that millions of Kamdeos (cupids) appear to have been sacrificed on each of their limbs<sup>2</sup>. (Doha no. 220)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Earlier in Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes this Doha no. 220 we have read that the women-folk were focused on Lord Ram alone. But now in this Doha and a little later on in Chaupai line nos. 3, 5-8 that precede Doha no. 221 below we read that the women refer to both the brothers, Lord Ram as well as Laxman in clear terms.

It means simply that while Lord Ram was their main focus of attention but they were also watching Laxman; they weren't neglecting him. Tulsidas is very clever indeed. At first he writes that their attention was focused on Lord Ram to indicate how these women representing the 'Maya' aspect of creation were shying away from their female counterpart 'Bhakti' represented by Laxman. But then if Laxman was totally neglected, thought Tulsidas, it would not be proper on three counts—one, it would be tantamount to sidelining Bhakti, two, his narration would be wrong in its authenticity and detail because when two gentlemen are walking together, and they happen to be equally charming and attractive, it will look very odd and untruthful to say that those who had assembled to look at them saw only one and turned a blind eye to the other, and three, it would be undermining the importance, the divinity and the charm of Laxman which would be intolerable for Lord Ram.

So, the narration oscillates between the women focusing their sight on Lord Ram at one instance, and seeing both the brothers at another instant.

kō'u saprēma bōlī mṛdu bānī. jō mair̥ sunā sō sunahu sayānī. 2.

This first lady<sup>1</sup> concluded her observations by saying to all her companions who were listening attentively—‘Say friend, who amongst those who have a body (referring not only to the humans but even to other living beings who belong to the zoological kingdom) will not be enchanted, enthralled, captivated and overwhelmed by watching this wonderfully beautiful form (of the two brothers)?’<sup>2</sup> (1)

Replying to her observation, someone else<sup>3</sup> said in a sweet voice—‘Oh wise one! Listen to what I have heard about them. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This lady is the first of the eight ‘Sakhis’. Refer note of verse no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 220 above.

<sup>2</sup>It ought to be noted here that though this lady refers to only members of the animate members of the living creation, such as for example the human beings, but elsewhere it is clearly said that the charm of the two brothers was so divine that the entire world consisting of the animate as well as the inanimate forms of living beings got enthralled by it. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 204.

Does it mean that the gods were not charmed by this magnificent sight of Lord Ram and Laxman? No, it is not so by any means; they too were equally enthralled by the beautiful view of the two brothers. There are countless instances of this. Refer an elaborate note appended to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 223 herein below.

<sup>3</sup>This is the second ‘Sakhi’ or female friend. Her name is Laxmana (pronounced as “Laxmanaa”). She represents the next Tattwa or element of creation, i.e. the ‘sky’ element. This is because she says that she will now ‘tell’ them whatever she has heard about the two princes. ‘Hearing’ is one of the functions of the sky element because sound waves travel in space.

Laxmana’s mother was Vidagdha, and father was Yashshaali. She used to sit with her friends and gossip. So it believed that she had heard of the two brothers from one betel-seller’s daughter who had married someone of Ayodhya.]

muni kausika makha kē rakhavārē. jinha rana ajira nisācara mārē. 4.

They have protected the fire sacrifice of sage Kaushik (Vishwamitra) where they have killed fierce demons.<sup>3</sup> (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>King Dasrath was famous, so this lady did not elaborate further regarding who the father of the two princes was, and it sufficed for her to say that the two brothers were ‘sons of king Dasrath of Ayodhya’.

Now, a question arises as to how did the citizens come to know that Lord Ram and Laxman were the ‘sons of king Dasrath of Ayodhya’? Well, when Janak enquired of sage Vishwamitra about the two brothers and who they were at the time of his welcoming the sage upon his arrival at Janakpur, the sage had clearly told them that the two brothers were sons of Dasrath and their names were Ram and Laxman. {Refer: (i) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 216 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 8; and (ii) Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 66, stanza no. 2; verse no. 67, stanza no. 1; and verse no. 68, stanza no. 1.

<sup>2</sup>A Swan is regarded as a majestic bird of dignity and beauty. Hence, the two brothers are compared to this bird.

<sup>3</sup>This clearly means that the news of the valiant deeds of Lord Ram and Laxman have already reached Janakpur.

When sage Vishwamitra had introduced Lord Ram and Laxman to Janak, all those accompanying the king had heard about them, and when they returned to the city this news spread like wildfire. Numerous great kings and princes had also come, but it was only sage Vishwamitra and the two brothers who were shown special attention by king Janak so much so that he personally went to receive them and then escorted them back to the city and then lodged them in his personal guest house reserved for state guests—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 217. So obviously the two brothers acquired a special status in the city, becoming endeared to each individual citizen, and their arrival was the talk of the town. Countless great princes and kings had come to Janakpur to attend the marriage ceremony of Sita, but once Lord Ram and Laxman arrived and went around the city, all the rest were virtually eclipsed from the reckoning of the citizens of Janakpur.]

kausalyā suta sō sukha khānī. nāmu rāmu dhanu sāyaka pānī. 6.

[These two verses describe Lord Ram.]

He who has a dark-complexioned body and eyes that resemble a beautiful lotus is the one who had trounced and crushed the pride and arrogance of the demons Marich and Subahu. (5)

He is the son of Kaushalya, and is like a mine of blissfulness, joy and happiness. His name is ‘Ram’ and he holds a bow and an arrow in his hands. (6)

[Note—We are now talking about the women-folk who are discussing the beautiful sight of Lord Ram and Laxman as they walk through the streets of Janakpur surrounded by an excited crowd of children and adults. So this particular lady points out the special distinguishing features of Lord Ram, such as his ‘dark complexioned body’, to clearly indicate about whom she is talking. Then she says that his mother is Kaushalya and that he had vanquished the pride and arrogance of Marich and Subahu.

She wanted to make sure that others who were hearing her attentively would be able to know which of the two brothers she was talking about so as not to leave any scope for confusion. Since Marich was not killed but flung away into the far-off ocean, his pride and arrogance have been said to be trounced and crushed by Lord Ram. Again, this ‘crushing of the pride and arrogance’ of Marich and Subahu implies killing of Subahu as well because these demons had started treating themselves as invincible and unable to be killed by anyone, let alone two lonely princes.]

lachimanu nāmū rāma laghu bhrātā. sunu sakhi tāsū sumitrā mātā. 8.

[Now this wise and enchanted lady points out Laxman to her companions and says—]

The fair complexioned pretty young boy who has beautiful attire and charming demeanours (walking) behind him (Lord Ram), who holds a bow and an arrow in his hands [7] is ‘Laxman’. He is the younger brother of Ram. Listen friend, his mother is Sumitra [8]. (7-8)

[Note—Laxman always walks behind Lord Ram as a mark of respect for the Lord, as well as to act as his guard. Later on, when they are on their way to the forest during the Lord’s exile, this same pattern of walking is observed. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 123.

Laxman has his bow and arrow at the ready, prepared to protect Lord Ram should the need arise.

Now, once again, a pertinent question comes to the mind: Sage Vishwamitra had not told anyone while introducing the two brothers about the names of their mothers. Then how did this lady come to know their names?

Well, the answer is that king Dasrath was very famous, and his kingdom bordered that of Janakpur. Hence almost everyone in Janakpur, especially those who were highly placed in the hierarchy of the society, was acquainted about Dasrath’s queens. When Lord Ram and his other brothers were born, the news of which queen gave birth to which son must have spread.

Another traditional story is that one betel-seller’s daughter named Vasisthaa was married to someone from Ayodhya, and it was she who had spread this news.]

दो०. बिप्रकाजु करि बंधु दोउ मग मुनिबधू उधारि ।

dōhā.

biprakāju kari bandhu dō'u maga munibadhū udhāri.
ā'ē dēkhana cāpamakha suni haraṣīm saba nāri. 221.

After having finished the work of the 'Vipra' (literally a Brahmin, but here referring to the protection of sage Vishwamitra's fire sacrifice), the two brothers have come to see the bow-breaking ceremony. On the way here they had provided liberation to the wife of a sage (this refers to the liberation of Ahilya).'

When the ladies, who were assembled there, heard this, all of them felt very glad. (Doha no. 221)

[Note—The ladies were glad on two counts. First was the information that these two boys would attend the bow-ceremony when these women would have another chance to watch Lord Ram and Laxman for a long time uninterrupted. This is proved when later on we shall read that the venue was bursting at its seams at the time the ceremony was held. All the citizens had rushed to occupy a vantage point, and the royal heralds and attendants had a tough time controlling the crowd and seating them all. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 240 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 5-8.

And second reason for the happiness of these ladies was that they are noble-hearted and gracious princes who have liberated a sinful lady known as Ahilya, the wife of sage Gautam. This second bit of information was very well received and filled these women-folk with great hope and expectation. They hoped that these two princes would help them to overcome any sins they might themselves have committed in life.

This news of Ahilya's liberation was of exceptional importance for the citizens of Janakpur—because the royal priest of king Janak, named Sataanand, was the son of sage Gautam and his wife Ahilya. So naturally and obviously the entire population of Janakpur felt highly obliged to Lord Ram when they learnt that he had liberated Ahilya from her curse.

Another reason for the women-folk feeling happy after learning about the noble and exalted background of Lord Ram was that they felt that he is a suitable groom for Sita, the daughter of king Janak for whose marriage the bow-breaking ceremony was being organized.

King Janak was searching for a brave and strong groom for his daughter Sita, so when the ladies learnt about the killing of the demons by Lord Ram to protect the fire sacrifice of sage Vishwamitra, they felt all the more happy that there are more than average chance now that the king would somehow circumvent his declaration of marrying Sita to the person who breaks the bow, and instead marry her to Lord Ram. See verse nos. 1-2 below.

Even if Janak did not break his vows, they guessed, then at least Lord Ram would be allowed to lift the bow like other competitors, and now it is sure that he will break it. Both ways, they felt, Sita would be married to this prince. And then they will have a lifelong opportunity to see their beloved Lord whenever he comes to pay a visit to his in-law's place.]

चौ०. देखि राम छबि कोउ एक कहई । जोगु जानकिहि यह बरु अहई ॥ १ ॥

जौं सखि इन्हि देख नरनाहू । पन परिहरि हठि करइ बिबाहू ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

dēkhi rāma chabi kō'u ēka kaha'ī. jōgu jānakihi yaha baru aha'ī. 1.
jaum sakhi inhahi dēkha naranāhū. pana parihari haṭhi kara'ī bibāhū. 2.

Watching the bewitching beauty of Lord Ram's form, someone amongst the ladies<sup>1</sup> asserted—'This prince is worthy of becoming a groom for princess Janki (Sita). (1)

Oh friend, if the king (Janak, the father of Sita) sees him (even once), it is sure that he will discard his vows and insist on their marriage.'<sup>2</sup> (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This is the third 'Sakhi' or female friend who speaks. According to tradition, her name was Hema. Her mother was Subhadra, and father was Arimardan. She represents the 'Tej' or the fire element. She endorses the statement of her friends who had made previous comments.

<sup>2</sup>These verses indicate that not everyone in the city is aware of the fact that Janak has already met the Lord while receiving sage Vishwamitra, and that the king has brought them to the city and has himself lodged them at some palace. Many great kings and princes have come, but no one was shown special privilege by king Janak.

Women are fond of discussing the worthiness or otherwise of a particular boy as a groom for a girl. So, after being over-awed by the wonderful sight of the two brothers and their physical charm, the ladies start debating the worthiness of the elder of the two brothers as a groom for princess Sita, and come to the conclusion that Lord Ram is the most suitable candidate to be selected as a groom for Sita.

There is another important implication here. Lord Ram's physical form and features are delicate and tender, and so is his age. He does not look overbearing like a body-builder or an athlete, and is still in his early teens. Other kings and princes who have collected at Janakpur to try their hands on the bow are apparently physically more strong, muscular and well-built, and higher in age as compared to Lord Ram. So this kind lady means that once king Janak sees Lord Ram, it is natural that he would mentally decide to marry off his daughter Sita to this noble prince without insisting on first testing Lord Ram's strength by letting him to try lift the bow and breaking it before marrying him to his daughter Sita, because the Lord is too tender for the bow and Janak would not take this risk. Instead, the king would find some excuse to cancel the ceremony, and marry Sita directly with Lord Ram.

In the previous Doha no. 221, the lady who was speaking then had referred to 'both the brothers'. So our present lady interjects to say in effect that the elder of the two brothers, i.e. Lord Ram, is the suitable groom for Sita. This is in accordance with established social norms that the elder brother gets married first. Her view is endorsed by another friend in Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 223 below when she says that "the creator who has created Sita had thoughtfully created the dark-complexioned groom (i.e. Lord Ram)".

One examines two things to determine whether a boy is suitable as a groom. These are—(i) his family background, and (ii) his personal qualities. Lord Ram fits the bill perfectly—he belongs to a famous and reputed dynasty, the Raghu Dynasty of Ayodhya, and his matchless personal qualities, divine virtues, mystical powers and glories have already spread in the world as is clear from what these ladies had themselves acknowledged in Doha no. 220 and 221 along with their intervening Chaupais. So, Lord Ram definitely fits the bill as the most suitable groom for Sita.

In Tulsidas' book "Janaki Mangal", Chanda no. 7, the women pray to Lord Shiva that the prince with the dark complexion (i.e. Lord Ram) should be the groom of Sita, and they (the city's women-folk) should be given an opportunity to sing auspicious songs befitting this occasion.]

कोउ कह ए भूपति पहिचाने । मुनि समेत सादर सनमाने ॥ ३ ॥
सखि परंतु पनु राउ न तजई । बिधि बस हठि अबिबेकहि भजई ॥ ४ ॥

kō'u kaha ē bhūpati pahicānē. muni samēta sādara sanamānē. 3.
sakhi parantu panu rā'u na tajaī. bidhi basa haṭhi abibēkahi bhajaī. 4.

Yet another lady<sup>1</sup> commented wryly and poignantly, 'But dear friend, the king has already come to know them. He has welcomed them along with sage Vishwamitra. (3)

But oh friend, inspite of recognizing him (Lord Ram) and being aware of his virtues and glories, the king remains adamant. He does not want to go back on his vows (for fear of ignominy and social rebuke) and refuses to abandon his stubbornness (regarding marrying Sita to anyone whoso breaks the old Bow of Lord Shiva).'<sup>2</sup> (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This is the fourth Sakhi or female friend. Her name was Kshemaa. Her mother was Shobhaawati, and father was Riputaapan. She represents the 'earth element' as she talks about the king going physically to meet sage Vishwamitra and then bringing him along with the two princes to lodge them in the city.

<sup>2</sup>When the previous lady said that if the king sees Lord Ram then he is sure to change his views and decide to marry his daughter Sita with the Lord in some way, her friend corrected her by saying that it is not the case as the king knows who the two brothers are, as well as Lord Ram's astounding glories. He has welcomed them along with sage Vishwamitra, and the sage had himself told him, in front of his courtiers, about Lord Ram and Laxman. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 215—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 217.}

But unfortunately, till now the king has given no hint that he has changed his mind, or that he is canceling the bow ceremony. The king is reputed to be steadfast in his vows, no matter what happens. So it is extremely unlikely that he will change his track now and somehow declare his intention of marrying Sita with Lord Ram. The chances of this happening are almost nil.

Later on we shall read that even Sita laments at the stubborn attitude of her father who does not understand or realise the consequences of his decisions on her fate—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 258.

The reason for Janak not abandoning his vows is clarified by the king himself in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, the 1st half of Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 252 where he laments that "if I abandon my vows or go back on my words, all my good reputation and glories would crumble".

Refer also to: (i) Janki Mangal, verse nos. 66, 69 and 70 which say that a king finds his glories if he is steadfast in his vows and true to his words; that had the king seen Lord Ram before he made the vow of marrying Sita to anyone who broke the bow he would certainly not have made this condition for her marriage in the first place; and that after making this vow and inviting all the kings it will be highly ridiculous, shameful and ignominious for him to rescind on his words now in the front of the society at this late hour.

(ii) In Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 89, stanza no. 1 it is said that “king Janak’s vows (words) are as strong and unbendable, i.e. inviolable and stern, as the Vajra (Indra’s weapon made of the strongest material in existence) and an elephant’s tusk”.]

कोउ कह जौं भल अहइ बिधाता । सब कहँ सुनिअ उचित फलदाता ॥ ५ ॥
तौ जानकिहि मिलिहि बरु एहू । नाहिन आलि इहाँ संदेहू ॥ ६ ॥

kō'u kaha jaum̐ bhala aha'i bidhātā. saba kham̐ suni'a ucita phaladātā. 5.
tau jānakihi milihi baru ēhū. nāhina āli ihām̐ sandēhū. 6.

One of their friends<sup>1</sup> had a very positive and sprightly attitude as she tried to inject hope and expectation to the discussions which had resulted in creating an atmosphere of despair and gloom till now.

She said spiritedly—‘If what we have heard of the Creator that he is benevolent and gracious, and that he gives suitable rewards to his subjects, is correct and true [5], then be assured that Janki (Sita) will get this prince as her groom. Oh friend, there is no doubt in this [6].’<sup>2</sup> (5-6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This is the fifth Sakhi. Her name is Baraaroḥa. Her mother was Modini, and her father was Mahimangal. She represents the ‘water element’. She seems to be eager about having perpetual opportunities to have ‘Darshan’ or divine viewing of Lord Ram. this will be clear in the following Chaupais and Doha no. 222. She is sentimental, and when one becomes emotional tears well up in his or her eyes. Hence, she symbolizes the water element.

<sup>2</sup>This lady is wise and bases her assertion on solid reasoning which she explains to her companions in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-7 that precedes Doha no. 223 which we shall be reading below. When the other ladies heard her logical arguments, all of them were reassured that it is indeed true that Sita would be married to Lord Ram—refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3 and 8 that precede Doha no. 223.

Besides the logics presented by the wise lady, there is another very important factor why Sita would definitely be married to Lord Ram. It so happened that the two brothers had gone to the royal garden to pluck flowers for sage Vishwamitra’s worship rituals. At that time, Sita had also gone to offer her prayers to Parvati, the Mother Goddess and the divine consort of Lord Shiva to whom the bow—which was at the focal point of the marriage ceremony—belonged. As if by providence, the two—Lord Ram and Sita—chanced to see each other. Instantly Sita resolved that Lord Ram would be her groom. She prayed to Parvati and silently expressed her desire to the Goddess who answered back to tell Sita in clear terms that her wishes would be fulfilled. So, how can it be otherwise? This entire episode is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 227—to Sortha no. 236.]

जौं बिधि बस अस बनै सँजोगू । तौ कृतकृत्य होइ सब लोगू ॥ ७ ॥
सखि हमरें आरति अति तातें । कबहुँक ए आवहिं एहि नातें ॥ ८ ॥

jaum̐ bidhi basa asa banai sam̐jōgū. tau kṛtakṛtya hō'i saba lōgū. 7.
sakhi hamarēm ārati ati tātēm. kabahum̐ka ē āvahiṁ ēhi nātēm. 8.

When the assembled women heard this assertion of their wise friend, all of them felt very happy and said in almost unison—‘If the Creator indeed makes this happen (i.e. if it really turns out by providence and a stroke of good luck that Lord Ram is indeed married to Sita), then all of us would become fulfilled and all our desires would be deemed to be realised. (7)

Oh friend! We are very eager and impatiently waiting to learn when he (Lord Ram) will be tied in this alliance (of marriage with Sita) so that he will be often visiting this place (Janakpur). (8)

[Note—Verse no. 8 clearly tells us why these women-folk are so eager that Lord Ram marries Sita. Once this happens, Lord Ram would be visiting Janakpur because the city would become his in-law’s place. When this happens, these ladies, who have literally lost their hearts to Lord Ram, will have repeated opportunity to see their beloved Lord again and again in their lives.

Remember: This is a devotional form of love, a soul-touching and purest form of love between a Jiva (living being) and the Parmatma (the Supreme Being, the Lord God), and there is no trace of a negativity in it at all.

A true devotee looks for an excuse—any excuse—to be with his chosen deity, his Lord as much as possible. In this case, the marriage of Sita with Lord Ram is the ‘excuse’ that the women-folk are relying on to get an opportunity to see their Lord again in life!

The following Doha no. 222 clarifies this point further.]

दो०. नाहिं त हम कहूँ सुनहु सखि इन्ह कर दरसनु दूरि । यह संघटु तब होइ जब पुन्य पुराकृत भूरि ॥ २२२ ॥
dōhā.

nāhiṁ ta hama kahūṁ sunahu sakhi inha kara darasanu dūri.
yaha saṅghaṭu taba hō'i jaba pun'ya purākṛta bhūri. 222.

Otherwise oh friend, having the rare chance to see their (Lord Ram and Laxman’s) divine and holy form is very remote and almost impossible for us.<sup>1</sup>

This<sup>2</sup> can happen only when we have a huge stock of good and meritorious deeds done in our past lives (so that we can cite them while praying to our repective deities to prevail upon them to heed our requests that Lord Ram marries Sita by breaking the Bow, for then the Creator and the deities whom we worship regularly would be obliged to heed our prayers as it is said that one is always entitled to be rewarded for any good deed done by him or her in life as is equally true for the punishment for any bad or evil deeds done).’* (Doha no. 222)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This is because once the ceremony is over and Sita gets married to someone else, Lord Ram and Laxman will never come back again. They have come at present to witness the bow-ceremony at the behest of sage Vishwamitra. When they go back home, there is no reason why they should come again.

The ladies say that the chances of their seeing Lord Ram again are ‘very remote and almost impossible’ if he does not marry Sita, but they do not ‘completely rule out this possibility—howsoever remote it may be’. Why is it so? Well, the kingdoms of Ayodhya and Janakpur are not very far away, and some sort of interaction between the citizens of the two kingdoms was in vogue. It may have been in the form of trading or marital relationships, or just plain tourism. But no vast oceans had to be crossed, and neither were the two kingdoms at war which would have prohibited the citizens of any kingdom from visiting the other.

So, in case someone was extremely desirous of meeting someone from the other kingdom, all he or she had to do was travel to that place. So the meaning is very clear now—if any one of the ladies desired to see Lord Ram sometime later on in her life, then she could do so but only if she traveled to Ayodhya. For men such travel would not be as much a big deal as it would be for the women—for the simple reason that in traditional societies women were not expected to move out of their homes except under special circumstances. Hence, such a visit to Ayodhya to merely see their beloved Lord Ram would be ‘rare and almost impossible’ if not ‘outright impossible’, or ‘completely out of the question’ or ‘absolutely unimaginable’.

<sup>2</sup>The women say that to have a ‘Darshan’ of the Lord—i.e. to have a divine view of the holy form of Lord Ram, it is necessary that one has accumulated spiritual rewards that come with doing auspicious and meritorious deeds. Because if one has been sinful in his past life, then such a privilege of having a divine sight of the Lord and being close to him is not possible.

*This emotion that without having done good and meritorious deeds it was impossible to have a chance to see the divine form of Lord Ram is reiterated later on by the citizens when they rush out to meet the Lord and his brothers at the time of the departure of the marriage party back for Ayodhya after the marriage ceremony—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that precede Doha no. 335.]

चौ०. बोली अपर कहेहु सखि नीका । एहिं बिआह अति हित सबही का ॥ १ ॥

bōlī apara kahēhu sakhi nīkā. ēhiṁ bi'āha ati hita sabahī kā. 1.

kō'u kaha saṅkara cāpa kaṭhōrā. ē syāmala mṛdugāta kisōrā. 2.

One of the ladies<sup>1</sup> agreed with her (i.e. with her friend who had said that she is certain that the Creator would make it so happen that Sita will marry Lord Ram—refer: Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precedes Doha no. 222). She said—‘Oh friend, you have spoken well. Everyone’s best interests will be served with this marriage.’<sup>2</sup> (1)

Yet another lady<sup>3</sup> expressed her doubts and reservations when she said—‘Lord Shiva’s Bow is stern and strong, while this dark-complexioned prince has a tender body and a delicate frame, and is still too young of age for such a formidable task.’<sup>4</sup>

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This is the sixth Sakhi or female friend. Her name was Padma-gandha. Her mother was Sobhnaangi, and father was Balaakar. She represents the ‘air’ element. This is because like the air element which injects life in the entire creation, she injects hope of a happy life in everyone.

<sup>2</sup>This lady meant that not only the close family members of Sita and Lord Ram will derive pleasure and happiness with this union, but it will also give the same degree of cheer to the citizens of Janakpur as well as of Ayodhya, along with making the gods and sages happy too. Hence, this marriage will serve the ‘best interests of all’; it will make everyone happy—both in this world as well as in the heaven.

It will make Sita happy because she herself wants to marry Lord Ram—refer: Baal Kand, Doha no. 229, and Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 234—to Sortha no. 236.

It will make Lord Ram happy because he too was enthralled by the sight of Sita when they first met in the royal garden when the Lord had gone there to bring flowers for sage Vishwamitra so much that even after returning to their lodging place Lord Ram was lost in the thoughts of Sita—refer: Baal Kand—(i) from Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 230—to Doha no. 231; and (ii) from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 237—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 239.

In the case of Sita, Goddess Parvati had assured her that her desires would be fulfilled—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 236 and its preceding Chanda, and in the case of Lord Ram it was sage Vishwamitra who had assured the Lord the same thing—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 237. In this context, refer also Baal Kand, Doha no. 326.

Janak was already charmed by Lord Ram, and internally he would surely have wished that the Lord should be the groom for his daughter Sita. Refer—(i) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 215—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 217; and (ii) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 222 respectively. Janak’s joys and exhilaration when Lord Ram had broken the bow and made it sure that now no hurdle stood for his marriage with Sita too proves the point—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 263; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 286.

Lord Ram’s father, king Dasrath, was obviously delighted when the news of the Lord’s marriage with Sita arrived at Ayodhya—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 290; (ii) Doha no. 325.

Lord Ram’s brothers Bharat and Shatrughan were equally delighted as were the queens—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 290—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 291.

As for Laxman, he was like a shadow of Lord Ram, and during the moments just before the bow was actually broken, Laxman had cheerfully and delightedly alerted all the guardians of the earth to be ready for the jolt and thunder that would accompany the breaking of the bow—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 259—Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 260.

The mother of Lord Ram (Kaushalya), as well as of Sita (Sunayana), and all other members of the royal household and the city were obviously ecstatic.

For happiness in Ayodhya, refer Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Doha no. 293—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 304.

For happiness in Janakpur, refer Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 262—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precede Doha no. 263; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 286; (iii) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 287—Doha no. 289.

As for the Gods' happiness, there are countless instances. However, we shall cite some of them here for reference: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 4-7 that precedes Doha no. 262; (ii) Doha no. 264; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precedes Doha no. 265; (iv) Doha no. 285; (iii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 304; (v) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 309; (vi) from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 314—to Doha no. 315; (vii) Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 317; (viii) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 323.

<sup>3</sup>This is our seventh Sakhi. Her name was Sulochana. Her mother was Vilaksha, and father was Tejastha. She stands for the 'Mana' element. This is because she uses logical thinking to challenge the views of others, and harbours doubts in her mind which is characteristic of the functioning of the mind. By her logics she has all but deflated the sense of hope and expectations formed by the positive opinions of her predecessors.

<sup>4</sup>Elsewhere also such doubts are expressed. For instance—(i) Sita herself was perplexed. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 258; (ii) Sita's mother Sunayana too expressed her strong reservations in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 255. In Janki Mangal she expresses her confoundedness to her friends in verse no. 73.

Refer also to Geetawali Ramayan where the citizens of Janakpur too show their doubts if Lord Ram would be able to lift and break the strong bow of Shiva. The instances in Baal Kand of Geetawali Ramayan are the following: (i) verse no. 68, stanza no. 8.

The same reservation is narrated in Kavitaawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 10 where it is said that Lord Shiva's bow is harder than the shell of a tortoise, and therefore next to impossible to break.]

सबु असमंजस अहइ सयानी । यह सुनि अपर कहइ मृदु बानी ॥ ३ ॥
सखि इन्ह कहँ कोउ कोउ अस कहहीं । बड़ प्रभाउ देखत लघु अहहीं ॥ ४ ॥ sabu asamanjasa aha'i sayānī. yaha suni apara kaha'i mṛdu bānī. 3.

sakhi inha kham' kō'u kō'u asa kahahīm. baṛa prabhā'u dēkhata laghu ahahīm. 4.

All the lady friends had their own views about the outcome of the present situation; some had serious doubts but others were confident that things would go the right way as they wish. When the wisest among them<sup>1</sup> heard all her friends making their own conclusions and assumptions, she decided to intervene and put all debates to rest with her solid reasoning supported by logic and proof. So she said sweetly—(3)

‘Oh Friend! Contrary to all you have said, let me tell you one thing. It is said that he (Lord Ram) only looks simple and delicate in physical terms, but his abilities, his prowess and strength are immense and bellies the impression one gets by merely seeing his tender body and young age.<sup>2</sup> (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This is our eighth Sakhi. Her name is Subhaga, her mother was Vineeta and father was Mahaavirya. She represents the ‘Buddhi’ or intellect element. She is the most wise and intelligent in the group as she uses proof and sound logic to support her argument that Lord Ram is sure to break the bow irrespective of how strong or unbendable it is.

<sup>2</sup>She goes on to outline her points of logic to support her contention that Lord Ram will be the winner in the bow-breaking competition. Though not expressly stated here, she must have told the gathering about the slaying of the demons Tadakaa and Subahu as well as the whole demon army. She must have told them about how Marich was flung across the ocean by a single arrow. She also must have told them about sage Vishwamitra personally selecting Lord Ram and Laxman to kill the demons over countless other options that the sage surely must have thought over and rejected, and how the two brothers had cheerfully protected the sage’s fire sacrifice without the least effort. All these things are deemed to have been outlined by her in the assertions she made.]

By touching the dust of whose holy feet the most sinful Ahilya found her liberation and deliverance from the curse [5], will that same prince not be able to break the bow of Lord Shiva? Don’t neglect this aspect (or logic, proof) and have confidence that our affections will bear fruits [6]. (5-6)

[Note—Ahilya had been turned into a stone. If she could be liberated from this form and transformed into a divine lady who regained her original form as the wife of sage Gautam, is it difficult, by any stretch of imagination, that a prince who possesses such stupendous super-human mystical powers would not break the stubborn resistance that our fate might create in fulfillment of our desires that he marry Sita and become permanently related to all of us as citizens of Sita’s kingdom so that we may have repeated opportunities to see his divine form and derive the pleasure of our lives?

And by the same logic, would he not break the jinx that surrounds Sita’s own fate, should there be any, by breaking the bow and removing the last barrier that separates her future happiness from the perplexities and mental agonies of uncertainty that she must be facing at present?

If Lord Ram can clean Ahilya of her sins, then will he not clean us and Sita of our sins if we have any? Why do you all harbour senseless doubts that don’t stand the test of logic? So, come on. Have faith like Ahilya had that one day Lord Ram will liberate her and break her jinxed fate. Rely upon your affection for the Lord and be assured that all our desires will be fulfilled.]

जेहिं बिरंचि रचि सीय सँवारी । तेहिं स्यामल बरु रचेउ बिचारी ॥ ७ ॥ jēhiṁ birañci raci sīya saṁvārī. tēhiṁ syāmala baru racē'u bicārī. 7.

tāsu bacana suni saba haraṣānīm. aisē'i hō'u kahahiṁ mṛdu bānīm. 8.

The Creator who has created Sita and bestowed her with all the beauty she possesses is the same Creator who has also painstakingly created the dark-complexioned prince to match her (beauty and charm).<sup>1</sup> (7)

Everyone attentively heard her council, and felt reassured and exhilarated. They exclaimed cheerfully in unison with sweet voices—‘Let it be so; let it happen as you say!’<sup>2</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This wise lady seems to tell her companions—“So why do you worry? The Creator is not a child; he is a master-craftsman. He thinks carefully before creating each unit of creation, and takes into consideration all angles before actually giving this unit its final form. When he created Sita he thought things over and then went ahead to create her companion with great care so that the trouble he had taken in painstakingly moulding her charming form does not go in vain by uniting her with a companion who would not suit her. Sita was the Creator’s special unit; he has put in all his creating skills while moulding her form and then deciding her destiny. So he must have taken special care while creating her companion, and by the way it looks the dark-complexioned prince, i.e. Lord Ram, is the match the Creator had crafted for Sita. So why shall we worry when the Creator has already decided Sita’s destiny?

Remember, the Creator has created this world with two sides, each complimenting the other. The male and the female are the two facets of his creation just like a coin which has two sides that perfectly fit and match with each other to make the coin have its value and usefulness. A deformed coin or one in which one of the faces is defaced is useless and without any value. What is the use this coin has for the king; which king would make a coin that defaces his own face and makes him an object of ridicule in this world? Similarly, what is the use of a mismatched creation for its creator? Hence, if the Creator took so much trouble to carefully mould Sita’s form as well as Lord Ram’s form then surely he must have had some grand plan in his mind. He surely must have crafted them to match each other to perfection. This translates into a certainty of Sita and Lord Ram being united.”

This lady’s assertion reiterates what someone else had already said in Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 222 herein above.

Refer also to Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 67, stanza no. 3.]

<sup>2</sup>Since her arguments and logics were irrefutable, everyone readily agreed with her. All of them sort of blessed her and hoped that her words would turn out to be a reality. Everyone was now certain that Lord Ram will indeed marry Sita.

There is a spiritual message in this friend’s statements. She has highlighted only Ahilya’s liberation. And this single example had convinced all her friends that

Lord Ram will surely fulfill their desires. In other words, stress is laid on devotion and unflinching faith in Lord Ram and his divinity. If a devotee is absolutely sure that if he takes refuge in the Lord all his wishes would be fulfilled, it is going to be that way. On the other hand, if one goes on doubting and debating, he will never find peace and mental rest like the case of the ladies before this last one cited the case of Ahilya.]

The women-folk who had pretty faces and charming eyes were extremely exhilarated in their hearts, and they enthusiastically showered flowers upon the two brothers (from their perch in the balconies and roof-tops) wherever they went. (Doha no. 223)

[Note—Lord Ram and Laxman were walking down the streets of Janakpur for sight-seeing. Children and men accompanied them and followed them round the city, but the women stayed in their homes and showered flowers on the two brothers from their perches on the balconies and roof-tops. They also extended their hands through the windows to throw flowers on the two brothers.

This is the first instance of flowers being rained upon Lord Ram and Laxman at Janakpur. Later on we shall read that the Gods too have showered flowers from the sky—but that happens after the bow is broken and Sita has put the victory garland around Lord Ram's neck—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Doha no. 285; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 314.

A similar situation of bliss, happiness and joy spreading everywhere wherever Lord Ram goes is seen later on during his forest exile. As he passed through the villages and hamlets on the way, all their residents felt very happy and excited. This happiness and bliss prevailed everywhere, in each village and hamlet through which the Lord passed on his onward journey to the deep forest. Refer—Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 122.]

ati bistāra cāru gaca ḍhārī. bimala bēdikā rucira samvārī. 2.

The two brothers (Ram and Laxman) went to the east of the city where the arena for the bow-breaking ceremony was located<sup>1</sup>. (1)

At the center of the venue was a beautiful and spacious paved area that was large in area and plastered with lime and mortar ('Gaca'). A gentle slope from this ground led up to an elevated area where the altar ('bēdikā'—a raised platform) was situated at its middle. This altar was wonderfully decorated and clean (as Lord celebrated Bow was to be kept on it)<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Ram and Laxman's main purpose of coming to Janakpur was to witness the bow-breaking ceremony. So it is natural that they would like to see the arena. Even in modern times, when some great domestic or international game or other form of competition is organised in a big city and someone visits the city during this period, he would naturally like to see the stadium or the venue of the event.

All roads leading to the site were specially decorated, and it aroused natural curiosity in one's heart.

The two brothers had come from the western side of the city. This is because the river Ganges near where Ahilya was liberated lies on the west of Janakpur. The bow-breaking venue was on the city's eastern fringe. This clearly means that they had crossed the city and had seen all the important sites along the way.

<sup>2</sup>The word "Gaca" refers to a slanted slope leading up to a platform. Today we have steps, but in some temples in the south of India this tradition still survives, where large stone slabs are used to pave the way from the lower surrounding area up to the main platform of the temple.

The word also implies that it was paved with glass pieces instead of ordinary stone slabs.

The main altar was decorated even more beautifully with gems and priceless stones. It is the marriage ceremony of a great king's daughter where all the renowned kings and princes of the time had been invited. It is obvious that in these circumstances all the resources of king Janak would have been mobilized to impress the guests.

Even today when foreign dignitaries arrive or international competitions are held in a country, all plugs are pulled to leave an upfront good impression upon the guests.]

Behind this main platform, on all the four sides of it, were erected elevated seats made of gold where the invited kings and princes would sit. (3)

Still behind this ring were the seats meant for the male citizens of Janakpur. These seats were arranged on a higher sloping or terraced ground (so that everyone could have a clear view of the platform where the bow-breaking was to take place). (4-5)

[Note—The layout and construction of the venue of the bow-breaking ceremony was like we have in modern stadiums. At the center was the altar where the bow would be placed. It was on a high platform. Surrounding it were rows after rows of seats. Some of the front seats meant for dignitaries and invitees were closer to the main altar and formed the inner ring of seats. The ground was tapered so that the person sitting in the front row did not obstruct the view of the person behind him. The common people were to be seated in the back row and on erected balconies.]

Near and behind the back row of seats were made the balconies designed like small cabins or rooms which were fully decorated and colourful, looking wonderful like homes of nobility. They were decorated with crystals ("Dhawal" means white and glittering). (6)

The women-folk of the city were to sit here according to their caste, clan or place in the social hierarchy, and watch the events from there<sup>1</sup>. (7)

The boys of the city (who had followed the two brothers from the time they first stepped out to go sight-seeing) cheerfully and enthusiastically pointed out the salient features of the venue with sweet and pleasant voices. They took the Lord (Sri Ram, and his brother Laxman) around the site and showed him everything with due respect and honour<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Women and men would be seated in separate enclosures to conform to the traditions of the society of those times. Whereas men were to be seated on open seats, the women were to remain in special covered enclosures that resembled large balconies and windows of homes.

<sup>2</sup>This verse summarises the description of the venue. It also means that the excited children went round the venue with Lord Ram and Laxman, joyfully pointing out everything to them—where the bow would be kept, where the kings would be seated, where the men-folk would be seated, and where the women are to be seated.

When we read further we will notice that these children have become very friendly with Lord Ram and have struck a cordial relationship with the two brothers. Some of the children are holding the Lord's hands, some are tugging at his clothes, some are trying to speak loudly so that the Lord's attention is drawn towards them, some are running ahead while some are by the side of the Lord, and a large group follows from behind. These electrified children are having the most enjoyable time of their lives—giggling, smiling, running, hopping, skipping, tottering and stumbling in the melee and getting up to dust their clothes, huffing and panting, sneering at each other in trying to shout others down so that they can draw the attention of the two brothers and be heard by them, and in general creating a fascinating sight that enthralls the mind of the beholder.

The children were aware that the ground of the bow-breaking ceremony was consecrated as Lord Shiva's bow was to be kept there. So when they were moving around the altar and other close-by places, they showed the greatest respect to the place.

Another important interpretation is this: Though it is true that the city children were so excited by meeting Lord Ram and Laxman—especially when they found that these brothers did not have any sort of 'airs' about them and were freely mixing with them like they were their fast and old friends, the children overcame all initial hesitations and inhibitions that the children usually have when they meet strangers for the first time. As time passed they become very informal with Lord Ram and Laxman—touching them and pulling them here and there. But this should not be construed to mean that they were being rude to the two brothers. These children showed the greatest respect and honour to both Lord Ram and his brother Laxman.

The Lord understood this—and this is why he did not mind at all about their childish pranks and behaviour. This is abundantly clear in the following verses.]

दो०. सब सिसु एहि मिस प्रेमबस परसि मनोहर गात ।
तन पुलकहिं अति हरषु हियँ देखि देखि दोउ भ्रात ॥ २२४ ॥
dōhā.

saba sisu ēhi misa prēmabasa parasi manōhara gāta.
tana pulakahim̐ ati haraṣu hiyaṁ dēkhi dēkhi dō'u bhrāta. 224.

On this wise and with the pretext of showing the two brothers around the city and the venue, the children touched the Lord's divine body, making their own bodies thrilled and ecstatic by this touch (as it was an electrifying experience for them). Their hearts were overwhelmed with joy and happiness (on seeing the two brothers from up so close and interacting with them in a friendly and intimate manner). (Doha no. 224)

[Note—These children are so very fortunate indeed. The Lord for whose divine glimpse great hermits, ascetics, sages and seers spend their entire lives doing Tapa and other forms of spiritual efforts but still are unable to have his vision is now mobbed by ordinary children who touch him, tug at his clothes, talk with him and hold his fingers and hands as they excitedly take Lord Ram and his brother Laxman round the city and the venue of the bow-breaking ceremony.]

चौ०. सिसु सब राम प्रेमबस जाने । प्रीति समेत निकेत बखाने ॥ १ ॥
निज निज रुचि सब लेहिं बोलाई । सहित सनेह जाहिं दोउ भाई ॥ २ ॥
caupāī.

sisu saba rāma prēmabasa jānē. prīti samēta nikēta bakhānē. 1.
nija nija ruci saba lēhim̐ bōlāī. sahita sanēha jāhim̐ dō'u bhāī. 2.

[Now, Lord Ram and Laxman have come out of the venue of the bow-breaking ceremony and are on their back to the place where they have been odged with sage Vishwamitra. The children show them their own homes, and the Lord praises them.]

Lord Ram had realised that the children had become overwhelmed with affection and love for him. So when these children came near their own homes, they lovingly pointed them out to the Lord who in his turn praised them (i.e. the Lord admired their homes and said that they were all so beautiful, large, colourful and attractive to make these children happy)<sup>1</sup>. (1)

The children called the two brothers with names according to their own liking, and to places they wanted them to see and visit. Overcome with the affection and love shown by these innocent children towards them, the two brothers responded positively and lovingly, gladly going to wherever they were called by the children.<sup>2</sup> (2)*

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Ram is a noble prince with a friendly disposition and amiable nature. He had never behaved in a chivalrous manner, showing arrogance and ego by unnecessarily creating an artificial aura of majesty and nobility when it was not needed. But inspite of this he ensured that basic codes of decent behaviour were adhered to.

Even when he was a child himself and went to play with other boys of his age at Ayodhya he was invariably friendly with them, and these boys maintained discipline and decorum because they knew that he was their prince and future king. So even when playing together they still maintained dignity and kept an honourable distance from Lord Ram and his brothers. The boys of Ayodhya did not mob him, did not tug and pull at him, and did not touch him or his clothes like the children of Janakpur. The reason is simple—while the children of Ayodhya were afraid to do anything that might annoy Ram or his brothers, or even their father, king Dasrath, which would invite strong punishment, no such inhibitions were applicable to the children of Janakpur. For them, the two brothers, Lord Ram and Laxman, were simply their ‘friends’. These excited children had developed a very strong bond of friendship and cordiality with the two brother, even calling them with whatever names they felt like, and may have even invited them into their homes for a short visit or for snacks (refer next verse no. 2).

*This entire description of children flocking around Lord Ram and Laxman, touching the Lord, catching hold of his hands and fingers, pulling him here and there, tugging at his clothes, calling him by different names, and jumping all around him with excitement, and the Lord reciprocating their gestures and emotions with equal love and affection has a big message for us.

The message is sharp and clear: If we wish to come so close to the Supreme Lord that we can actually touch him and feel him, if we want to be so close to him that all formalities are done away with, if we wish to remove all barriers between ourselves and the Lord of our devotion, if we want that the Lord is at our beck and call—then we must turn ourselves to become as innocent and lovable as a child.

Remember: The Lord was followed by children as well as by adults. But only the children felt free to touch him, tug at him, pull him here and there, call him in any direction, and address him by any name they fancied for him, while the adults maintained a respectful distance and could not muster enough courage to act like their own children. Had they done so, they would be rebuked and called mad. Hence, it is much, much easier to attain the Lord if we are like these innocent children who observed no formalities, who did not even know the meaning of the word prince or a guest-of-honour with whom one must act with dignity and respect, as compared to knowledgeable adults who observed formalities because they knew how to treat someone who is a guest-of-honour of their king, who is by all counts a great prince of a great kingdom because their own king, Janak, has shown them such special favour by personally going to receive them and then escorting them to the city to lodge them at a special palace.

For the children, Lord Ram was a dear friend and playmate; for the adult citizens he was their king's special guest, a prince of high stature. That made the difference.

Thus, the greater is the innocence of our heart, the more intense is our devotion for the Lord God, the greater is our affinity for him, the more intense is the Lord's response, and the more closer he comes to us.

<sup>2</sup>If we visualize the scene in our mind we can easily imagine what might be happening. As has been noted in the note appended to verse no. 1 above, besides showing Lord Ram and Laxman the sights of the city, the children excitedly pointed out their own homes to them on their way back to the lodging place where they were staying with sage Vishwamitra. Sure enough some of these children would call them by their names or by any nickname they had devised for Lord Ram and Laxman, or simply as brothers, pals, friends etc. Some of the children bade them goodbye on the street, some invited them in their homes for a visit or for meeting their parents or for some rest and refreshment. Still others pulled them away to show them some other landmarks or sights that were out of the way, and still others pointed out their schools and playgrounds. The Lord obliged them all smilingly, with cheer and equal measure of enthusiasm so as not to make the children unhappy and feel that the Lord is not paying attention to them.

Remember: Lord Ram is not an ordinary human prince, though his physical body and appearance is such. He is a personified form of the Supreme Being, the Lord of the entire creation. It is no wonder that the same Lord could make his presence felt at the same instant at different places to oblige all the children. The proof of this actually happening will come indirectly later on in a different context at two places.

These are the following:--(i) When Bharat had gone to the forest to try bring Lord Ram to Ayodhya, he was accompanied by a large party of the citizens of Ayodhya. When they met Lord Ram in the forest at a place called Chitrakoot, all of them were eager to meet the Lord. So Lord Ram obliged them all and met them in the way they all liked to meet him. This means, some met him as their beloved prince, some treated him as their friend, some as their Lord, some elder citizens had treated him like their sons, and so on and so forth. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 244.

(ii) When the Lord returned to Ayodhya after his forest exile, every citizen of Ayodhya was eager to meet and welcome the Lord individually. From practical point of view this was impossible. So what did the Lord do? He assumed countless forms, as many as there were number of citizens. And then he met each one of them individually, embracing them without consideration of caste or sect of society. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-7 that precede Doha no. 6 which are absolutely explicit on this point.

The Lord did not get annoyed when the children insisted that he come here and then there; rather he went there cheerfully and gladly. This is because Lord Ram had realised that the children are overwhelmed with affection and love for him, and the Lord wanted to honour each of their wishes because the Lord honours only one quality in this world, and it is having love for him. This is clear in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 24.]

bhagati hētu sō'i dīnadayālā. citavata cakita dhanuṣa makhasālā. 5.

Lord Ram showed his younger brother (Laxman) the design and general layout of the city as well as of the venue (of the bow ceremony), explaining to him in sweet and pleasant words their special features, their outstanding beauty and charming construction<sup>1</sup>. (3)

The Almighty Lord whose cosmic dynamic powers known as Maya is so powerful that it can create the entire universe in a fraction of a second that it takes one to blink as soon as the Lord wishes that to happen<sup>2</sup> [4], the same merciful and kind Lord is so gracious that he looks at the venue of the bow-breaking ceremony with awe and stunning astonishment just to please his devotees (the children and the men who are accompanying him round the city)<sup>3</sup> [5]. (4-5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Originally it was Laxman who was eager to see the city. As the two brothers moved around, Lord Ram discovered that he was the center of attraction, and felt that Laxman might feel neglected and ill-at-ease. So, the Lord affectionately described the city to Laxman as they passed by important places. In effect, the Lord repeated to Laxman what the excited children were giving a virtual running-commentary about.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-7 that precede Doha no. 21 where Hanuman tells Ravana about Lord Ram's mystical powers that prove he is the supreme Lord of creation.

The same idea that the entire creation is merely a hair on the body of the Viraat Purush is reiterate in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chanda line no. 9 that precedes Doha no. 192 when mother Kaushalya offers her prayers to the Lord at the time of his birth.

Once again, it is said that the cosmic form of the Lord is like a huge tree from which countless universes emerge like its fruits—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 13 where sage Kumbhaj has prayed to Lord Ram.

<sup>3</sup>These two verses are included to remove any trace of doubt one might have in his mind about the incompatibility of two things—one, that Lord Ram is a personified form of the Supreme Being who is supposed to know everything, and two, as the way he feigns ignorance and eagerly sees all the sites of the city like ordinary tourists, at the way Lord Ram seems enchanted with the beauty of the city, the way he has to be told about the different places by the children and adults as if he does not know about them, and the way he goes here and there when called by the excited children.

Well, Lord Ram is doing all this to please and oblige the ordinary people of the land, whether they are children or adults, who do not have the mental ability to reach the transcendental state of spiritual existence attained by great ascetics and sages who have become self-realised and enlightened to realise the Supreme Being and understand the Lord's existence in the form of the 'Atma', the pure conscious soul. For ordinary creatures who cannot digest and fathom the intricacies of metaphysics and theology, the easiest way to attain the Lord is the sacred path of 'Bhakti' (devotion and love for the Lord).

The entire objective of this narration of the Lord going out to sight-see the city of Janakpur is precisely this—to provide an opportunity to ordinary people to have the divine experience of having the Lord in their midst. The Lord was not there amongst the ordinary citizens to boast of his super-natural powers to impress them, by saying for instance 'I know this and I know that; or this is not perfect and that is faulty because of this and that reason'. So even if there were imperfections in the constructions and designing and decorations etc. the Lord still greatly praised them and those who erected these structures so that everyone felt happy and pleased.

The Lord acts in a way and does everything that pleases his devotees. He behaves as if he is bound to the ways of the world as well as the physical body that he adopted to become a human, but actually he is independent of all obligations and free from all fetters—refer: Ram Charit Manas—(i) Lanka Kand, Chaupai line nos. 11-12 that precede Doha no. 73; (ii) Lanka Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 114; (iii) Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 101; and (iv) Lord Shiva's words asserting this fact in Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 39.

The Lord had come on earth to spread love, happiness and joy, and not to criticize and find faults. Does not the Lord know what faults his creation has; does he need to be snobbish and haughty and pretentious to make himself appear high and mighty and exalted in front of ordinary mortals who would be awed at the presence of a super-human amongst them?]

After having watched the novelty of the mighty fine and spectacular sights of the city that held the mind and the imagination of the beholder in thrall, and the wonderful way it was decked up for the bow-breaking ceremony, as well as having experienced the emotional way the citizens had warmly welcomed the two brothers, the Lord hurried to his Guru (sage Vishwamitra). They were worried that it was already too late. (6)

He by whom even the God of Terror is frightened (i.e. the latter does not have courage to defy Lord Ram and gainsay the Lord)—is the same Lord who is showing the mystical powers of Bhakti (the grand virtues of devotion and love) by feeling scared at annoying the sage for being late<sup>1</sup>. (7)

When Lord Ram realised that he is getting late, he politely took his leave from the boys who were accompanying them. Using pleasant and sweet words, he had to forcibly bid good-bye to the boys<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Ram had promised sage Vishwamitra that he will go and come back ‘immediately’ or ‘soon’ after showing the city to Laxman. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 218. And now the sun has set and it was dark, and they have been wondering in the city late. Sure enough, the sage would be worried and would get angry at them for being late in returning.

Lord Ram is affright that he is getting late to return to sage Vishwamitra. The Supreme Lord who instills fear even in the heart of the Terror God because the latter dare not disobey him, is feeling worried that the sage would get annoyed and angry at him for being late. The Lord indirectly gives the message that if one has ‘Bhakti’ for him, the Lord cannot gather courage to offend such a person or not do according to his wishes. Vishwamitra had ordered them

Sage Vishwamitra loved Lord Ram like his son; the sage for once had forgotten that these two princes are none but manifestations of the Supreme Being, the Lord of the entire creation, but out of intensity of love and affection for Lord Ram and Laxman he had started to treat them as his ‘ward’.

The sage must have got worried that it was getting dark, and the two boys have yet not returned. What has happened to them—have they got lost in the big city? So, Lord Ram thought, that the sage will take him to task for being late and making him restless about his security and well-being.

Well, had the sage’s Mana (heart and mind) not been overwhelmed with love and affection for the two brothers and had lived in the transcendental plane of existence where it knew that Lord Ram is Brahm personified, then there was no question of the sage getting worried about the safety of the two brothers. Well, he was not in the beginning—as proved by the fact he determined that they would fearlessly face and kill the demons without any doubt. When he let Lord Ram and Laxman stand guard during his fire sacrifice, he did not worry about their safety. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 210.

But then the merciful Lord had to show the dispassionate sage what joy and happiness lies in having a heart of a devotee who loves his Lord more than anything in existence. The Lord had to show the renunciate hermit what sweet nectar there is in the virtues of love and affection as opposed to dry metaphysical knowledge and theological doctrines. So he invoked these virtues in the dry-as-nut Mana of the enlightened sage.

For a detailed note on how the sage forgot for once that the two princes accompanying him are not ordinary princes but Brahm in a personified form, please see elaborate notes appended to Chaupai line nos. 3-7 that precede Doha no. 209 which we have read earlier.

The assertion that even ‘Terror’ is afraid to annoy his Lord is reiterated elsewhere also where it is said that “even ‘Kaal’, the God of death, is scared to annoy the Lord”—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 13.

<sup>2</sup>This verse and its preceding one are wonderful verses. Chaupai line no. 7 says that the Lord was afraid of the sage as he was getting late, and the reason is that the Lord wants to show the mystical effects of the power of Bhakti. The sage had great Bhakti for him, and the Lord had promised him that he will come back soon after a quick round of the city with Laxman.

And it so happened that in the city he met others who also had Bhakti for him—the citizens, the adult men and women, and the children. As has been pointed out earlier, the children represent purest form Bhakti as they have started loving their dear friend Ram and do not want to part with him. But the Lord was in a dilemma. Both the sage as well as the children had Bhakti, but the Lord had earlier promised the sage that he will come back soon. So, the Lord must honour the word given by him to his first devotee, the sage—which was that he will come back to him soon. Had he not given this word, the Lord would have stayed for a long time in the city, obliging the children by being with them, say till midnight.

The point is very clear. Therefore Lord Ram had no option but to bid goodbye to the children and return hastily to sage Vishwamitra.

There is one stark point staring at our faces here. The Lord took his leave from the ‘children’ and not from the ‘adults’ who also may have been following him round the city. But the difference is this: the adults may have gone for some distance from their homes or workplaces, and returned to resume the work they were doing. The children, on the other hand, followed the Lord wherever he went. On his way back, when these children reached their respective homes, they cheerfully asked the Lord to come in, or simply showed the Lord their homes, saying “Oh friend, I live here”, and so on. Refer: Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 225.

No one wanted to leave the Lord as he swiftly moved in the direction of his lodging place—because he was getting late.

So, finally, the Lord had to persuade the hordes of children thronging him to go back to their homes even against their wills, using sweet and endearing parting words. This is the way of the world, and the Lord had to ensure that it is observed because he had assumed a human body that is subjected to, and is expected to obey these laws.

The presence of Lord Ram in their middle had the same effect on the children that a magnet has on iron pieces. The same dramatic scene is witnessed later on in this story of the Ramayan when Lord Ram had gone out of Ayodhya on his forest sojourn for 14 years. The grieving citizens of Ayodhya had followed the Lord from behind, deciding that their best of good and welfare lies in the company of the Lord they loved so much, even in the forest, and not without him in the city of Ayodhya. Lord Ram had tried all means and arguments to motivate them to return after the huge crowd following him had gone very far behind him. But the citizens refused to return. So, the Lord was forced—indeed with a heavy heart of the extreme kind—to use a trick to sneak out during the night when they were all asleep. The citizens grieved and wept like abandoned children, but they had no choice but to return to Ayodhya and wait patiently for the Lord to return at the end of the exile period. This heart-wrenching episode that rocks even the sternest of minds is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 84—to Doha no. 86.]

The two brothers reached the Guru (sage Vishwamitra) hesitantly, meekly and submissively, bowed before him affectionately, and then sat down after getting permission from him. (Doha no. 225)

[Note—Realising that they had been late in coming back, the two brothers approached the sage hesitantly and meekly as they feared that he would be angry at them. They politely bowed their heads before him as a mark of great respect and subtly requesting him to forgive them for being late.

The sage was a wise man. He had himself told Lord Ram that he should go and let the citizens of Janakpur enjoy the reward of having eyes by letting them have a divine view of the Lord's holy form. Refer: Doha no. 218.

So the sage was not at all annoyed for the two brothers being late; rather he understood the reason for it even without them saying it in clear words. So the sage asked them to sit down. Had the sage been angry, he would have politely admonished them or at least not told them to sit down.]

चौ०. निसि प्रबेस मुनि आयसु दीन्हा । सबहीं संध्याबंदनु कीन्हा ॥ १ ॥
कहत कथा इतिहास पुरानी । रुचिर रजनि जुग जाम सिरानी ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

nisi prabēsa muni āyasu dīnhā. sabahīṁ sandhyābandanu kīnhā. 1. kahata kathā itihāsa purānī. rucira rajani juga jāma sirānī. 2.

At dusk (nisi prabēsa; literally meaning the time of the day when night is about to make entry), the sage (Vishwamitra) ordered everyone to do the religious observance known as 'Sandhya-bandan' (sandhyābandan<sup>1</sup>)—prayers offered to the Sun-God as a visible manifestation of Brahm, the Supreme Being, by using the famous 'Gayatri Mantra'<sup>2</sup>. (1)

After completing the Sandhya-bandan ritual, the sages gathered together to say and listen to religious discourses ('Kathaa') based on ancient religious histories, known as the 'Itihaas'<sup>3</sup>, till about the middle of the night<sup>4</sup>. This time was spent pleasantly<sup>5</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>From the metaphysical and spiritual point of view, the union of Brahm, the Supreme Being, and the Jiva, the living being, is symbolised by the 'Sandhya'—meaning the point where two entities are joined.

The word 'Bandan' simply means to 'offer respects to', or 'to offer prayers to'.

To wit, 'Sandhya-bandan' is a religious observance that symbolizes the union of the Jiva with Brahm. It is done regularly to remind the Jiva, at least three times of the day, that he must strive to establish a union between himself and Brahm.

Sandhya-bandan is a religious observance done three times a day—at dawn, at noon, and dusk. It is usually done near a water-body, such as a pond or river. The Gayatri Mantra is the standard Mantra used for this sacramental observance. It is usually done near a water-body, such as a pond or river. Pranayam, a meditative process when the breath is controlled by a set of postures, is part of the ritual.

Sandhya-bandan consists of two basic stages—the first step is offering of prayers using the Gayatri Mantra and doing Pranayam, and the second step is offering of oblations to the Sun-God.

During the evening Sandhya-bandan, the first step is completed facing the east, and the second step is done facing the west.

During the morning Sandhya-bandan, the reverse process is followed—viz. the first step is done facing the west, and the second step is completed facing the east. At noon, the process is done in such a way that first half of the sacrament is done according to the morning Sandhya-bandan, and the second half is done according to the evening process.

Now, it is classified into three types depending upon the time when it is done. For instance, the Sandhya-bandan that is done in the evening are of the following three types—(i) the best type of Sandhya-bandan is done at a time when sun has reached the western horizon but has yet not disappeared from sight, (ii) the medium is that which is done after the sun has set beyond the horizon but the stars are still not visible, and (iii) the lowest category of this sacrament is when it is done after the stars start appearing in the sky.

The reverse process is applicable to the one that is done in the morning. That means, the Sandhya-bandan that is done while the stars are still visible is the best, the one that is done after the stars vanish from sight but before the sun becomes visible in the eastern sky is medium, and the one done after sunrise is of the lowest type.

For the one that is done at noon, the best is that which is done in such a way that half of the process falls just before exact noon time, and half after it.

Refer also Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 327 below.

<sup>2</sup>The Gayatri Mantra is the following—"OM Bhurbhuvaha Swaha, Tatsaviurvarenyam, Bhargo Devasya Dhimahi, Dhiyo Yo Nah Prachodayat". This is known as the full Brahm Gayatri as it is dedicated to OM, the word which is used as a synonym for Brahm. It means 'OM is the supreme, transcendental Brahm. He is the lord of creation of the terrestrial (Bhu), the celestial (Bhuvaha) and heavenly worlds (Suwaha). I offer my oblations to you. That Brahm is luminous like the Sun. He is excellent, the best, the most exalted, a destroyer of sins, and a divine entity. May he imbibe, infuse and inspire our intellect with wisdom and enlightenment so that we are purified and move on the righteous and noble path'. The four phrases of the Gayatri Mantra are clearly marked by small numerals in this Mantra. This Mantra appears in the Rig Veda (3/62/10), the Sam Veda (1462), and Yajur Veda (3/35, 22/9, 30/2, 36/6).

<sup>3</sup>Since sage Vishwamitra was the senior-most sage of the group, he was the one who told these stories from the Purans, and the others, including Lord Ram and Laxman, heard them attentively. Vishwamitra was a sage having a very long life, and he was highly learned and had a phenomenal memory. So every time an opportunity arrived to keep others occupied or entertained, as in the present case, they selected him to tell them something interesting from the past. Then the sage would quote some interesting anecdote from the ancient texts, known as the Purans and Itihaas that conveyed some form of religious messages. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 210; (ii) Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 278.

<sup>4</sup>The time spent in telling such interesting stories was ‘Jug-jaam’ meaning ‘two Pahar’—which means 2 (‘Jug’ = 2) x 3 hours (‘Jaam’) = approximately 6 hours from sunset. This takes us to around midnight.

<sup>5</sup>The time of the night was ‘spent pleasantly’ because, one, the stories that the sage told the gathering were very interesting, and two, they had a devotional quotient which made them very attractive and pleasant to hear for the sages as well as the two brothers.]

मुनिबर सयन कीन्हि तब जाई । लगे चरन चापन दोउ भाई ॥ ३ ॥
जिन्ह के चरन सरोरुह लागी । करत बिबिध जप जोग बिरागी ॥ ४ ॥
तेइ दोउ बंधु प्रेम जनु जीते । गुर पद कमल पलोडत प्रीते ॥ ५ ॥ munibara sayana kīnhi taba jā'ī. lagē carana cāpana dō'u bhā'ī. 3.

jinha kē carana sarōruha lāgī. karata bibidha japa jōga birāgī. 4.
tē'i dō'u bandhu prēma janu jītē. gura pada kamala palōṭata prītē. 5.

After that (i.e. just after midnight), the sage retired to sleep. The two brothers began to softly massage and gently knead his legs (to give the sage comfort and provide relief from tired muscles and weary feet)<sup>1</sup>. (3)

The two brothers (Lord Ram and Laxman) whose holy feet are reverentially sought to be attained by renunciate and dispassionate hermits and ascetics by doing so many different kinds of Japa (repetition of holy Names of the Lord God as well as the Mantras which are spiritual formulas) and Yoga (meditation) [4], the same brothers seemed to be conquered (overwhelmed) by the Guru's (sage Vishwamitra's) love and affection for them so much so that they dutifully and respectfully massage his legs and softly knead their tired muscles [5]<sup>2</sup>. (4-5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The point to note here is that the two brothers did not deem fit to ask for the sage's permission to serve him by messaging his tired feet, whereas on all other occasions they have sought it. Well, the answer is that when a disciple serves his teacher personally, no formal permission is required, but for all other things it is needed.

Another reason was to serve the sage and make him pleased so that he gives them his blessings for the events that were to unfold the next day—at the bow-breaking ceremony.

The third possible reason is to silently ask the sage to forgive the two brothers for any mistakes that they might have made till now. One such possible mistake was coming late after the tour of the city of Lanka.

The fourth reason is that this is the first opportunity that sage Vishwamitra has got to properly rest without any worries for what has to be done the next day since the time he left his hermitage to bring Lord Ram and Laxman from Ayodhya. First he went to Ayodhya, then he came back to his hermitage with the two brothers and got engaged in the arrangement and completion of the fire sacrifice, then he was kept busy by the regular administrative affairs of his hermitage, and then started on the journey for Janakpur. This was the first time he could sleep peacefully without any worries to be handled the next day.

It is a matter of practical experience that when one has a lot of work to do and his mind is occupied with it then though he might sleep daily for a few hours in the night yet he becomes tired. Only when the work is finished and his mind is free from the accompanying tension does he experience tiredness and fatigue overtaking him. It is then that he needs some real sleep and body massage or gentle kneading of the tired muscles to relax them and help him feel rejuvenated the next day.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Ram is a manifestation of the Supreme Being, and Laxman is his devoted follower; Lord Ram has Laxman always by his side. When one wishes to please the Lord it is equally important to please the Lord's devoted follower, his devotee. Nothing pleases the Lord more than pleasing his close devotee. That is why both the brothers are referred to in these verses.

Now, the way to reach the Lord is through various spiritual practices, such as doing Japa and Yoga. Many ascetics and hermits attempt to attain the holy feet of the Supreme Being by taking recourse to these methods, but they are only a few who succeed. In other words, attainment of the Lord is a tough task. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chanda stanza no. 3, line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 32.

But the same Lord is easily attainable by un-adulterated devotion, love and affection. Sage Vishwamitra has developed fatherly love for them, and a father's love for his children is pure, simple and sincere. At the time of handing the two brothers to him, king Dasrath had clearly asked the sage that henceforth he is their father—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 208.

The spiritual message here is clear: If we wish to have closeness with our Lord, then the easiest and most convenient way is to have undiluted and truest form of devotion for him, to love him from the deepest recesses of our hearts. If we do it, the Lord will not think twice before reciprocating our love for him, and he will be at our beck and call.

The Supreme Being is unconquerable, but the only thing that makes him subdued is love, affection and devotion. The Lord feels so obliged by the sage's love and affection for him that he messaged the latter's feet to give him comfort. Messaging or rubbing the feet of someone while he sleeps is regarded as an excellent form of personal service.

The importance of having love for Lord Ram as a means to please the Lord more than anything else has been asserted by Lord Shiva himself—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Doha no. 117-b.]

बार बार मुनि अग्या दीन्ही । रघुबर जाइ सयन तब कीन्ही ॥ ६ ॥

चापत चरन लखनु उर लाँ । सभय सप्रेम परम सचु पाँ ॥ ७ ॥

bāra bāra muni agyā dīnhī. raghubara jā'i sayana taba kīnhī. 6.
cāpata carana lakhanu ura lā'ēm̃. sabhaya saprēma parama sacu pā'ēm̃. 7.
puni puni prabhu kaha sōvahu tātā. paurhē dhari ura pada jalajātā. 8.

Raghubar (Lord Ram) went to sleep himself only after the sage (Vishwamitra) repeatedly asked him to do so<sup>1</sup>. (6)

When Lord Ram went to sleep, Laxman hesitantly held his legs close to his own bosom (“ura lā'ēm̃.”), caressing and messaging (“cāpata carana”) them most affectionately (“saprēma parama”) but with due care not to press them hard because he was afraid that it may cause discomfort to the Lord (“sabhaya sacu pā'ēm̃”).<sup>2</sup> (7)

The Lord repeatedly asked him (Laxman) to go and sleep (like sage Vishwamitra had done a while ago). Then Laxman lied down, still holding the Lord's holy feet and keeping them on his chest as he lay on the ground. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Normally, Lord Ram would obey what the sage told him even once, but this time he had to be told repeatedly to go and sleep, and the sage took no offence at this disobedience.

This is remarkable. It is because the sage realised that the two brothers were showing their greatest of respect to him by serving him personally, with great affection and with the greatest devotion.

Remember—the two brothers were princes of a great empire, and as such they were not ordinarily expected to serve a humble sage by messaging his legs like ordinary servants. The wise sage realised this, and felt overwhelmed with love for the two brothers instead of getting annoyed at them.

Not stopping to message his legs at the first request does not mean that Lord Ram or Laxman are being disobedient to him, the sage understood, but it only shows that they want to serve him more and ensure that he gets more comfort and feels more relaxed by the soft rubbing they are doing to his tired legs. They have all walked so long a distance, and the two brothers felt that the old sage must be very tired. Only a very devoted and faithful son or disciple or servant will have this sort of concern for his parent or teacher or master like the two brothers are now showing for the sage. They want to give him as much comfort as is possible for them even at the cost of their own weariness.

Remember: All of them had walked the same distance—right from Ayodhya to the sage's hermitage at Siddha-shram, and from there to Jankpur. If the sage was tired, so were the two brothers. Being princes who are accustomed to all sorts of physical comfort, the compassionate sage felt that if he does not tell Lord Ram to stop, and allows the brothers to continue messaging his legs, then they will not stop for the rest of the night in their enthusiasm for giving him maximum comfort and relaxation, and in the process they will not get any rest for themselves.

So, after sometime the sage asked them to go and retire for the night. But Lord Ram and Laxman wished to continue doing service to their Guru* and foster-father# as a token of their great respect and thanks for him. It was a noble gesture, having a noble intention, and meant to express the two brothers' gratitude and affection for the sage. So the sage loved this attitude and felt extremely obliged to them. {*The sage taught them the knowledge of weapons and warfare: refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 209 and its preceding Chaupai line nos. 7-8. #King Dasrath had told sage Vishwamitra that henceforth he was the ‘father’ of the two brothers at the time of handing over them to the sage at Ayodhya: refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 208.}

Since the wise sage realised their intentions, he did not become angry at them that inspite of his telling them to go and sleep so many times, they continued to massage his legs and did not obey him. The wise sage understood that the two brothers are affectionately messaging his legs as a means to serve him with great devotion and sincerity, and to give him personal comfort as much as it possible for them. He also realised that they are expressing their thanfulness and gratitude to him for the love, affection and devotion that he has extended to them just like they would have expected from their own father, king Dasrath, and not letting them feel for a second that they are with some unknown stranger.

Besides this, the sage understood that Lord Ram and Laxman are revering him as their Guru (teacher) because he had imparted to them the knowledge of weapons and warfare while they were on their way from Ayodhya to the hermitage of the sage, and as a devoted disciple they wish to express their thanks to him for teaching them the intricacies of warfare and the skills required in the use of weapons of all kinds, a knowledge that was very essential for princes and which they had not acquired till then.

Any master whom his servant serves with eagerness and sincerity will understand that the former is doing it because he is motivated by his emotions, faithfulness and call of duty befitting a true server who wishes to serve his lord or master to the best of his ability, ensuring that his master gets the best of service and comfort from him, and that no effort is left to please the lord or master. So he will never get annoyed if he finds that the servant is defying his orders while serving him personally.

The message in this incident is clear and sharp: While serving one's Guru or father (parent), there is no harm in doing some extra service even when it is not wanted or asked for, and that if one continues to personally serve the Guru or the father even when the latter asks him to stop and take rest or relax then there is no harm or wrong in continuing the service. This is because the intention is noble and good, and in such a situation the demerit of not obeying the Guru's or father's orders is offset by the immense merit that accumulates by devotedly serving them even beyond the call of formal duty and obligations.

There is one more point to note: When a son or disciple serves his father or Guru, as the case may be, beyond the call of his regular and formal duty, and with the greatest of sincerity and devotion, the father and the Guru feels emotionally overwhelmed by this service and silently blesses the son or the disciple respectively. This blessing is spontaneous and intense; it comes from the deepest recesses of the heart, and therefore its effect is very profound. It stands in sharp contrast to the blessing that is merely formal and more perfunctory in nature.

Indeed, the benefits that the two brothers would reap by this selfless and devoted service to the enlightened great sage who also happened to have become their Guru will be evident soon, the next day itself when Lord Ram will be rewarded by a world-wide fame when he breaks the bow in an assembly attended by all the great kings and princes of the time, especially when all who tried to lift it had failed to move it a fraction of an inch. Not only this, the Lord will get the hand of Sita in marriage, the prize which all the kings and princes of the world had longed for when they came to attend the bow-breaking ceremony.

The icing of the cake would be the marriage of all the brothers of Lord Ram at Janakpur. It will be a token of the sage's thanksgiving and showing his blessings not only for Lord Ram and Laxman alone who had personally served him but also for the whole family of king Dasrath—because for an old father like Dasrath, there is no greater happiness in his old age than seeing his four sons married with four beautiful brides from a family as reputed as his own.

<sup>2</sup>The attitude of Laxman exemplifies the highest level of devotion and love that a devotee must have for his Lord God. His gesture of holding Lord Ram's feet close to his heart indicates how much devotion and love and respect he has for them. A person clutches something close to his heart only if it very dear to him; it's a gesture of great affection for and emotional attachment with that thing.

Remember: It has been observed earlier that Laxman represents a Jiva, a living being, while Lord Ram symbolizes the Supreme Being. Hence, the message here is clear: a Jiva must have the greatest of reverence and devotion for the holy feet of the Supreme Being, and even while the Jiva sleeps he must hold the Lord's holy feet close to his heart.

Another point to note is that Laxman did not actually 'sleep' but only lied down for the rest of the night, and even then he kept the Lord's holy feet on his bosom. He was always vigilant to serve Lord Ram, and remained ever alert should the Lord want something or if some harm comes to him.

When the Lord noticed that Laxman is awake and has not fallen asleep—because though he lay on the ground he still clasped the Lord's feet and did not let them off, the Lord repeatedly asked him to let go of his legs, relax himself, and go to sleep. When one falls asleep, it is not practically possible for him to keep clasping something to his bosom with the same grip and vigilance as one does while he is awake. This alerted Lord Ram that Laxman has not gone to sleep because he continued to clasp the Lord's feet to his heart.

This dedication of Laxman for Lord Ram and the Lord's love for him is proved at many places in the story. For instance—(i) At the time of Lord Ram's going to exile, Laxman had clearly told him that as far as he is concerned, all relationships are centered on the Lord, and if the Lord decides to go to the forest for exile there is no reason why he (Laxman) should remain behind at Ayodhya. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, from Doha no. 71—to Doha no. 70. (ii) The mutual love between the two brothers is stunning and exemplary. The relationship between Laxman and Lord Ram was like that of the eye and the eyelid. For the body, eye is the most important organ because without it the world is dark; and for the eye the eyelid is the most important part because the latter is constantly alert to protect at all times. For Laxman, Lord Ram was like the 'eye', and Lord Ram cared for Laxman like the 'eyelid' cares for the eye. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 142. (iii) Laxman served Lord Ram most indulgently like a worldly man is eager to serve his gross body and gratify its urges. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 142. (iv) During the Great War at Lanka when Laxman fell unconscious by being hit with an arrow shot by Meghnad, Lord Ram had lamented gravely, saying that without him he will not like to live. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-10 that precedes Doha no. 61.(v) Even during the bow ceremony, when king Janak showed his exasperation by saying that the world has become empty of warriors when no one could break the bow, Laxman became very angry because this meant an insult for Lord Ram. He challenged Janak how he dared to say such a thing in the presence of the Lord, and vowed to turn the earth upside down where his kingdom stood. Refer:

Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 252—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 254.

During the forest exile, when Lord Ram retired for the night, Laxman used to massage and knead his tired legs to give them comfort. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, line no. 2 of Doha no. 89.

When Lord Ram and his consort Sita used to go to sleep, Laxman would spend the whole night standing guard to protect them. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 252

Laxman's affection for Lord Ram's holy feet has been lauded by Bharat—the third brother of the Lord who is depicted as a true and exemplary devotee who refused to accept the crown, and instead decided to spend the entire period of the Lord's forest exile living like a reclusive hermit himself away from the city of Ayodhya—in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 91.

Laxman kept vigil with an arrow and bow to protect Lord Ram at all times throughout his forest sojourn. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 11.]

दो०. उठे लखनु निसि बिगत सुनि अरुनसिखा धुनि कान ।

dōhā.

uṭhē lakhanu nisi bigata suni arunasikhā dhuni kāna.
gura tēm pahilēhim jagatapati jāgē rāmu sujāna. 226.

Early in the morning, even before sunrise, Laxman got up when he heard the cock crow<sup>1</sup>. Lord Ram, the Lord of the world (“Jagat-pati”) and a thorough gentleman who was very wise, knowledgable and intelligent (“Sujaan”), however woke up a little later but before the Guru (sage Vishwamitra) himself woke up<sup>2</sup>. (Doha no. 226)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 358 which endorses this point that the Lord woke up at dawn when the cock crowed.

<sup>2</sup>The sage had retired past midnight, and Lord Ram and Laxman still later because they had been serving the sage by messaging his feet. Then the two brothers got up very early; the sage got up before sunrise.

The sage was the first to go to sleep, and the last to wake up. Laxman was the last person to retire and the first to get up. And Lord Ram was the second person to go to sleep and also the second person to wake up.

The sequence tells us ordinary mortals the way we should lead our lives. The senior-most person retires first, while the most junior is the last one to touch bed. This apparently hierarchical structure where the senior-most person not only takes rest before others but is also served by his juniors till he gives them orders to retire is an exemplary example of a well-disciplined society where the elders are given their due respect and honourable place.

This is the law of Dharma—the proper way of treating elders. The teacher and elder should be allowed to take rest first and before his disciple or younger companion. And when the teacher or the elder is given his due share of respect, it is natural that his heart would brim with happiness which will translate into spontaneous blessing for the junior.

Remember: The crowing of the cock clearly indicates that the sage and his group were lodged somewhere in the city itself, because had it been somewhere outside at some place specially earmarked for the incoming guests the chances of the crow being heard at such remote place are almost nil. It will be noted just a little ahead from now that the two brothers had gone to the royal garden of king Janak to fetch flowers for sage Vishwamitra's worship rituals. This clearly means that the place where they were lodged was very near the royal palace.

Cocks are pet birds, and in ancient times when there were no alarm-clocks they were reared by people to act as Nature's living alarm-bells to tell them that dawn is fast approaching and it is time to get up and be ready for the day.

Cocks were present in inhabited areas such as villages, towns or cities. So therefore, this is the first time Laxman has heard it crow since he left Ayodhya with sage Valmiki. ]

After having attended to the routine call of Nature and undertaking all traditional acts of purification, they (Lord Ram and Laxman) took their baths. Then, after finishing their daily routine of offering prayers and formal worship etc. they went to the sage and bowed their heads before him with reverence<sup>1</sup>. (1)

[The sage needed flowers for his worship rituals. So—] When the time was right, the two brothers got permission from their Guru and took his leave to go out to fetch flowers (so that the sage can do his worship rituals)<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The daily morning routine of purification and worship involves ablutions and bath, offering of oblations, prayers and a bit of meditation.

Lord Ram always followed all the norms of Dharma. Even when he was a child or had grown up to reach the adolescent age, he used to go and bow respectfully to his parents after waking up every morning when he was at Ayodhya. After that, the Lord would seek his father's permission and attend to the affairs of the kingdom. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 205.

Following the same noble way of starting his day, he finished his routine personal chores and went to give his respects to sage Vishwamitra who for all practical purposes was his 'father' as well as a 'Guru'.

Later on in the story we shall read that at Chitrakoot, where Bharat had gone in an attempt to persuade Lord Ram to return to Ayodhya from the forest, a similar routine was followed—i.e. the entire assembly did their morning purification rituals and worshipped their respective gods, then Lord Ram went to meet his guru, sage Vasistha. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 290.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Ram and Laxman's trip to the royal garden where Sita had also gone to offer worship to the family deity, goddess Parvati, to seek her blessing for a groom most suitable for her, and the subsequent eye-to-eye contact between Sita and Lord Ram which led to the two developing mutual love for each other has also been beautifully described in Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse nos. 71—72.

On the face of it this is a simple, straightforward affair—when the sage was ready for his worship formalities, he signaled to the two brothers to go and fetch some flowers. But the phrase “when the time was right” has another mystical connotation to it.

It was the time when all those who do worship require flowers for offering to their deities. Sure enough, it is also the time when Sita would be going to the royal garden to offer her own worship in the royal temple situated there, and would naturally be plucking flowers to be offered to the deity. So, the hint is clear: Lord Ram—“the Lord of the world who was very intelligent and wise” (refer: line no. 2 of Doha no. 226 above)—knew that this is the correct and opportune time to give his divine Darshan (divine glimpse) to Sita to tell her that he has arrived.

Remember: Ram and Sita are not ordinary prince and princess, but Lord Vishnu and his divine consort Laxmi respectively. As we proceed with the story we will read that all the invited kings and princes had failed to move the bow a fraction of an inch, what to talk of lifting and breaking it. This means that Sita's future was doomed as she was to marry someone who could lift, string, and break the bow; this was the condition that her father, king Janak, had set for her marriage. When no one could do it, Janak lamented and said that it is written in Sita's destiny that she will remain unmarried throughout her life. Imagine the intensity of grief, dismay, depression and frustration that would have struck her like a bolt of lightening with this doomed dark fate.

Her only hope lay with Lord Ram—because she had learnt earlier from her friends that the Lord had killed many invincible demons and had provided liberation to Ahilya (sage Gautam's wife). Luckily for her, Lord Ram had yet not approached the bow. So Sita pinned her hope on the Lord.

Therefore, in this context, Lord Ram showing himself to Sita in the royal garden on the pretext of plucking flowers for the sage was a pre-planned affair of the “Lord of the world who was wise, knowledgeable and intelligent” to hint to Sita that she need not worry when everything would seem lost and doomed. The Lord who is famed as the remover of worries of his devotees is here, and if she really and sincerely develops ‘devotion, love, submission’ for him, if she ‘surrenders herself’ to him—then let her be carefree and assured that happiness is all of hers.

This is exactly what had happened. When Sita was submerged in an ocean of misery and gloom, touching the lowest point in her life, she had surrendered herself at the holy feet of Lord Ram and prayed fervently to the Lord, from the deepest recesses of her heart, to save her from a doomed destiny. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 257—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 259.

It was when the Lord realised that Sita's surrender was absolute and complete, and a slight delay would agonise her further, Lord Ram had instantly lifted and broken the bow with a thunderous roar. It was like a lightening from the sky that ruptured through the dark foreboding cloud of doom, dejection and despair that not only surrounded Sita like a thick fog but also the citizens of Janakpur as well as her parents. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 259—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 262 (Lord Ram saw Sita's consternation and extreme sense of misery and urgency, so he breaks the bow, and the people of Janakpur felt very happy); (ii) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 263 (Janak feels happy and all his grief vanished); (iii) Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 263 (Sita's extreme sense of relief and joy); (iv) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 265 (the jubilation amongst the Gods).

Remember: There are two planes at which we can interpret this story of Ram Charit Manas—one is the gross level of the visible world of matter, senses and material things, and the other plane is the invisible world having a spiritual and devotional dimension. The latter is possible only when we look deep into the hidden meaning of this story with an analytical mind and a penetrating intellect, when we peer behind the curtain as it were, to interpret and understand its profound subtle spiritual and devotional messages. It is the latter approach that will give real joy and contentedness in reading this book, for otherwise it will be rendered without its soul. If we do not see the spiritual and devotional quotient in Ram Charit Manas, and merely interpret events from the physical perspective, then we have missed the nectar and have just read another story like so many other versions of this epic known the world over as simply "Ramayana". It would be like being contented by merely enjoying the sight of the beauty and diversity of colourful flowers in a garden, but not being like the bee that actually drinks their nectar and derives nourishment as well as intense pleasure from these same flowers.

So, the worldly view of what happens next is straight and simple—a prince visits a garden where the princess has also come to pluck flowers. They see each other. It is love at first sight. They long for each other, but are frustrated by the girl's father's vows. Then fate smiles upon them, and eventually they are united in marriage. It's a fairy-tale ending.

On the other hand, the spiritual view is narrated above in the foregoing paragraphs of this note.]

They (Lord Ram and Laxman) went to see the royal garden which was in full bloom and most enchanting as if the spring season was there in its full glory<sup>1</sup>. (3)

[The following lines describe the garden and its beauty.]

There were many varieties of beautiful trees in the garden. Creepers of different colours and types hung over them in plentiful, forming thick canopies and sheltered areas. (4)

The trees were adorned with fresh leaves, fruits and flowers. Together they put to shame the grandeur and magnificence of the Tree of Gods. (5)

Birds such as Chatak (a special species of cuckoo that drinks only rain water), Cuckoo, Parrot and Chakor (Indian red-legged partridge) were chirping merrily everywhere, while the peacock danced happily<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When they went in search of flowers it is natural that they would go to a garden. Being princes it was also natural that they will visit a royal garden, a big garden. By this time every single citizen of Janakpur had come to recognize them. So the royal guards at the garden did not prevent them from entering.

We can also think in the terms of large public gardens which were maintained by state funds. But in this case it was the king's royal garden—because we shall see shortly that Sita, the daughter of king Janak, too comes here to pluck flowers and offer her worship in the royal shrine dedicated to the deity worshipped by the royal family.

It would obviously be out of bounds for ordinary people, but the guards were aware that Lord Ram and Laxman were special guests of the king because king Janak had personally gone and escorted sage Vishwamitra and his group into the city and lodged them near the royal palace. So they allowed the two brothers access to it.

Since it was a royal garden in the first place, and in the second place hundreds of visitors were expected to come to attend the bow ceremony—so obviously the garden was a matter of prestige for the king, and therefore it was taken special care of and excellently kept.

<sup>2</sup>Earlier it has already been said that it was as if the spring season was in its full glory in the garden.

The branches of the tree were bending under the weight of the creepers, fruits and flowers. The creepers were so dense and climbed from one tree to another that they formed a cover over the land beneath. There was greenery all round, and to add charm to the beauty of the garden there were birds of different species and families frolicking around.]

In the middle of the garden there was a wonderful pond whose steps were studded with gems and precious stones giving it a fabulous look. (7)

Its water was crystal clean with an abundance of lotus flowers of different colours. Water-birds were happily chirping loudly, and black-bees were buzzing around (the lotus flowers). (8)

[Note—A garden is incomplete without a central water-body. Here it was a pond with steps studded with precious stones. If there land birds in the garden then is naturally expected that there would be water birds in the pond. The water was clean, and the lotus flower is invariably regarded as a jewel of the pond. Wherever there is lotus there would be bees hovering over it in search of nectar. Though the water-birds are not mentioned here but we can visualize a host of such birds—ducks, swans, cranes etc.]

Watching the royal garden, Lord Ram felt exhilarated along with his brother. A garden that gives happiness and delight to Lord Ram must have indeed been exceptionally beautiful and charming as well as really worthy of praise and honour as a place that is immensely comfortable and pleasant (because it is not easy to charm the Lord of the world). (Doha no. 227)

[Note—There are a number of instances when we come across places which are regarded as exceptionally beautiful and charming so much so that they give contentedness to the mind and heart to the beholder. For instance—(i) the city of Janakpur had also enchanted Lord Ram and he had felt exhilarated at its beautiful sights—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 212; (ii) the site where Lord Ram had consecrated a Shiva's lingam before crossing the ocean to reach Lanka—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 2; (iii) the hermitage of the great sage Bharadwaj on the banks of river Ganges at Prayag—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 44; and (iv) Mt. Kailash which is the abode of Lord Shiva is also most charming and beautiful—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 105.]

(Since they were visiting the royal garden for the first time—) They (Lord Ram and Laxman) looked in all the directions to have a general view of the fascinating garden. Then they took consent of the gardeners and began plucking leaves and flowers with a cheerful mind<sup>1</sup>. (1)

At that time (when Lord Ram and Laxman were roaming in the garden, searching flowers of their choice, and plucking them), Sita came inside the garden. She was sent by her mother (Sunayina) to go and offer her worship to Girija* (Parvati, the divine consort of Lord Shiva).<sup>2</sup> (2)

She was accompanied by female friends (companions)# of her age who were pretty and intelligent. They were singing melodious songs suitable for the occasion.<sup>3</sup> [That is, they were singing devotional songs centered on the theme of requesting goddess Parvati to select a suitable groom for Sita and ensure her future welfare.] (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When anyone enters a new place it is natural for him to look in every direction and take in the general view of the scene. Besides this, the two brothers looked everywhere to decide from where to pluck the flowers which would suit sage Vishwamitra's purpose. After this decision, they searched out the gardeners and sought their permission, explaining to them that they need some flowers and leaves for the purpose of their Guru's worship rituals. Then the two brothers moved in a particular direction where the trees bore flowers of their liking.

It is not good to enter anybody's garden and haughtily start plucking this and that without as much as seeking a formal permission. So the Lord, inspite of being king Janak's special guest, observed etiquette and norms of decency by first requesting permission from the gardeners and then touching any tree.

The brothers felt cheerful because after leaving Ayodhya it was the first time that they have entered a royal garden. The beauty of the garden and its verdant scenery charmed their hearts. Another reason for them feeling happy was that on the excuse of plucking flowers of their choice they would get a chance to see the whole garden, because only after touring it fully can they know which flowers to choose. This will also give them an opportunity to go close to the royal shrine where king Janak's daughter Sita was about to arrive.

The question now arises: How could they guess that Sita would be coming for her worship rituals? Well, they were princes, and they knew the daily routine followed by royal families. Janak was a religious and pious man, and so his daughter is sure to have been taught to offer morning prayers to the family deity. She may be a bit late on other days, but today was a special day as the bow ceremony was scheduled during the day. She had to prepare for it, and clearly she could not afford to be late.

Another reason for the certainty of her coming today for worship in the garden-shrine of the royal family was that she must be very worried about her fate that would be decided today during the bow-breaking ceremony, and therefore would naturally seek the family deity's blessing for good to happen.

*The use of the word "Girija" for goddess Parvati is very remarkable here. Girija literally means 'the daughter of the Mountains'. Parvati was the daughter of the King of Mountains. Mountains, along with saints, trees, rivers and earth, are regarded as the ones who are dedicated to serving others, are always ready to suffer themselves so that others are happy, and are always eager to see that no one suffers because of them—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 125.

Prayers and worship are always done at a certain hour in the morning that is fixed for this purpose in the scriptures. That is why Lord Ram and Laxman were very sure that it is the best opportunity to see Sita and silently assure her that her saviour has arrived. In this context, please see note appended to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 227, as well as Chaupai line no. 1 that follows this Doha and is just above the present two verses.

Sita used to worship goddess Parvati daily at this time—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 234 where her companions tell her that she must hurry with her worship as they are getting late, and if she wants to spend some more time in the garden then she can do it the next day (i.e. ‘tomorrow’) when they will come here at the same time, obviously for worship of goddess Parvati.

In order to keep any kind of unwarranted, mischievous and scandalous gossip at bay, it is made clear here that it was Sita’s mother who had sent her to the garden to offer worship to Parvati at that hour. So no gossip-monger can now spread the scandalous word that Sita had been alerted by her personal spies that the two princes had gone to the garden, and therefore she actually went there to see the two brothers in private, and that offering of worship to the goddess was just an alibi.

<sup>3</sup>It is customary to offer special worship to goddess Parvati to seek her blessings by girls who are about to be married. Ordinarily, Sita’s companions would not have sung songs when she came to the shrine for routine worship rituals, but today was special—as today her fate was to be decided. So they were all singing devotional prayers dedicated to Parvati for Sita’s bright and happy future.

On this occasion the would-be bride requests goddess Parvati to bless her with a groom most suitable for her—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 228.

It was very important to pray to Parvati to please her and keep her in good humour—because the bow which was to be broken in the day was Lord Shiva’s, and thus no wrong signal should be sent out that the royal family of Janak was insulting Shiva. When Parvati, the divine consort of Shiva, is taken into confidence, and when the bride herself submits her future before the goddess and requests her to ensure her happiness in the best way the goddess thinks, then any chance of wrong interpretation of events is eliminated.

Mother Goddess Parvati is always very kind, generous and benevolent, and she herself being a female had experienced the fear of an uncertain future and its accompanying agony and worry that usually overwhelms an unmarried girl. So she is sure to empathise with Sita and understand her problems well. Therefore, Parvati would surely go out of her way to help the bride-to-be in the best possible way, even if that meant breaking of an old rusty bow of her husband Lord Shiva. After all, this bow had no practical use, and if its breaking can make Sita happy then Parvati was all for it. She would tackle her husband, Lord Shiva, if he shows any sign of annoyance at the breaking of his bow. This is one more reason why Sita was sent by her mother to offer prayers and please goddess Parvati.

#Sita had eight main companions who were her close friends as well. Their names have been given in Agastya Sanhita, Canto 49, verse nos. 5-28. They are the following—Chaarushila, Laxmana, Hema, Kshema, Varaarooha, Padmagandha, Sulochana, and Subhag.]

majjanu kari sara sakhinha samētā. ga'ī mudita mana gauri nikētā. 5.
pūjā kīnhi adhika anurāgā. nija anurūpa subhaga baru māgā. 6.

Close to the grand pond in the garden was the shrine dedicated to goddess Girijā (Parvati, the divine consort of Lord Shiva). It was so fabulous that it is not possible to describe its beauty and grandeur; it enchanted the mind and the heart of all those who looked at it<sup>1</sup>. (4)

She (Sita) bathed in the pond along with her female companions. After that, she went cheerfully to the abode (shrine) of Gauri (Goddess Parvati). (5)

She offered worship and prayers to the goddess with great faith, reverence and devotion, asking her to bless her with a handsome and nice groom who is most suitable for her<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A shrine is usually located near a water-body. It helps the worshipper to wash him or her self and complete other purifications rituals necessary for formal forms of worship that is offered to a temple deity. There are a number of instances in the Ram Charit Manas itself where this is reiterated—that a shrine is located near a pond or some sort of big water-body. References: (i) Kishkindha Kand, Doha no. 24 which says that when Lord Ram had sent the monkeys in all the directions in search of Sita, the group led by Angad that also included Hanuman, Lord Ram's trusted messenger, came to a garden where a hermitress was meditating in a shrine located on the bank of a beautiful pond. (ii) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 29 where it is said that all along the banks of river Saryu that flowed on the north of Ayodhya, there were many temples, and around them were beautiful gardens.

The deity that was established in the garden where Sita had gone to offer worship was Goddess Parvati, also known as 'Girija' because she is the daughter of the king of mountains. She is the divine consort of Lord Shiva, and the Mother Goddess of creation. This goddess is worshipped by all unmarried girls because it is believed that her blessings help her to secure a sound and happy future.

It is held in tradition that this temple was named 'Chintaamani'—one that removes worries. Sita was very worried about her future because it was tied to Lord Shiva's bow. Her father, king Janak, had declared that she would be married to anyone who would lift, string and break the bow. Now this meant that Sita had no say in choosing her life-partner; anyone who would break the bow would marry her, whether she liked it or not. This filled her with consternation and insecurity about her future and happiness.

<sup>2</sup>It is very important to worship any god or goddess with great devotion and faith if one expects his or her wishes are to be fulfilled. Sita's entire future was to be decided today during the bow ceremony. So she offered the best form of worship and the sincerest form of prayers to Goddess Parvati, requesting her to be pleased with her and bless her with a suitable and compatible groom. Sita had been regularly offering her worship and prayers in this temple for a long time ever since her childhood days, but today was special.

'Bathing' in the context of offering worship in the shrine does not mean either actually pouring water over the whole body as one does during regular bath, or taking a dip in the water of the pond. Bathing before entering a shrine to offer worship and prayer is simply an ablutionary process meant to formally clean oneself in a formal way. It is merely a formality that is observed by sprinkling water on the head and other parts of the body. Sita must have taken her regular bath inside the palace, so taking a 'bath' here before entering the shrine is merely a formal cleaning process done by just sprinkling a little amount of water on her self.

By 'taking a bath' it is implied external purification of the body, and entering the shrine 'cheerfully' implies internal cleansing because only when one is happy internally will he or she be cheerful.

Sita offered her worship and prayers to Goddess Parvati with great devotion, faith and reverence—and that is why, as we shall soon see, the goddess was pleased with her, blessing her that all her wishes would be fulfilled in the way she wants. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 as well as the Chanda that precede Doha no. 236 where the goddess has explicitly told Sita that she honours her wishes, and that she will get the groom she wants as foretold earlier by the celestial sage Narad whose words can never go in vain.

As we progress with our reading we will see that Sita and Lord Ram have seen each other in the garden in the intervening period of Sita completing her purification rituals and her actually entering the building of the temple to offer worship to the goddess. Both of them were enamoured with each other. The Lord's charm was of such an astounding dimension that Sita was swept off her feet, and she longed in her heart that she be married to Lord Ram. With this secret desire in her heart she offered her prayers to Goddess Parvati. Hence, the goddess' assurance that "she will get the groom she desires" assumes significance here—it clearly assured Sita that in spite of some difficult phase in the beginning, she will be finally married to Lord Ram.]

tēhiṁ dō'u bandhu bilōkē jā'ī. prēma bibasa sītā pahīṁ ā'ī. 8.

One of Sita's companions had left her while she was going to the goddess' shrine, and had instead gone in another direction to have a look at the royal garden. (7)

There somewhere close-by she chanced to see the two brothers (Lord Ram and Laxman who were in the garden plucking flowers for sage Vishwamitra's worship rituals). She eventually returned back to join Sita, but was overwhelmed with affection and love for the two brothers. (8)

[Note—As is common with young girls, one of Sita's companions had strayed away to have a quick look at the beautiful garden. Perhaps she was not a frequent visitor to the garden like Sita's other friends, so she wanted to make the most of the opportunity and quickly see the fascinating sight of a royal garden while Sita and others performed the worship. All other companions stayed with Sita. Since there were many of them, her absence was not noticed.

As luck would have it, she went in the direction where Lord Ram and Laxman were roaming around plucking flowers and leaves for the sage. This leads us to an intelligent guess—which is: that she was somehow aware that the two brothers were in the garden, and so silently slipped away to have a close glimpse of them. The sight she beheld was stunning—she saw the two beautiful princes walking majestically alone in the garden, smiling and talking with each other in hushed tones, plucking flowers, peering here and there to select the best ones. The sight she saw was a dream-come-true for her; every unmarried adolescent girl of her age would be swept off her feet if she happens to be in her place!

She then rushed back to join her other friends lest any delay would rouse suspicion. After all, Sita was a princess, and if someone complained to her mother, the queen, that such and such girl had been careless and had not attended Sita properly, then the consequences would not be pleasant for her. But the sight of Lord Ram and Laxman had done its magic nonetheless. Though she tried her best to hide her emotional condition, it was impossible for her to do so. Her nervous demeanours, a shy smile, and the thrill that her body experienced betrayed her mind that she was a smitten girl overcome with love and charm for an extremely handsome boy. This will be clear in the next Doha no. 228.]

All the companions of Sita saw her peculiar condition—she was extremely excited, her body was thrilled, and her eyes were welling-up with tears (of joy).

So, all of them surrounded her, asking her politely, using pleasant words and speaking in a low tone that she tell them the reason for her excitement. (Doha no. 228)

[Note—See note appended to verse nos. 7-8 herein above.

We will observe here that her excited condition was noticed by Sita's companions, and not by Sita herself. Well, Sita was too occupied with her mental prayers and worrying about her future to pay attention to which of her friends was doing what. She was concentrating upon her worship and meditating upon Goddess Parvati, muttering silent prayers.

Her companions, on the other hand, weren't so much worried. While Sita was involved in silent prayers, they were standing guard and generally enjoying themselves. They were happy that they would be witnessing a great ceremony today. So, when they found that one of them had come from a different part of the garden, suddenly becoming so overly excited, showing clear signs of someone falling head-over-heels in love, then it is natural that they would want to know the reason. They may have winked mischievously, wickedly smiling at each other, causing this fortunate girl, who had had a divine glimpse of Lord Ram, feel very embarrassed and abashed.

The friends spoke to this girl softly in a low tone so as not to disturb Sita. They were polite and used pleasant words so that this girl would open up; otherwise she could have even clammed shut.]

चौ०. देखन बागु कुअँर दुइ आए । बय किसोर सब भाँति सुहाए ॥ १ ॥

This girl reported—‘Two young princes have come to see the garden. They are of a young age, and pleasant in every possible manner. (1)

One of them is dark complexioned, and other is fair. How can I describe their charm and beauty properly—for the eyes which have seen them can't speak, and voice does not have eyes?’

[That is, the instrument of the body that has actually seen those two wonderful boys, i.e. the eye, can't speak, and the instrument that can actually speak and describe the sight of the two brothers, i.e. the voice, has not actually seen them. So both of them are not competent to describe correctly what I have witnessed.] (2)

[Note—This girl is very clever. She says that the two princes have come to ‘see the garden’ instead of saying that they have ‘come to pluck flowers’. A prince does not go around plucking flowers in some other's garden; hence this statement would have undermined the greatness and the glory of the two brothers. A prince visits a garden to have a causal morning walk in it; not to do such menial job as plucking flowers.

It is also possible that at the time when she saw the two brothers, they were not plucking flowers but merely taking a stroll through the garden. So this girl reported what she saw—‘two princes have come to visit the garden to see it’.

By saying that she cannot describe how bewitchingly beautiful the two brothers looked because the eyes can't speak and the voice can't see, she aroused great curiosity in the heart of others, including Sita, to go and see for themselves a sight that is so fascinating that it cannot be described.]

baranata chabi jaham'taham'saba lōgū. avasi dēkhi'ahim dēkhana jōgū. 6.

All the clever companions (of Sita) felt exhilarated upon hearing what this girl said. They perceived that this information created an intense longing in the heart of Sita (to see the two wonderful princes described by their friend).

[There is another way of interpreting this Chaupai as follows—“The clever companions of Sita heard the news that one of their friends had brought, and felt exhilarated when they observed that this news has also created an intense longing in the heart of Sita to see the two brothers herself.”]<sup>1</sup> (3)

(When Sita politely enquired about who these two princes were—) One of the companions said—‘Oh dear! They must be the two young princes about whom I have heard<sup>2</sup> that they have come yesterday with the sage (Vishwamitra). (4)

They have enchanted and captivated the heart and mind of all the citizens of the city, both the men as well as the women, by casting the net of their wonderful charm and magnetic personality on them. (5)

Indeed, all the men and women folk are talking here and there, everywhere, about the magnificence of their beautiful forms, and hence we must see them as they are worthy of seeing.<sup>3</sup> (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The companions of Sita are called ‘clever’ because they were intelligent enough to perceive even the subtle changes in the mood of the princess. They could observe her behaviour and correctly deduce what she wanted or was thinking about. They weren’t duds and so stupid that they wouldn’t understand emotional signs even if they were obvious. Sita’s parents had selected her companions carefully, and ensured that all of them were intelligent and witty.

So, when the girl who had ventured alone to have a quick look at the garden came back to describe the beauty of two princes and was herself wonderstruck by the sight she saw, it aroused natural curiosity in Sita to go and have a look herself. This is a natural thing with teen-aged boys and girls—when they hear that some handsome and attractive person has come, they would want to see him or her.

Besides this, Sita and others had already heard of the two princes—because when the two brothers went to see Janakpur the previous evening, the news of their fabulous magnetic personality and bewitching beauty had spread like wildfire in the city. So, when Sita heard that they have arrived in the garden, she longed to see them as she had missed the opportunity to see them earlier when they had gone to sight-see the city. This is because Sita’s movements, she being a princess, were restricted to the royal palace, while Lord Ram and Laxman had roamed in the city like commoners, never entering the precincts of the palace. She was eager to see them since yesterday evening, but couldn’t get a chance. Here was a wonderful opportunity, so she was excited about it.

If the news that there are two wonderful boys roaming in the garden had annoyed Sita for some reason, such as her getting angry at the gardeners as to why they had allowed outsiders to enter the royal garden when she was there when all outsiders were strictly prohibited, her companions would have behaved differently. They would have hushed the girl who brought the news, and would have escorted Sita quickly inside the temple building so that she did not actually see the two princes if by chance the latter came wandering in that direction. But as it happened, Sita's companions found that she was herself eager to see the two princes. This made them excited—because, for one, they would themselves get to see Lord Ram and Laxman at close quarters, and second, the girl who had strayed away from the group as well as the attendants of the garden would not be punished when the matter was reported by Sita to her mother, the queen.

If Sita hadn't taken this bit of information about the two unknown princes wandering in her garden, she could have severely punished the gardeners. She could have also punished the girl for leaving her attendance and going elsewhere when she was supposed to stay with her.

<sup>2</sup>The word 'heard' is significant here. It means that the friend of Sita who is speaking has not seen Lord Ram and Laxman personally when the two brothers had gone out to see the city of Janakpur the previous evening. This is because the group of girls who had accompanied Sita to the royal garden consisted of her close attendants who used to stay with Sita all the time in the palace. They didn't have the chance to see the two brothers like other women-folk of the city.

But nevertheless they all had heard of the two wonderful boys. So when one of them who had sneaked away surreptitiously to see if she can see them somewhere in the garden, because somehow the news had leaked that the princes had gone to the royal garden to pluck flowers, and was dumbstruck and smitten when she actually saw Lord Ram and Laxman roaming there, that when she returned to join her companions her demeanours convinced others in the group that the two boys about whom she was talking must surely be the ones about whom the entire city was abuzz. Her excitement and exhilaration were clinching evidence that Lord Ram and Laxman were indeed in the vicinity.

<sup>3</sup>Sita hadn't expressed her desire to see the two brothers in explicit terms, but the more intelligent among her companions had realised that secretly she does want to see the two young princes. To ascertain whether Sita had correctly guessed who the two princes were whom she wants to see, this wise friend cleared all doubts by saying that they were the ones who had come with sage Vishwamitra the previous day.

To remove any hesitation in the mind of Sita as to whether or not she should go and see them, this friend went a step ahead to comment that the entire city was talking of their charm and magnificence, and hence it is worthwhile to see them.

By saying that the charm of the two brothers have captivated the mind and heart of all the citizens of Janakpur, this clever friend also subtly defends her companion by implying that if the entire city is enthralled by the sight of the two princes then it is no wonder that this girl was also wonderstruck and swept off her feet when she saw the two brothers. It is not her fault, and therefore she should be excused.

Whatever doubts Sita may have had in her mind were removed by this positive assertion of her senior friends. Sita also realised that not only she but all her other companions too were very eager to have a glimpse of the princes. Therefore she was sure that the chances of anyone disclosing this secret encounter to the queen or any other member of the royal household were nil.

Everyone in the city has seen the two brothers, so there is no harm in their seeing them. This means that even if this secret viewing is reported to the queen, the companions would defend Sita together by asserting that they too had wanted to see the two princes, and that Sita was not alone when she saw them. In fact, they would say that it was on their insistence that Sita went to have a quick glimpse of the two brothers.]

तासु बचन अति सियहि सोहाने । दरस लागि लोचन अकुलाने ॥ ७ ॥
चली अग्र करि प्रिय सखि सोई । प्रीति पुरातन लखइ न कोई ॥ ८ ॥ tāsu bacana ati siyahi sōhānē. darasa lāgi lōcana akulānē. 7.

calī agra kari priya sakhi sō'ī. prīti purātana lakha'i na kō'ī. 8.

Sita liked her words very much (as she was herself interested and eager to view the two brothers). Her eyes became eager to have a 'Darshan' (a divine viewing) of the two brothers<sup>1</sup>. (7)

She made the friend (who had brought the news of the two brothers roaming in the garden) lead them<sup>2</sup>. No one could perceive or discern the eternal bond of affection and love that existed subtly between Sita and Lord Ram since time immemorial<sup>3</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The word "Darshan" has a divine and pure connotation. It means a holy viewing, a view of someone immaculate and divine. For instance we say we go to a temple to have a 'Darshan' of the deity installed there, or to have a 'Darshan' of some holy man. The use of the word precludes any kind of negative meaning or interpretation in viewing something or someone. Hence, Sita and her other companions had no pervert intention in feeling eager to have a divine glimpse of Lord Ram and Laxman. It was a call of the heart; it was the purest form of desire with no perversion and negativity attached to it as the world of today might take it to be because it is driven by a corrupt mind that is always inclined to see things in the wrong light.

The purity of Sita's desire to see Lord Ram will be clear in the paragraphs that follow.

<sup>2</sup>Obviously, the girl who had brought the news of Lord Ram and Laxman knew where they were in the garden and so she was told to lead others to that spot.

From the spiritual perspective we can say that someone who has witnessed the Lord or has experienced his presence is the only one who is competent to show the way to the Lord to the rest of the society. This is the importance of a true Guru (spiritual preceptor and guide) and the role that he plays.

<sup>3</sup>The world saw Sita as a princess of Janakpur, and Lord Ram as the prince of Ayodhya. The world—except the few enlightened sages and seers—did not realise that Lord Ram was Vishnu, the Supreme Being, incarnated, and Sita was Vishnu's divine consort known as Laxmi. At a higher and subtler level, Vishnu was none else but Brahm, the cosmic Consciousness, and Laxmi was his Shakti, his dynamic energy that looks after this creation and ensures its well-being and comfort.

Since Lord Vishnu had to come down to this mortal world to fulfill the desire of the Gods and eliminate the demons, some worldly way had to be devised to unite the Lord with his cosmic Shakti, i.e. with Laxmi who was now in the form of Sita. Hence, it was so planned and devised by the Creator that the two would meet and unite by way of marriage, the method prescribed for a life-time union between two individuals by the Creator himself. By adopting this method of union, the laws of creation as laid down by the Creator would be followed. Lord Vishnu is an upholder of the laws of Dharma, and therefore he must follow them himself in order to ask others in this world to obey them.

This eternal bond between Lord Vishnu and Laxmi is what is cited here when it is asserted that “no one could perceive or discern the eternal bond of affection and love that existed subtly between Sita and Lord Ram since time immemorial”.]

Sita recalled the words of Narad (the celestial sage), and this inspired love of the purest and the most innocent kind in her heart (for her eternal Lord Vishnu who had manifested in the form of Sri Ram). She began to look here and there in a stunned manner like a startled fawn. (Doha no. 229)

[Note—Sita suddenly realised that her eternal Lord Vishnu has come to meet her. She recalled the words of sage Narad when he had prophesised during her early childhood days that she will be meeting her future husband in the garden where the shrine of Goddess Parvati is located. So when one of her friends brought the news of Lord Ram and Laxman paying a visit to the garden on the eve of her marriage, Sita suddenly remembered Narad’s words and was convinced that the prince whom she is destined to marry is here in the garden—because Narad’s words can’t go in vain. She decided to see who he is.

She was stunned like a fawn because ever since she had entered the garden she was secretly but eagerly looking in every direction to have a glimpse of someone about whom sage Narad had foretold her, but couldn’t see anyone around. When her friend told her that the two wonderful princes were inside the garden, Sita was wonderstruck and looked carefully again if she had missed seeing them. She was understandably nervous and emotional, and her eyes and ears both stood on the edge to catch the slightest hint of the two princes’ presence nearby.

Her condition at that time is compared to a nervous fawn whose ears stand erect and eyes look anxiously here and there for the slightest sound or movement in the bushes or amongst the trees for an unexpected stranger who may be seeing it secretly. The similarity has an important parallel: like the fawn who is afraid of a hunter who might kill it secretly, Sita was anxious because the sight of Lord Ram would compel her to fall in love with the Lord and wish that she marry him but the stern vows of her father—that she would be married to anyone who breaks the bow—would kill her desires and future happiness.

Narad's words are never false—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 68; (ii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 236. So, when Sita remembered Narad's words she was convinced that her future husband is here in the garden, and this bit of prophesy motivated her to have a sneak view of who he is!]

Hearing the tinkling and chiming of small bells attached to the wrist-bands ('kaṅkana'; bangles), the waist-bands (kiṅkini) and the anklets (nūpura) worn by the maidens, Lord Ram thought over the matter in his heart and then said to Laxman—(1) 'It appears to me that Kamdeo (pronounced as "Kaamdeo"; also known as "madana"; Cupid: the god of love and passions) has sounded his kettle-drum (to announce to the world that love has made a firm presence in the heart of Lord Ram and Sita). He seems intent to conquer the world.' (2)

[Note—Earlier there was complete silence in the garden at the place where the two brothers were plucking flowers and leaves. Lord Ram and Laxman were concentrating upon picking flowers for their Guru's worship ritual. Suddenly this silence was disrupted by the chiming sound of small bells tied to the ornaments worn by Sita and her companions when they arrived at the site.

Lord Ram is of an adolescent age, and so when he heard this sound he immediately guessed that some young girls are near-by, because, being a prince, he was well aware of such sounds. He had been hearing such tinkling and chiming of small bells attached to bangles, waist-bands and anklets of female attendants of the royal palace at Ayodhya; the sound was not new to him. So he immediately correctly deduced that some young girls were in the vicinity.

When a group of love-struck young girls of an adolescent age go to secretly peep at two young and handsome boys roaming freely in a garden, it is natural that they would be excited, giggling, chuckling and chattering along in hushed tones. The general atmosphere that is being created here by this narration, especially with the background of a wonderful garden where young girls meet young boys, is that of love and passion. This is confirmed by the statement that Lord Ram told Laxman that it appears that Kamdeo / cupid, the God of love, passion, longing and attraction, has sounded the bugle to conquer the world.

Why 'conquer the world'? It is because Lord Ram is not an ordinary human prince but a human form of the Supreme Being himself. By endeavouring to conquer the heart of Lord Ram, Kamdeo is intent on conquering the world because the Sri Ram is the supreme Lord of the world. When a king gets ready for battle, his army sounds its war trumpet or bugle. Here, the sound of the tiny bells attached to the ornaments of Sita and her companions is compared to this war trumpet or bugle. Sita is the sovereign and is likened to Kamdeo cupid, and her army consists of the maidens who accompany her. They have set out to conquer the heart of the Lord of the world, i.e. Lord Ram. Hence, it is said that “Kamdeo / cupid has sounded the bugle to conquer the world”.

In spite of his reluctance to enter into any confrontation with Kamdeo / cupid, Lord Ram is forced to face the latter and his powerful forces as he is now alone in the garden, is yet to complete the task of collecting flowers for his Guru, and therefore can't leave the garden in a hurry to escape Kamdeo's assault. This is why it is said that “he thought over the matter in his heart”. The Lord was contemplating what to do.

Remember: the emotions of love, passions, longing and attraction, and the sentimentality attached to them, have their seat in the ‘heart’ and not the ‘mind’ where logic, wisdom and intellect have their seat.

This interaction between Lord Ram and Sita highlights the natural phenomena of development of love and passion in young persons. It's a part of Nature; it's an integral aspect of the process of creation. It helps the Creator to maintain the momentum of the cycle creation and development that he has set rolling.

Lord Ram's heart is as pure and incorruptible as the lotus flower. No amount of passionate enticements or worldly allurements can make him feel aroused or think perversely in any manner whatsoever. This is proved when he tells his younger brother Laxman what he thought of upon hearing the sound of the bells attached to the ornaments of the girls. Normally an elder brother would not discuss such emotional matters of the heart with his younger sibling; it is against norms of proper conduct and ethics. After all, Laxman was not Lord Ram's friend with whom such things can be shared.

The incorruptible nature of Lord Ram's character will be proved once again and settled once and for all a little later when he goes back to sage Vishwamitra and tells him everything that happened in the garden. Now well, can anyone imagine a young boy telling his elderly Guru that he has met some pretty young girls secretly in a secluded place in a garden, and that he was bitten by the love-bug? That Lord Ram did this establishes beyond doubt that the Lord was above and beyond such lowly thoughts, that his character could not be sullied by worldly muck, and that he was merely acting out his role as a human being though internally his mind and heart were neutral as they were expected to be from the Supreme Being. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precedes Doha no. 237.

It ought to be noted here that the god of love and passion, Kamdeo or cupid, is known as ‘Madan’ as his seat is in the Mana, the heart, of a creature, which also is the seat of his emotions and sentiments.]

अस कहि फिरि चितए तेहि ओरा । सिय मुख ससि भए नयन चकोरा ॥ ३ ॥
भए बिलोचन चारु अचंचल । मनहुँ सकुचि निमि तजे दिगंचल ॥ ४ ॥

asa kahi phiri cita'ē tēhi ōrā. siya mukha sasi bha'ē nayana cakōrā. 3.
bha'ē bilōcana cāru acāñcala. manahum' sakuci nimi tajē digāñcala. 4.

Saying this (to Laxman), he (Lord Ram) looked in the direction from where the sound of tinkling came. As soon as he saw the face of Sita, his eyes behaved like the famous bird known as Chakor that gazes at the full moon without blinking<sup>1</sup>. (3)

His enchanted eyes became immobile (i.e. they were fixed on the face of Sita) as if Nimi (the god who controls blinking of the eyelids) has left the eyelids out of shyness<sup>2</sup>. (4)*

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Here, Sita's beautiful face is compared to the full moon, and Lord Ram's eyes to the bird Chakor, the Indian red-legged partridge. This bird is famous for its love for the moon. As soon as the full moon rises on the horizon, the Chakor starts staring at it unblinkingly. It fixes its gaze on the moon's disc with such concentration that as the moon travels across the sky the bird also tilts its head accordingly so as to ensure that it continues to gaze at the moon.

A Chakor looks at the moon, and not vice versa. It means that it was Lord Ram who was staring at Sita's face, and not the other way round. This is in accordance to the norms of proper conduct and ethical behaviour in society whereby a girl is not expected to stare at the face of boys or any male for that matter, even if he is related to her, during their first meeting. Sita would glance at Sri Ram's face, but it would be a quick look and not a stare. A little later, however, she would gather enough courage to have a full view of the handsome face of the Lord. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that precede Doha no. 232; and (ii) Doha no. 234 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 3.

<sup>2</sup>A person's eyelids have a natural tendency to blink at regular intervals, but when one is highly astonished at a sight his eyes stop blinking; he begins to stare at the object. When Lord Ram saw the beautiful face of Sita, his eyes were so fixed on it that for a few moments they did not blink. This is a poetic way of saying that the Lord was struck by the bewitching beauty of Sita's face and momentarily he forgot about everything else. He was dazed and dumbstruck, becoming immobile and speechless. The same thing has happened with Sita a little later. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-7 that precede Doha no. 232.

*A very important thing is to be observed during this interaction between Lord Ram and Sita in the garden. When the Lord looks at Sita, she is not looking back at him directly in the eye, and when she looks at the Lord he is not staring back at her in the eye. They look at each other's faces, but not directly in the eye. This implies that principles of good manners and proper conduct are being observed by them: a girl and a boy who are strangers are not expected to stare each other in the eye and make direct eye contact. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 230—to Doha no. 231 which describe how Lord Ram conducted himself, and from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 232—to Doha no. 234 which describe Sita's conduct.

It is only after they are married that they look directly at each other—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, line no. 3 of Chanda stanza no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 323.]

He (Lord Ram) felt contented and happy when he saw the magnificent beauty of Sita. He praised it silently in his heart but was so dumbfounded that he could not find words to express his wonder and describe it or praise it in specific terms. (5)

It appeared that the creator Brahma has moulded the fabulous image of Sita to show the world his entire expertise at craftsmanship, of how beautifully and expertly he can create. (6)

[Note—Lord Ram’s only companion here is Laxman. So though the Lord wants to say something to him about Sita’s beauty, he is so stunned that words elude him and he could not speak for some moments.

Brahma is the creator of the world as well as Nature with its fascinating array of beautiful and awe-inspiring wonderful sights. Sita looks so fabulously beautiful that it appears that the Creator has taken great trouble and time to give shape to her beautiful form as a sample of his expertise as an expert artisan or craftsman. Brahma has demonstrated to the world how wonderfully he can create, and has put on display his skillful art of creation of beautiful forms at their best.

It has already been said that Lord Ram’s eyes have transformed themselves into a Chakor, and Sita’s face is like the full moon. Just like the Chakor deriving immense satisfaction by looking at the disc of the full moon, Sri Ram too derived immense satisfaction by looking at the face of Sita.]

saba upamā kabi rahē juṭhārī. kēhiṁ paṭataraum̐ bidēhakumārī. 8.

She (Sita) lends the virtue of ‘beauty’ its inherent quality of being beautiful. It is like the case of the flame of wonderful lamp lighting the house of magnificence and beauty. (7)

The similes that the poets usually use to describe such virtues as beauty, magnificence and glamour have become stale and outdated. So say with what should I compare the daughter of Videha (i.e. Sita) with? (8)

[Note—A lamp looks beautiful when its flame burns brightly without giving any smoke or depositing any soot. Sita’s face is spotless and radiant like this lamp and its brilliant light. ‘Beauty’ is a subtle quality that makes things look ‘beautiful’ by the virtue of its presence in them. Sita’s ‘beauty’ is this quality that is pure and wholesome. Whatever comes in contact with Sita, whatever is associated with Sita would become ‘beautiful’.

Sita is surrounded by many girls of her age and beauty. She is in the center of the group. Hence, the metaphor of the flame lighting the house of beauty is used to describe this scene: the beautiful companions surrounding Sita are likened to the walls of a magnificent house, while Sita herself is compared to the brilliant flame of a magnificent lamp burning in the center of this house. It is the lighted lamp that gives light to the otherwise dark walls of the house. If the lamp was not lighted and there was darkness, no one would be able to see how beautiful the house is. The credit of making the house look beautiful goes to the light of the lamp. The centrally placed lamp cannot miss attention even if one does not pay careful attention to finer details of the house. So is the case with Sita here: she stands out amongst all the girls in the group because of her unique charm and beauty though all of the girls accompanying her are beautiful in their own right.

Since all metaphors and similes have already been used by poets and bards on one or the other occasion they are deemed to be stale and outdated. Tulsidas says that even Lord Ram failed to find something new with which to compare the beauty of Sita with. A similar idea is expressed a little later in Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 247 when an attempt is being made to give an idea of how wonderful Sita looks as she comes to the venue of the marriage ceremony to get married to Lord Ram.]

siya sōbhā hiyaṁ̐ barani prabhu āpani dasā bicāri.
bōlē suci mana anuja sana bacana samaya anuhāri. 230.

Describing to himself the prettiness of Sita and reflecting on his own condition, Lord Ram spoke to his younger brother (Laxman) words that were appropriate to the occasion, and were spoken with an innocent heart that was free from any sort of impure thoughts. (Doha no. 230)

[Note—This Doha is significant in the sense that it removes, in one stroke, any chance of the reader harbouring any sort of doubt about Lord Ram's character and innocence because the situation is such that it may breed reservations about the immaculate nature of the character of both the brothers. It is a lovely garden; a young boy meets a young girl, and both are smitten by each other. But this attraction is not of a worldly plain but of a divine nature. There is no pervert thought in the mind of any of the characters—neither of Sita nor of Lord Ram.

Remember: True love is always free from passions and lust; it is pure nectar effusing from the lotus-like heart, and is not a fermented liquid that produces hallucinations and delusions. It's a vibration of the heart, and two souls get attracted towards each other only when this vibration matches, and not otherwise. To draw a parallel with ordinary life as we know it, a radio receiver can tune into a particular broadcasting station only when it is tuned correctly to it, and not otherwise. Hence, when two souls whose frequency match each other meet, they are said to fall in love with each other, which in simple terms mean that the vibrations of their heart have matched. We meet thousands of people in our lives, but do we truly fall in love with them in an honest manner?

Lord Ram is not an ordinary mortal but Lord Vishnu, and Sita is his eternal divine consort, Goddess Laxmi.

Lord Ram's innocence is proved by his sharing his thoughts with his younger brother. Think of this: would he have done so had some evil element crept in his mind and heart? One does not share one's vile and evil thoughts with his younger brother.

Lord Ram could have kept quiet and hidden everything from Laxman. But that would have given the naughty world ever on the lookout for some opportunity to cast aspersions on other people's character a chance to murmur doubts that the Lord is harbouring some wrong thoughts in his heart and mind. So he decided to come clean and divulge his thoughts directly to Laxman to keep the gossip-mongers at bay.

We shall read below in the following Chaupais that Lord Ram has himself confided to Laxman his emotional condition after he has seen Sita's transcendental beauty. The Lord wonders why it is so, for he himself does not know how his heart, which is supposed to be calm and neutral and dispassionate and unmoving, has suddenly become so nervous and agitated. The answer lies in the explanations given in the foregoing paragraphs of this note.]

pūjana gauri sakhī'm lai ā'īm. karata prakāsu phira'i phulavā'īm. 2.

Lord Ram told Laxman—'Dear brother, this is the daughter of king Janak. It is because of her that the bow-breaking ceremony is being held. (1)

Her female friends have brought her to offer worship to Goddess Gauri (Parvati, the divine consort of Lord Shiva)<sup>1*</sup>. She# is moving in the garden, illuminating<sup>2</sup> it with her presence. (2)

[Verse no. 2 can be read as follows also: *She (Sita) has come here to offer worship to Goddess Gauri, and she has brought along her female friends with her. #They are roaming in the garden, illuminating it with their charm and beauty.]

[Note—Earlier we have read in Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 229 that Sita was told of the presence of the two brothers by her friends. Now, it is Sri Ram telling Laxman about her.

A remarkable point is to be noted here: One of the friends of Sita had told her that she has heard about the two princes who have come with sage Vishwamitra and who have charmed the entire city of Janakpur by their presence. There were thousands of invited kings and princes who had assembled at Janakpur to participate in the bow ceremony, but none of them could catch the attention of the people of Janakpur, let alone captivate their hearts and minds as Lord Ram and Laxman had done. So they were special. Now, Sita's beauty is so unique and matchless that it has caught the imagination of Lord Ram, and she stands out in the group of young girls of her age who are all beautiful. It is a royal garden, and a princess is not an ordinary girl of the city. It was a royal garden, and the shrine of the Goddess was the royal family's personal place of worship. To this was added the aura of royalty, majesty and grandeur surrounding Sita that marked her out distinctively, and it was not difficult for Lord Ram to correctly guess who she is.

Ram had roamed in the city and had seen the venue of the bow ceremony himself. He must also have heard the echo of the people talking with each other that he is the proper groom for Sita, and that they all hoped that this union is made. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 222—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 223. Therefore it is obvious for Lord Ram that the girl who is the center of attention is no one else but princess Sita.

<sup>1</sup>The place of meeting is in the vicinity of the temple of the Goddess. It is customary that a girl worships Goddess Parvati on the eve of her marriage, praying to the goddess for a groom who is most suitable for her. Sita and her companions were holding in their hands all things necessary for offering worship in a temple, so it was not difficult for Lord Ram to guess that Sita has come to the temple to worship Parvati, especially in the background of the forthcoming bow-breaking ceremony which was to be held soon.

<sup>2</sup>“Illuminating the garden with her presence”—It has been said earlier (Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 230) that Sita was like a flame that illuminates the house of beauty. So this statement of Lord Ram sort of endorses it. The royal garden is beautiful in its own right, but Sita’s presence added glamour and magnificence to it.]

जासु बिलोकि अलौकिक सोभा । सहज पुनीत मोर मनु छोभा ॥ ३ ॥
सो सबु कारन जान बिधाता । फरकहिं सुभद अंग सुनु भ्राता ॥ ४ ॥ jāsu bilōki alaukika sōbhā. sahaja punīta mōra manu chōbhā. 3.

sō sabu kārana jāna bidhātā. pharakahim subhada aṅga sunu bhrātā. 4.

By seeing her transcendental beauty<sup>1</sup>, my Mana (heart and mind), which is always calm, pure and incorruptible, has become restless. (3)

Oh brother, listen<sup>2</sup>! Only God can know the reason, but my right limbs are fluttering, and this portends some good in the future<sup>3</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Sita’s beauty is not ordinary. Had it been so it would not have had any effect on Lord Ram who is the transcendental Lord of creation in a manifested form. Surely therefore Sita’s beauty must also have a transcendental dimension to it in order to move the Mana (mind and heart) of the Lord of creation. A weak magnet cannot pull a stronger magnet to itself; both Ram and Sita are equally powerful because whereas Ram is an incarnation of Lord Vishnu, Sita is a manifested form of Laxmi, Vishnu’s divine consort.

Who can match Laxmi in physical beauty as it is she who has also revealed herself in the form of Mother Nature which is so fantastically pretty, grand and fabulous that poets and artists have been attempting to depict Nature’s magnificence and stupendous beauty ever since the dawn of civilization but have yet to find a satisfactory description.

<sup>2</sup>Laxman kept quiet without showing any reaction while Lord Ram was telling him how he felt. So the Lord wondered whether or not he was paying attention to him. So he said “listen brother; pay attention to me”.

<sup>3</sup>It is traditionally believed that if the organs of a man’s right side of the body, such as his eyelids, hands and legs, begin to flutter then it is a sign of some good future for him. In the case of a woman, it is the opposite side of the body, i.e. her left side that bears the same meaning. It is an omen.

So, inspite of Lord Ram’s heart becoming restless, the fluttering of the right side of his body indicated to him that something good is about to happen in the near future. When we put two and two together, like Ram’s heart and mind being enamoured and beguiled at the first sight of Sita and he being attracted to her, his Mana becoming restless and his right organs fluttering at the same time, the omen becomes clear: that the chances of Ram and Sita coming together permanently are quite good.

He also means that worldly beauty that is only superficial in nature would have no effect on him. But the beauty of Sita has a transcendental dimension; it goes deeper than merely being exterior. Lord Ram’s Mana, which is inherently and eternally neutral and calm, does not get easily disturbed, and if it has got restless then there must be something sublime and subtle, something serious to make this happen. That his Mana has become restless by the mere sight of Sita signifies that there is more to it than what meets the eye because Lord Ram has full control over his Mana, and is strong willed. This translates to the conclusion that Sita’s relationship with Lord Ram is eternal, existing since time immemorial, and it has a sublime and transcendental dimension to it. Hitherto it was concealed, but now it has come out in the open. It is like the case of a seed concealing a giant tree within its own self, and when the time comes the tree sprouts and grows to make itself visible to the world.]

mōhi atisaya pratīti mana kērī. jēhim sapanēhum' paranāri na hērī. 6.

It is a natural noble trait of all the members of king Raghu’s dynasty that they never allow their Mana (heart and mind) to step on any evil path (i.e. they never allow wrong and impure thoughts to enter and pollute their mind and heart)<sup>1</sup>. (5)

As far as I am concerned, I am so confident about my Mana that it has never allowed itself to ever set its eye on or think about someone else’s wife<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To think of another woman who is not related to one in any manner is deemed a wrong thought for the mind, and it is a worse thing to get attracted to her, praise her beauty and feel emotionally upset at her sight. It is not a good character in a man. This is why Ram is giving this clarification to remove any doubts in the mind of Laxman that his elder brother is transgressing limits of proper conduct.

Members of king Raghu's race are so careful so as not to even think of a wrong path, let alone walking on it. So it is out of the question that Ram, who also belongs to this noble race of kings, would ever imagine of doing it.

<sup>2</sup>Sri Ram goes further to assert that he is especially very diligent in exercising control over his Mana. And therefore there surely must be something very serious and beyond explanation, something that is hidden from view and is transcendental that has made him restless and loose control over his Mana. That is why he has said earlier that "only God knows the reason" because he is unable to find any plausible reason for his emotional condition.

Sri Ram had to make this clear because just now he has told Laxman that his heart and mind seem to be upset and agitated at the sight of Sita, and if he did not clarify and elaborate it would be easy to cast aspersions on his immaculate character and pure heart.

Sita's future husband is yet not decided, and for all practical purposes she is like a complete stranger for Ram at this moment. Eyeing a woman who may be married to someone else during the day is obviously a wrong thing to do. Lord Ram belongs to a noble race of kings who were very careful in their thoughts and conduct. So it is unimaginable for him to allow pervert thoughts to enter his mind. That is why he wonders why this is happening; why he is so attracted to Sita.]

जिन्ह कै लहहिं न रिपु रन पीठी । नहिं पावहिं परतिय मनु डीठी ॥ ७ ॥

It is rare to find a noble man in this world who would never turn his back on the enemy during a battle (and run away from the battle-field), who never gives his heart to another woman who is not his wife, or even cast any sort of amorous glances at her or harbour any lust for her, and from whom no beggar (or alms seeker) gets a rebuke (and turned away without getting anything).’ (7-8)

[Note—It ought to be noted while reading this book titled “Ram Charit Manas” that besides telling the story of Lord Ram, his time and the deeds done by him, this book incorporates in its texture great principles of noble conduct, polity, behavioural science, spirituality, metaphysics, theology and the like.

In these two lines we see three outstanding characters of noble men: (i) They are brave and full of courage and valour; they would not show cowardice in the face of the enemy by running away from the battle-field. This is a prime character of a warrior. (ii) They will not develop extra-marital relationships; this ensures maintenance of ethics and morality in the society. If the parent is pervert and lustful, the children of the society can't be expected to lead a moral life. (iii) They will always ensure that if anyone comes to them seeking help and alms then they will do their best to help the seeker. Setting aside some part of one's income for charitable purposes and helping those who are less fortunate is a moral duty ordained by all religions.

Now, what Ram means here is this: He belongs to a highly respected noble race of kings, known as the Raghu Dynasty. Their characteristic has already been mentioned—that they never step on a wrong path and they never harbour any amorous designs on other women. So how it is ever possible that he (Ram) would violate this well honoured and hoary tradition of his ancestors?

In spite of these restrictions, he has developed some sort of attraction for Sita. Why is it so? This tricky question is answered in a very interesting way in these two lines. Let us now examine how.

Lord Ram says that such noble men do not run away from the enemy, and they do not turn away someone who begs something from them. Now, here is the interesting part:--

(i) Firstly, Kamdeo (cupid) has arrived in the form of Sita to attack Lord Ram, to overcome his control over his self, so the Lord simply can't run away from this assault! That would be ignoble for him. So he decided to face Kamdeo cupid. That is why he did not turn away from Sita and went back to sage Vishwamitra as long as she was in the garden in his vicinity. Not facing Sita boldly and trying to avoid her would be tantamount to being defeated by Kamdeo (cupid), the patron God of love, passion, longing, desire and attraction. How can Lord Ram allow himself to be defeated by the onslaught of Kamdeo (cupid) in such a silly manner?

(ii) Secondly, Kamdeo (cupid) may have come to beg with the Lord to spare Sita the agony and misery of an uncertain future with a man she may not like. So, should the Lord deny Kamdeo (cupid) this request? Well, this is also unacceptable for a noble man of his stature; he can't turn away Kamdeo (cupid) without fulfilling his desires. So what options does the Lord have now? Obviously none—except to silently assure Kamdeo (cupid) that the Lord would be obliging him soon irrespective of whether it may cast some taint on his otherwise immaculate character. When one faces a piquant situation where both the options are bad, he must choose the better of the two. In this case it is better to accept some mischievous gossip about his character than to face the ignominy of having turned down the request of an alms-seeker in the form of Kamdeo (cupid).

This is the reason why Lord Ram apparently allows himself to get attracted to Sita at a subtle plain though he himself says that he wonders why this is happening at the grosser level of physical interaction in this world.

The three noble characters listed here pertain to the three higher sections or communities in the society—viz. the Brahmins, the Kshatriyas and the Vaishyas. Not to have lust for other's woman is a noble character of a Brahmin; not to run away from an enemy is the noble character of a Kshatriya (the warrior class); and to give charity and never turn away alms-seekers are a noble character of a Vaishya (the member of the trading community).]

While Lord Ram was talking in this manner with his younger brother, his mind however was enamoured and beguiled by the beauty of Sita as it literally drank the nectar of her beauty just like a bee. (Doha no. 231)

[Note—A bee’s attention is fixed on obtaining the nectar of the flower though it may hover over the flower and also wander around it for quite some time before actually alighting on it and sucking the nectar. Similarly here, though Sri Ram is talking to Laxman, his mind is fixed on Sita. This Doha concludes what has been said in the preceding verses.

However, it is remarkable that during this entire narration we find that Laxman has not uttered a single word; he has silently heard whatever his elder brother has said. Laxman did not wish to disturb Ram’s emotional enjoyment and the sentimental reverie he was in. Laxman was wise enough to understand this and the practical thing that everyone should be given his personal space. A true friend and companion is one who gives a person full freedom to express his inner thoughts without fear of betrayal and being misunderstood. Laxman passed this test in flying colours.

In the next set of verses we shall be reading about Sita’s condition and responses.]

चौ०. चितवति चकित चहूँ दिसि सीता । कहूँ गए नृपकिसोर मनु चिंता ॥ १ ॥

jahamṁ bilōka mṛga sāvaka nainī. janu tahamṁ barisa kamala sita śrēnī. 2.

Sita looked with amazement in every direction, for she could not see the two princes anywhere. He Mana (mind and heart) was at a loss as to where they have gone<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Wherever Sita, whose eyes were like that of a fawn, cast her glances it appeared that a stream of white lotus flowers<sup>2</sup> is flowing in that direction. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Ram and Laxman had kept on walking in the garden because their primary job was to pluck flowers for the worshipping rituals that their Guru, sage Vishwamitra, was to perform. So it happened that they went behind a thick cover of foliage and creepers where Sita could not view them from where she stood. So she peered here and there, in every direction anxiously, but could not have a glimpse of the princes. This made her uneasy. She wondered that they could not so quickly vanish from sight, so where have they gone? That is why she was amazed.

<sup>2</sup>There are three primary Gunas (qualities) in this creation: viz. (i) the Sata Guna which is the best of the three, is noble and virtuous, is marked by purity of mind and heart, and has white as its dominant colour; (ii) the Raja Guna which is the second quality, is concerned with creation and its upkeep and all the necessary characters needed to fulfill this obligation, and has red as its characteristic colour; and (iii) the Tama Guna which is the lowest and the meanest of the three, leads to moral degradation, decay and destruction, and is therefore dominated by the black colour, the colour of darkness and delusions.

By saying that wherever Sita glanced it appeared that “white lotus flowers are flowing”, it is implied that her mind was not corrupt, and that there was no trace of lust or amorous intentions in her glances. As has been noted earlier in our discussion, the sense of mutual attraction between Ram and Sita had a divine connotation and a transcendental dimension to it. It is just like the case of an eager disciple being attracted to a true Guru (moral preceptor); when they meet they are mutually attracted to each other.

Why is it said that a “stream” of white lotus flowers is flowing instead of citing a single lotus? The reason is that when Sita looks in a particular direction, all her companions also begin to look there. So it’s not one but many girls looking in a particular direction like a stream flowing in that way. And since all of them have a pure heart, the looking is also symbolized by the metaphor of white lotus flowers which stand for purity of thought and intention.

Further, the conjunctiva of the eye is white in colour, so when all the maidens were looking in the same direction, the poet imagines that a stream of white lotus flowers is flowing that way.]

Her (Sita's) companions then pointed out to her the two brothers, one of a dark and the other of a fair complexion, standing behind a thick bevy of creepers. (3)

Seeing the wonderful sight (of the two princes), her eyes looked at them so eagerly and longingly as if she has found her wealth, that is dearest to her heart, lying nearby. (4)

[Note—Tulsidas, the poet-author who has penned this immortal epic “Ram Charit Manas” is at his best, in his finest writing mettle and poetic form while describing this scene in the garden where Sita meets Lord Ram. Aside of the devotional and spiritual quotient, this narration also incorporates the ‘love angle’ of the epic story.

Here we have two souls destined to be each other's partner for life meeting one another for the first time before their partnership is formalized. The world would like to call them as being bitten by the ‘love bug’, but it is the pull of the divine Spirit living inside their bosom, the compatibility of the vibrations of their individual hearts that begins to resonate in such a way that makes it appear that the two individuals are mutually attracted to each other. If this vibration does not match, mere physical closeness would not produce true love and abiding affection.

It was Sita's companion who first spotted the two princes behind the curtain of creepers. Sita was very nervous, so she could not see them herself. Here we observe that Lord Ram did not stand in the open space of the garden but was seen behind creepers. This shows that he did not want to violate laws of moral conduct and royal etiquette by standing shamelessly in front of a princess. Had he done so, it would have been in bad taste.

Further, the Lord wished to ascertain whether Sita was really eager to have his Darshan (divine viewing), or would turn away after a casual look around. By being behind the creepers, he also maintained a sort of decorum whereby Sita was given an opportunity to have a look at the two brothers as if she was viewing them from behind a virtual curtain. It would be decent and look civilized.

The relationship between Lord Ram and Sita is of an eternal nature and most ancient. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, 2nd half of Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 229.

Ever since Lord Vishnu took birth as Lord Ram, his divine consort Laxmi in the physical form of Sita was forced to remain away from him. That is why it is said that “she recognized her Lord like a person recognizing his long-lost wealth that is very dear to him”. Refer also: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 248.]

The eyes of Sita became motionless, as if transfixed, as she watched the bewitching beauty of the image of Raghupati (Lord Ram, the chief of the Raghu dynasty). For quite some time her eyelids forgot to blink. (5)

Due to a surge of great affection that overwhelmed her entire being, she lost consciousness of her body just like the bird Chakor loses awareness of its physical existence when it starts gazing at the beauty of the full moon’s disc during an autumn night. (6)

[Note—Sita is overwhelmed by the divine and transcendental beauty of Lord Ram’s face. Her condition is compared to the Chakor, the Indian red-legged partridge, which is renowned for its love of the full moon. Chakor gazes at the moon’s disc without blinking, and it goes on tilting its head so that its eyes remain focused on the moon as it traverses across the sky. It is believed that the moon looks its best during the whole year in the first full-moon night of autumn.

Sita was virtually dazed by the Lord’s charming image, and for some time her mind lost awareness of its surroundings. This is a natural phenomenon, a natural reaction of the body when one is absolutely stunned by the sight one sees.

Earlier, this condition was applicable for Lord Ram: refer—Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that precedes Doha no. 230.

Sita’s eyes became “motionless as if tired” because it could not cope with the profundity of the beauty of Lord Ram’s image. Her eyes continued to look at the Lord without blinking, making them tired and droop. Sita did not wish to miss even a fraction of a second without watching this beautiful image for the fear of losing it the moment her eyes take rest to blink. This continuous staring tired her eyes so much so that they drooped and looked heavy.

There is an interesting interpretation of this line. Sita’s attention was transfixed on the face of Lord Ram, and she was so dazed by its magnificent beauty that she did not look at any other part of his body. The moon always shines during the night; Lord Ram’s complexion is also dark but radiant like the night that is drenched in the light of the moon during an autumnal night. The whole environment is sentimentally charged during such full-moon nights, but a person looks up at the moon rather than the surrounding sky if he wishes to enjoy the beauty of the night and the moon-light. While looking at the full moon, a person will not look at any other heavenly body no matter how interesting or attractive it is. So is the case with Sita—she is focused on Lord Ram’s face which is glorious and splendorous like the full moon during the night of autumn, and has no inclination to bother either to look at any other part of the Lord’s body or even at Laxman.

Lord Ram had praised the beauty of Sita in his heart but hadn’t found words to express how beautiful her image was: refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 230. This emotion is reciprocated here by Sita who was “so thrilled by the sight of Lord Ram’s image that her body lost awareness of its self”.

Lord Ram was closely observing Sita’s behaviour. Later on we shall read in Sundar Kand that the Lord has conveyed to Sita when she was a captive in Lanka that his Mana (mind and heart) is also with her, and this is sufficient to explain the depth of his love and affection for her: refer—(i) Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 15; and (ii) Valmiki Ramayan, 1/77/26-27.

Again, after the war for liberation of Sita from Ravana’s captivity ended and Sita was asked to undergo the fire-test to prove her loyalty, she has once again reiterated that “if her mind, heart, words and deeds (‘Mana’, ‘Vachan’, and ‘Karma’) are dedicated to no one else except Lord Ram, then let the raging fire become cool like the ‘Srikhand’ (liquefied sandalwood; a liquid preparation of curd and sugar) for her”. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 109.]

jaba siya sakhinha prēmabasa jānī. kahi na sakahim kachu mana sakucānī. 8.

Sita symbolically brought in and enshrined Lord Ram in her heart, and then closed the eyelids as if closing the doors of a shrine<sup>1</sup>. (7)

When Sita’s companions found that she was overcome with intense love (for Lord Ram), all of them felt abashed, and could not utter a word out of hesitation<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Fantastic imagery, indeed. Sita must have sighed silently and etched the image of Lord Ram on the canvas of her mind and sub-conscious. It’s like taking the picture of one’s beloved and keeping it close to one’s heart because one does not know whether one will be able to see the beloved again in life. One has no control over one’s destiny and one cannot openly join one’s beloved and be close to him in physical terms, but one is free to hold his memory in one’s heart and mind for the rest of life.

The heart is a pure abode: it is here that the soul, the Atma, lives; it is here that the Supreme Being known as the Parmatma lives in the form of one’s individual Atma. That is why purest form of ‘love’ is said to have its abode in the heart. The heart is therefore like a shrine, a citadel, a holy place of the Lord God, the Parmatma.

This metaphysical perspective is deployed here to describe how Sita brought in the image of her beloved Lord, Sri Ram, quietly to enshrine it or enthrone it in the secret chambers of her heart. It is the chamber where no one else would discover the Lord, and it is here that she will have an unrestricted access to him. This is how a true lover behaves; this is where Sita hoped to worship her Lord for all times to come in the future.

She closed her eyes to ensure that the picture of Lord Ram that she has etched on the mind's canvas does not get tainted or damaged by any other image superimposing itself on it. She wanted to retain its clarity and make it permanent and everlasting.

Now, a question arises as to why have I compared Sita's heart to a 'shrine' or a 'temple'. Well, the answer is found in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 131 where sage Valmiki tells Lord Ram, while describing the places where the Lord should live like they were his own home, that "the Lord should always live in the Mana (mind and heart) of a person who does not want anything whatsoever in this world, but has selfless and purest kind of affection for the Lord as if the Mana of this person was the Lord's own abode or shrine".

<sup>2</sup>Why the hesitation? It is because it is they who had inspired Sita to come and have a look at the two princes. Now, what can they say; how will they explain to Sita's mother, the queen, her emotional condition if she is not able to conceal it wisely. It's a very piquant and sticky situation. When one falls in love, no amount of reasoning and cajoling will pull him or her out of it. The girls feared Sita because after all she was a princess and their mistress; if she gets annoyed then she can get them severely punished and even imprisoned or banished from the city. It's not wise and prudent to disturb a lovelorn princess; it's very dangerous.

This fear extended to Sita's mother: no one could predict her reaction when she comes to know that these attendant girls, who were after all maid servants of the royal household, had incited her daughter to meet a stranger in the garden. The queen-mother could give them the severest form of punishment. Not only these girls, but the entire guard of the royal garden could be thrown into the prison.

Another reason for their reluctance to say something to Sita was that she had her eyes closed. No one could be sure what was going on in her mind: she might as well be meditating upon goddess Parvati or saying some silent prayers. It would also not be proper to disturb her if this was true—because it is a sinful act to disturb someone when he or she is meditating upon God.

Initially it was only one of the attendant girls who had brought the news of the two brothers to Sita, and had the rest of them kept quiet they would have escaped punishment if anything went wrong; only this girl would suffer. But now they all were neck-deep in trouble; it was like being in a quagmire—if they kept quiet, Sita would continue to stand there gazing at the place where Lord Ram stood, and it was getting inordinately late for worship in the temple and returning to the palace, and if they said something that annoyed the princess then also severe punishment was sure to come.]

दो०. लताभवन तें प्रगट भे तेहि अवसर दोउ भाइ ।

Just at that instant (when Sita stood motionless with eyes closed, and her companions were in a fix not knowing what to do and say), the two brothers emerged from behind the shade of the creepers as if two spotlessly shining moons have broken through the veil of clouds. (Doha no. 232)

[Note—This is Lord Ram's nature—he first keeps himself invisible from the sight of his devotee, but as soon as he is sure that the devotee is fully surrendered to him and has true and sincere affection and devotion for him, the Lord manifests himself before his devotee. That manifestation is like the emergence of the brilliant moon from behind the curtain of dark clouds in the sky. When the cloud covers the face of the moon, the sky and the world appear dark, but as soon as the moon appears the whole world suddenly lights up in the moon's beautiful rays.

As long as the Lord was not sure whether or not Sita sincerely longed for him and if she was not watching something else in the garden in the guise of looking at him, he kept himself behind the curtain formed by the bevy of creepers. But as soon as he realised that she has become motionless and has shut her eyes to indicate that she will not move anywhere but remain grounded at the place like a lifeless statue, the Lord came in view.

He had also observed the consternation and alarm on the faces of Sita's companions. This development has a spiritual message—that the Lord would not allow someone who has shown his devotee the path to the Lord to feel regret and afraid of punishment. If something went wrong, such as Sita getting late in offering her worship and returning to the palace in time, her mother, the queen, is sure to get angry at Sita as well as her attendants. This thing Lord Ram did not want to allow happening. So he did not want to waste any more time, and appeared before Sita and her group, thereby giving the companions of Sita a chance and an excuse to interfere in her emotional reverie.

A pertinent question arises: why is it said that the two brothers emerged from behind the creepers as if “two moons” have broken from behind the curtain of clouds when there is only ‘one moon’ in the sky, and ‘not two’? Well, this observation is very significant and interesting. We can draw the following meaning from it:--

(i) At the instant the two brothers emerged from behind the shade of the creepers, Sita's eyes were closed, and it was her many girl companions who were looking nervously here and there. Whereas Sita's attention was focused entirely and exclusively on Lord Ram, the others distracted, as they glanced here and there, surely to see if any of the gardeners were spying on them and watching them on the sly. It implies that if one is not focused on the Lord, he or she will start hallucinating, because seeing ‘two moons’ is a metaphoric way of saying someone is under great delusions and is hallucinating. Therefore, if one wishes to attain the Lord God, he must behave like Sita and not like her companions. Sita had seen only ‘one moon’ in the form of Lord Ram (refer: Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 232), whereas her companions see ‘two moons’ here (Doha no. 232)!

(ii) These companions of Sita had known where the Lord stood, they were the ones who had shown Sita the way to the Lord, but unfortunately they had themselves failed to drink the nectar that Sita had drunk. So it is in this world: we come across countless people who would wisely tell us the path of spirituality, but rarely do they walk on it themselves. It is often also observed that a sincere and eager disciple attains the spiritual goal that his Guru had advised him, while the Guru himself remains embroiled and entangled in the nightmare of this deluding world. It's indeed a great irony.

(iii) As soon as the moon appears from behind the dark veil of the clouds, the darkness of the night vanishes. Similarly, as soon as the Lord God makes his appearance in the firmament of the devotee's heart, all his spiritual delusions and fears disappear. His inner self is brilliantly illuminated and ghosts and phantoms run away.

(iv) The moon shines because it reflects the light of the sun. Lord Ram is like the sun of the Raghu dynasty as well as the one who illuminates the inner being of the creature in the form of the Atma, the pure consciousness that lives in his heart. Out of the two brothers, Lord Ram is of a dark complexion while Laxman is fair. So a tricky situation arises—Lord Ram, the real 'sun', is dark, while Laxman who is like his shadow, or like a 'moon' that shines or obtains its glory in the light of the sun, is fair. This Doha conveys the message that both Lord Ram and Laxman complement each other; no one should be taken as being junior or senior to the other. Both of them have equal importance in this creation if we were to look at them from the cosmic perspective of creation.

It is on the coiled body of Seshnath that Vishnu reclines on the surface of the cosmic ocean of milk, known as the Kshir-sagar. It is Laxman in his cosmic role of Seshnath who supports the world—so assiduously looked after and cared for by Lord Vishnu—on his thousand hoods. If Lord Vishnu sustains this world, it is Laxman in his cosmic form as Seshnath who gives support to Vishnu's endeavour. Just imagine what would happen to this world so lovingly cared for by Vishnu if Seshnath would not support it; it would sink in the cosmic void to god knows where.

Therefore, this Doha seeks to put to rest any misunderstanding in the mind of the reader that Laxman is being side-tracked or his glory undermined anywhere in the narrative.

In fact, this Doha stresses that the two brothers enhance each other's glory like the appearance of two moons simultaneously in the sky would obviously increase the brightness of the night at least by two times.

There is one more reason of the two brothers emerging from behind the curtain of creepers while Sita had her eyes closed. This is explained in a note to verse nos. 1-2 that follow below.]

चौ०. सोभा सीवँ सुभग दोउ बीरा । नील पीत जलजाभ सरीरा ॥ १ ॥

mōrapaṅkha sira sōhata nīkē. gucca bīca bica kusuma kalī kē. 2.

'The two warriors are images of perfect beauty. [That is, there cannot be anyone more beautiful and charming than them; they were virtually beauty and charm in a personified form.]

The complexion of their bodies resembles the hue of a blue and a yellow lotus flower respectively. [Lord Ram had a dark complexion like a blue-tinged or pink lotus, while Laxman was fair like a lotus with a yellow hue.] (1)

Beautiful peacock feathers adorn their heads which also has bunches of flower buds imbedded here and there in the thick lock of hairs. (2)

[Note—We have read above that at the time the two brothers emerged from behind the curtain of creepers to make themselves visible to Sita and her companions, Sita had her eyes closed, and therefore this image of Lord Ram and Laxman was seen by her companions. Sita continued to meditate, with closed eyes, upon the image of Lord Ram she had last seen. We shall read below that one of her companions woke her up from her reverie, or as she herself puts it “from her meditative posture”, to see this wonderful image. It was then that Sita opened her eyes to behold the stunning image of beauty standing right in her front. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 234.

Meanwhile, in these lines we read about the fabulous beauty of the two brothers that was enjoyed by Sita’s companions. Lord Ram wished to give these girls an opportunity to enjoy the wonderful sight of his fascinating image; he did not want to deprive them of this privilege. This is also one of the reasons why he emerged from behind the creepers while Sita had her eyes closed—because this gave her maids an unhindered chance to look at the two brothers without any obstruction or hesitation, or annoying their mistress, princess Sita, who may not like them to stare at a stranger young prince in her presence as it would be indecent and violate norms of ethical conduct which requires that unmarried girls should not look at strangers, especially if they are young boys of their age, alone.

Once again we note that while Sita’s mind registered only the beauty and presence of Lord Ram (Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 232), her companions saw ‘both the brothers’ (Doha no. 232). This explains the metaphor of “two beautiful moons emerging from behind the veil of clouds” as said in Doha no. 232.

In Tulsidas’ book called ‘Geetawali Ramayan’, in its Baal Kand, verse no. 68, stanza no. 10 it is reiterated that “the creator has established millions of moons and Kamdeos on each part of the body of these two princes”. Refer also: Geetawali Ramayan, Ayodhya Kand, verse no. 17, stanza no. 1.

The condition of these girls is like a flock of Chakor birds gazing at the full moon—refer: Geetawali’s Ayodhya Kand, verse no. 14, stanza no. 3.

But in order to remove any doubt that since these two princes are so delicate, tender and beautiful they must have been brought up in a much pampered manner in a privileged background and never allowed to face hardships of life, it is said that they are “warriors” (‘Biraa’—the 5th word of verse no. 1). Warriors may be handsome, attractive and exceptionally charming, but are surely never weak, meek, or wanting in physical strength and valour.

This said, the physical features of both the brothers are being described. The narration starts from the head and goes down the body. It makes the reader look at the fascinating image of the two brothers from the awe-struck eyes of the friends of Sita as they watched Lord Ram and Laxman.

Their heads were decorated with peacock feathers, as well as flowers and buds tucked in-between the lock of hairs. When the two brothers had gone to see the city of Janakpur the previous evening, they were formally dressed like princes: they wore caps on their heads because it was a formal outing and so they were attired like noble princes (refer: line no. 1 of Doha no. 219).

But now when they are in the garden plucking flowers for the worship ritual of their Guru, it is morning. Hence, they were informally attired in a casual manner. This meant in practical terms that they weren't wearing royal clothes befitting princes making a public appearance. So, as is the tradition, they were wearing informal apparel consisting of a long piece of seamless body-wrapping silk cloth known as a 'Pitambar' if it is yellow in colour, or a 'Dhoti' if it is white or of some other shade of colour. This also meant that the upper parts of their bodies, waist-upwards, were exposed—and this is the reason why the companions of Sita could make out the complexion of the two brothers Lord Ram and Laxman as being dark and fair respectively.]

A 'Tilak-Mark' and beads of perspiration (resembling pearls) look wonderful on their foreheads. The beautifully carved ears reflect the luster of shiny ear-rings. (3)

Their eyebrows are arched (like the curve of a bow); their hairs are curly; and their pink eyes are fresh like a newly-opened lotus flower of a red-hue. (4)

[Note—The 'Tilak mark' is worn by Hindus on their forehead. It consists of three parallel lines drawn vertically in the center of the forehead just above the root of the nose and extending upto the hairline. This mark is made after one takes a bath in the morning. Therefore this means that the two brothers have already taken their morning bath.

The presence of beads of perspiration on the foreheads of Lord Ram and Laxman indicate the following things:

(i) Though it is morning hours, it is hot in the garden and no breeze is blowing;

(ii) They had gone behind the cluster of thick creepers where it must have been very suffocative, causing sweat to break out on their foreheads; this also explains why they came out of the alcove of creepers to get some fresh air;

(iii) They had been walking in the garden for some time, plucking flowers and leaves, and hence must have felt hot due to this exertion because, being princes, they weren't accustomed to such effort; they would simply order their servants and gardeners to bring flowers and never go out personally to search the entire garden for them;

(iv) And that they were nervous at the sight of so many girls staring at them unblinkingly and talking animatedly about them.

Other features of the face are curly hairs and ears adorned with ear-rings. It means that the two brothers were very conscious that the love-struck girls were watching them very closely and exhaustively. This made them excessively nervous and fidgety, causing them to perspire.]

They have lovely chins, noses and cheeks. Their smile as well as pleasant gestures and demeanours are so bewitching and compelling with their fascinating charm that it seems the Mana (mind and heart) has been held captive and enslaved by them. [That is, when one watches the smile of Lord Ram and Laxman and their charming demeanours, one is inclined to willingly lose his heart to them and focus his mind on them.]<sup>1</sup> (5)

It is not possible for me<sup>2</sup> to describe the fabulous beauty of their faces which put to shame the pride of countless Kamdeos (or cupids—the god who is regarded as the patron deity of beauty and charm, and of everything that is wonderful to behold).<sup>3</sup> (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This line that says Lord Ram and Laxman were smiling and making pleasant gestures imply that like the girls who accompanied Sita, the two brothers were also talking with each other softly in hushed tones. They must have been naturally talking about the way the group of girls was awe-struck by their presence, feeling fidgety and squirming and giggling nervously.

<sup>2</sup>The word ‘me’ clearly implies that one of the girls in the group that accompanied Sita was loudly speaking about the charming view of the two brothers as they stood in sight. Others in the group were already watching the two brothers, so why was she speaking aloud? Well, the answer is interesting: As we have read, Sita had her eyes closed as if meditating, and the maids were too scared to wake her up (refer: Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 232). So the chief maiden in the group was searching for an excuse to bring Sita back to her senses. And this was the perfect excuse—the two brothers were standing right in front, and by describing their beauty aloud she expected to wake Sita from her trance.

But as it happened, she failed. Sita was so deeply submerged in meditating upon the image of her Lord Ram, which she had brought in and enshrined in her heart, that she did not hear and pay attention to what was being said. This is clear when we read Chaupai line no. 7 that preceeds Doha no. 232 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 234. In the first instance it is said that “Sita brought the image of Lord Ram inside her heart and closed its doors by shutting her eyes”, and in the second instance it is said that “one of her companions gathered enough courage to tell Sita to meditate upon Goddess Parvati later on, and instead she should first see the beautiful sight of the prince (Lord Ram) before it vanishes or he moves away from sight”.

<sup>3</sup>There are countless instances where the beauty of Lord Ram is highlighted by saying that numerous Kamdeos (cupids) are no match for the Lord’s charm. Refer, for instance, Geetawali Ramayan—(i) Baal Kand, verse no. 68, stanza no. 10; (ii)

Ayodhya Kand, verse no. 15, stanza no. 4; verse no. 17, stanza no. 1; verse no. 26, stanza no. 2 etc.]

They have a garland of gems resting upon their chests. Their necks are as beautiful as a conch-shell with its rounded and spiral contours. Their long and muscular arms are as attractive and strong as the trunk of young elephants. (7)

Oh dear friend! With a cup made of leaves that is full of flowers, the dark-complexioned prince is indeed exceptionally charming.' (8)

[Note—When Sita did not pay any attention to all that was said earlier, this chief companion concluded that it was because she has been describing the 'two brothers' instead of Lord Ram alone. Sita was struck by Lord Ram's charm, and once she fell in love with the Lord she is not bothered about anyone else. So this wise and clever girl concluded her description by stressing that out of the two princes, it is Ram who draws attention with his unmatched charm. Both the brothers are charming, but Ram is more so.

Perhaps she thought that when she will refer to Lord Ram specifically it would wake Sita up from her trance-like state. But unfortunately it did not happen. Sita was deep in meditation and unbothered about her surroundings. She has to be woken up purposely—refer: Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 234 herein below.]

He (Lord Ram) has a slim waist like that of a lion<sup>1</sup>, and is wearing a Pitambar<sup>2</sup>. He is an embodiment of beauty and decency<sup>3</sup>.

Seeing this most fascinating and bewitching sight of the Lord of the solar race, the friends of Sita lost awareness of themselves.<sup>4</sup> (Doha no. 233)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A lion has a very strong and muscular body, but its waist area is slim. This metaphor is used to stress that Lord Ram may be delicate and tender in his appearance but he is as strong as a lion. Besides this, the lion is the king of the forest. Hence, it means that Lord Ram is the king of this world.

<sup>2</sup>The ‘Pitambar’ is a yellow coloured seamless single piece of silk cloth wrapped around the body. It is usually wrapped around the lower half of the body, round the waist and below it to cover the legs. A length of it is swung loosely across the shoulders to drape the upper part of the body as well. But in the case of warriors, the upper part of the body is usually left undraped and the Pitambar is worn only on the lower part from the waist down.

<sup>3</sup>Lord Ram and Laxman have maintained full decency and etiquette during this interaction in the garden. It will be noted that when Sita appeared on the scene and the two brothers noticed that she is looking at them, they quietly moved away from sight and went behind a thick curtain formed by dense creepers. Refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 232. This was to uphold laws of decent behaviour whereby strangers ought not to allow themselves to be stared at by unmarried girls. Besides this, Lord Ram was a prince himself and he was well aware of royal manners and etiquette: female members of the royal household were not expected to directly see males not related to them. No lewd remarks or gestures were passed or exchanged. Though the atmosphere was charged with love and mutual attraction, but there was no trace of vulgarity and indecency of any kind whatsoever.

<sup>4</sup>We have read earlier that Sita was overwhelmed by the beautiful sight of Lord Ram. Now it is emphasized that even her companions are swept off their feet by the Lord’s charm.]

One of Sita’s clever friends gathered courage to break Sita’s trance-like state of reverie. She held Sita’s hands and told her—[1] ‘Dear, you can meditate upon Gauri (goddess Parvati) later on. Why don’t you presently have a good look at the young prince of the king (‘Bhup-kishore’—i.e. Lord Ram). [2]’ (1-2)

[Note—Not only Sita but all of her companions were held enthralled by the magnificent view of Lord Ram and Laxman; all of them were spell-bound and transfixed at the sight. But one of them decided that enough was enough, and that it was getting late to return to the palace after performing worship of goddess Parvati at the garden temple, which was the main purpose of the group’s visit to the garden. She is called ‘clever’ because she was expert in maintaining protocol as she pretended that Sita was meditating upon the goddess instead of being stunned by the beauty of Lord Ram so much so that she couldn’t move a bit. The fact that Sita was overwhelmed by the sight of Lord Ram’s enchanting view and had preferred to hurry to see the two brothers instead of sticking to her original plan of performing worship at the temple and returning home is abundantly clear by reading (i) Chaupai line nos. 2-6 that precede Doha no. 228, (ii) Doha no. 229 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 6-8, and (iii) Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 232.

She was after all a maid, and therefore she had to gather courage to interfere with her mistress' thought process because there was always the fear of annoying Sita who was a princess, and inviting her wrath. This friend observed that Sita was so much lost in the thoughts of Lord Ram that inspite of the girls chattering away and loudly describing the glamorous sight of the two brothers as they emerged from behind the curtain of creepers, Sita's trance did not break. So this girl had to be extra careful—and this is why she told Sita to “meditate upon goddess Parvati later on”, because it ensured that Sita would not accuse her of casting a taint on her character by implying that she was besotted by an unknown stranger prince, something that would put Sita in the docks and besmirch her reputation.

This girl was the chief maid because only someone with a responsibility and position would have the guts to hold the hands of a princess and wake her up from day-dreaming. She in all probability had squeezed Sita's hands to wake her up from her trance as she realized that other methods, such as orally alerting her, would not look nice as the two brothers, Ram and Laxman, were closely observing her activities. The garden was a quiet place, and trying to wake Sita by verbal methods was sure to be heard by the two brothers, and this would give a wrong impression to the two princes regarding the character of Sita. After all, they too were of royal blood and understood well the decorum and protocols of royal behaviour—which stipulates, inter alia, that a princess should not step beyond the red-line by getting enamored of and enthralled by complete strangers.

Therefore, this ‘clever’ friend thought of holding, squeezing and shaking Sita's hands to wake her up from her day-dreaming instead of doing so verbally.

There is yet another way of interpreting these two lines. This chief maid knew well that Sita was thinking of Lord Ram, so she sort of alerted her that instead of meditating upon the image of Lord Ram why doesn't she open her eyes and have a direct look at the same image while it is still there in the front. Later on she can always close her eyes and recollect that image, but she should not miss this golden opportunity of having a direct look at the two brothers while they are still within sight. She was clever to convey this message while observing the rules of etiquette and protocol by saying that “Sita should first look at the princes now, and then meditate upon the goddess later on”.]

नख सिख देखि राम कै सोभा । सुमिरि पिता पनु मनु अति छोभा ॥ ४ ॥ sakuci sīyam̐ taba nayana ughārē. sanamukha dō'u raghusiṅgha nihārē. 3.

nakha sikha dēkhi rāma kai sōbhā. sumiri pitā panu manu ati chōbhā. 4.

Sita felt bashful and fidgety as she hesitatingly opened her eyes to behold the two lions of Raghu dynasty standing opposite her (near the alcove of creepers)<sup>1</sup>. (3)

Sita was enthralled as she watched the wonderful image of Lord Ram, from the toe nails right upto his head. Then she felt very perturbed as she remembered the stern vow of her father (which declared that anyone who would break Lord Shiva's strong bow would be married to Sita irrespective of whether she likes it or not, and ignoring her personal views and preferences)<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Sita felt ‘bashful and fidgety’ because she realized that her friends have become aware that she is besotted by the beauty of two stranger princes. Since this was indeed the case, she ‘hesitatingly’ opened her eyes because she would be facing the two princes face to face. Sita had previously closed her eyes out of feeling of bashfulness when she saw that the two princes were staring at her from behind the curtain of creepers. Now her friend tells her to open her eyes and look at the two princes directly. Surely this was a very embarrassing situation.

Lord Ram and his younger brother Laxman are compared to a lion of the Raghu dynasty because this metaphor is most suitable for them. A lion is the king of the animals and the forest, and it has a very strong and muscular body. Similarly, the two brothers were kings in their own right, and had a magnificent personality with a well-built body with a muscular frame.

When Sita opened her eyes, her sight first fell on the feet of Lord Ram, and slowly and bashfully she raised her eyes to see his face. This meant that now she was having a full view of the beautifully enchanting image of the Lord. She longed to have Ram as her groom, but her father’s stern vows came in the way. How unfortunate it was that she had no say in her own future and its happiness. Out of hesitation and requirements of royal protocol she did not have the courage to even tell her father what she wished because it would immediately invite scorn, rebuke and punishment.

Besides this now it was too late because all the princes and kings had already arrived to participate in the bow ceremony. Forcing her father to go back on his declaration would mean an eternal ignominy on the whole family that would cause irreparable damage to its reputation.

So Sita was extremely perturbed and depressed because though she had mentally decided to pick Lord Ram as her life companion and would like to spend her entire life with him, it seemed that her wishes would remain unrequited because of the vows of her father that stipulated that anyone who broke Shiva’s bow would marry her.]

परबस सखिन्ह लखी जब सीता । भयउ गहरु सब कहहिं सभीता ॥ ५ ॥

puni ā'uba ēhi bēri'ām' kālī. asa kahi mana bihasī ēka ālī. 6.

When Sita’s companions observed that she was under the spell of a stranger (i.e. Lord Ram), they felt very embarrassed themselves. Afraid of being inordinately late (in performing worship of goddess Parvati and returning to the palace, which would certainly invite enquiry and stern admonishment from the queen mother), they told Sita—‘We are getting late. So please hurry up. (5)

We will come to this place tomorrow again at the same hour (when you will have more opportunity to see the two princes who are also expected to come to pluck flowers for their Guru, sage Vishwamitra).’

Saying this, one of Sita’s companions smiled within herself (because she, being a close friend of Sita, was passing this comment to tease her, making Sita feel more bashful and embarrassed). (6)

[Note—Again, this girl was the head maid. Sita’s companions were afraid because they were getting unduly late in completing the worship and returning to the palace. If the queen mother comes to learn what happened in the garden, she would certainly take all of them to task. The queen had sent them to guard Sita’s privacy and ensure that no outsider is able to violate royal protocol and come within viewing distance of the princess. If the queen comes to know that outside gentlemen had entered the garden against royal orders and had come too close to the princess, it would mean strong punishment for all of them as well as the guards and gardeners of the royal garden for their laxity and allowing this to happen.

What answer would they give when asked why did they dare to take Sita at the place where outsiders were present, and the friend who had actually brought the news of the presence of the two brothers would be singled out for the sternest form of punishment. This is why they were all afraid of getting late to return because it is sure to arouse suspicion.

When this friend warned Sita that they were getting too late, she also felt afraid because of her mother wondering at the cause of this delay—refer: Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 234 below.

The most jovial amongst the companions teased Sita in a friendly way by telling her that if she is so enamoured of the princes then they all would come here tomorrow again so that she can have more fun. She said this in audibly loud so that the two brothers would also hear it and would find some excuse to come there at the same time the next day.

She laughed at herself because she knew that what she had just said—that they would come here tomorrow and then Sita would be able to watch the two princes more—was virtually impossible to implement as the next day would be extremely busy because the bow ceremony was scheduled for that day. Today they were relaxed, but tomorrow the entire household would be on its toes, getting ready for the bow ceremony from early morning. Even if they did manage to come to the garden temple, it would be a hurried affair.

Besides this, all the invited guests would be preparing to attend the ceremony, and there was little or no chance that the two brothers would come again and be in a relaxed mood as they are today.

This friend’s advice caused a lot of embarrassment for Sita because it clearly implied that she has fallen in love with a stranger, and for a young unmarried girl this is a reason for feeling shy and abashed.]

गूढ़ गिरा सुनि सिय सकुचानी । भयउ बिलंबु मातु भय मानी ॥ ७ ॥
धरि बड़ि धीर रामु उर आने । फिरी अपनपउ पितुबस जाने ॥ ८ ॥

gūṛha girā suni siya sakucānī. bhaya'u bilambu mātu bhaya mānī. 7.
dhari baḍidhīra rāmu ura ānē. phirī apanapa'u pitubasa jānē. 8.

Hearing these serious words that had a double-edged meaning to them as they were meant to tease Sita, she felt highly embarrassed and bashful even as she blushed exceedingly. At the same time she became afraid of being punished by her mother for getting too late to return to the palace<sup>1</sup>. (7)

Sita gathered her wits around with a lot of patience and courage, and she resolutely brought in the image of Lord Ram and enshrined it inside her heart. She then reluctantly turned back, realizing the practicality of the situation that she was dependent on her father and was not independent to decide anything herself about her future<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Sita realized that it was futile for her to harbour any thoughts of Lord Ram in her heart because her future was tied to the vows of her father. When her companion told her that they would come here the next day when she would be able to see more of the two princes, Sita realized that she was being teased as it was a very remote possibility to see the two brothers again after today's encounter in the garden because in all probability they will go away the next day once the bow ceremony was over and she was betrothed to some great king or prince.

The two princes, i.e. Lord Ram and Laxman, were strangers, and no one can ever be certain of a stranger; no one can say for sure whether one would meet a stranger again in life or not. Perhaps their Guru, sage Vishwamitra, would get informed that the two brothers had been roaming in the garden looking at girls. In all probability, the sage would not allow them to repeat it again for fear of a scandal and a taint on their immaculate reputation which was not ordinary, for the two brothers belonged to a famous family of king Raghu which is famed for being extremely upright and moral in conduct and thought.

After the bow ceremony is over, there would be little chance of the two princes coming to the garden again the second or the third day because all the guests would be preparing to leave, and even if they did come the chances of Sita visiting the place was most remote as she would have no excuse to come to offer worship to goddess Parvati to seek her blessings for a suitable husband because this issue would be decided by the next day when the bow ceremony would be held.

Sita was also afraid that if she was inordinately late to return, it would cause her mother to become suspicious of her activities and ask her so many uncomfortable questions. She was already tormented, and did not want to aggravate her condition more by having to answer irritating questions. So she felt 'afraid' at getting late.

<sup>2</sup>Sita faced a piquant situation. Personally she wished to marry Lord Ram, but the ground reality was that she had no say in deciding who her husband would be as this was tied to the breaking of the bow as decided by her father. It was such a painful situation where a girl had no say about her future happiness, and what she wanted or not wanted. She wanted to stay a bit longer to view the enchanting image of her beloved, but then it was getting late and she was afraid of her mother. Further, her companions had started teasing her and poking fun at her, something that irritated her more at this point of time as it was not the time for such pranks and making fun. Her heart was heavy as lead, she was under great emotional and mental stress, and at this juncture instead of empathising with her these maids were taunting her with sarcastic comments. She felt ruined. But she had no choice.

So Sita courageously took a deep breath and glanced at Lord Ram for the last time so as to etch his image so firmly in her heart that though she may never be able to see her beloved again in life, his image would be eternally enshrined in her temple-like heart where she would continue to adore him for the rest of her life!

Sita was so thoroughly enchanted and enamoured by the bewitching image of Lord Ram and decided in the heart of her inner-self that if there is anyone whom she would ever adore and love in life it would be Lord Ram. So, given the uncertainties she faced due to the condition laid down by her father whereby her future was hinged to the bow, she decided to play it safe by bringing in Lord Ram and giving him a permanent abode in her heart, a place where she would be able to keep the Lord secretly locked-in for the rest of her life even if she was not able to marry him, and it was such a secure sanctuary because no one else except her own self would know about the Lord's abode there. A paper portrait or any other token means of remembrance could be snatched away from her if it was discovered in her possession, but an image that is etched on the walls of her heart and the canvas of her thoughts cannot be detected and deleted by anyone no matter how hard he or she had been spying on Sita and trying to convince others of her behaviour in the royal garden that had made her a target of the arrows of Kamdeo / cupid.]

As Sita went back (towards the temple of goddess Parvati), she repeatedly glanced back on the pretext of seeing some wonderful deer, birds and trees. Each time she looked back she had a beauteous vision of Raghuvir (Lord Ram, the brave warrior of the Raghu dynasty), and each sight further stoked her love and affection for the Lord; the more she saw of Lord Ram the more besotted and enamoured she became. (Doha no. 234)

[Note—Sita found a ruse to look back and glance at her beloved Lord for the last time. If she had turned back and looked directly in the direction where the two brothers were standing, it would have given her friends more chance to tease her; it would have created a sort of scandal. So she found an excuse—there were a large number of wonderful deer, birds and trees in the garden; all were very fascinating. Sita cheerfully looked here and there pretending to watch them on her way back to the temple. But her real intention was to glance back at the place where Lord Ram and Laxman were standing.

She moved a little ahead and then retraced her steps to see this deer, or that bird or tree. From the corners of her eyes she kept on looking at Lord Ram; her maids had no idea where she was actually looking at. So this saved Sita from more embarrassment.]

Feeling depressed that the bow of Lord Shiva is exceptionally heavy to lift and hard to break, she (Sita) went away with a heavy heart, enshrining the lovely dark-coloured image (of Lord Ram) in her (temple-like) heart<sup>1</sup>. (1)

When Lord Ram saw that Janki, the daughter of king Janak (i.e. Sita) who was an image of bliss, affection, beauty and virtues, was going back [2], he painted her marvelous image on the wall (canvas) of his heart by using the soft ink of immense love for her [3]<sup>2</sup>. (2-3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Sita knew that her fate is irrevocably tied to Lord Shiva's bow —anyone who lifts, strings and breaks it would marry her. But this bow was very difficult to tackle—it was heavy, hard—refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 250.

It was mystical as well in the sense that unless Lord Shiva wants it to move or break no power on earth would be able to do so—refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 258.

Countless strong and powerful warriors had assembled to try their luck at tackling this bow. As compared to them Lord Ram was very delicate and tender, not only in age but also in physical features. So Sita guessed that if anyone of these warriors weren't able to break the bow then it is impossible to imagine that Lord Ram would ever be able to do it. Consequentially, the chances of her ever marrying Ram were next to nil—except of course if Lord Shiva so wants, and if some miracle happens by a stroke of good luck favouring her.

So she decided to request goddess Parvati, the divine consort of Lord Shiva, to be specially kind, gracious and considerate on this occasion and interceded on her behalf to persuade her husband, Shiva, to make things happen in such a way that the impossible can happen—i.e. no one should be able to move the bow, and then, as a last resort, her father may ask Lord Ram to make an attempt, at which the bow would voluntarily break because Lord Shiva would order it to do so. Sita's prayers to goddess Parvati that follow below clearly indicate this. Refer: (i) from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 235—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 236. Her earnest prayers were heard by the goddess, and she expressly assured Sita that her wishes would be fulfilled—refer: Doha no. 236 and its preceding Chanda along with Chaupai line nos. 5-8. (ii) Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede Doha no. 257.

Parvati had undergone this emotional trauma in her personal life as well. She had to do severe Tapa (penance and austerity) and undergo most difficult tests to obtain the hands of Lord Shiva in marriage. Her parents did not like the union in the beginning because Shiva was a renunciate ascetic who lived a life of dispassion and without any worldly comfort worth the name with him. No parent would like to marry their daughter to such a person. So, Parvati could empathise with Sita more than anyone else. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 65—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 101 which elaborately describe the marriage of Shiva with Parvati and the trauma she has to bear to fulfill her wish to marry Shiva.

<sup>2</sup>Sita too had done the same thing—refer: (i) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 232, (ii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 234, and (iii) finally once again in Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 235.

So we observe that both Lord Ram and Sita had fallen deeply in love with each other. At the time of the actual breaking of the bow, while Sita was fervently praying to gods and goddesses as well as the bow itself, Lord Ram had first looked directly at Sita and then decided to make the final resolute move to lift and break the bow—refer: (i) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 259, and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 261.

An important observance can be made here. Sita had “enshrined the image of Lord Ram by bringing it inside her heart and closing shut its doors” (refer: Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 232), while Lord Ram has “used the ink of love to make a portrait of Sita on the walls of his heart” (refer: Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 235). Now, one may forget about something that one has brought in the house and kept it safely somewhere, but one will remember it if he has written about it in his personal diary.

This is exactly what is meant here and had actually happened. During the period just before the actual breaking of the bow, Sita was nervous and had forgotten what goddess Parvati had assured her in the temple—that her wishes would be fulfilled and she will get the groom of her choice (refer: Chaupai line nos. 6-8 and Chanda that precede Doha no. 236). Sita had prayed fervently to this god and that goddess (refer: Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 257), losing confidence in the power of true love by the virtue of which she had so meticulously brought in the image of Lord Ram in her heart and had shut the door earlier.

On the other hand, Lord Ram maintained his cool and poise because he was certain of the inherent formidable power that the good-old virtue of true love possesses, a power that no force in world can ever resist and neutralise. Refer: (i) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 259, and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 261.]

Meanwhile, Sita went to the temple of Bhavani (goddess Parvati), knelt down before the goddess and offered her obeisance at the goddess' feet. Then she held her hands together and prayed to the goddess<sup>1</sup>. (4)

Sita prayed—‘Glory to you oh goddess Girija, the daughter of the king of the mountains (i.e. goddess Parvati, the divine consort of Lord Shiva)!<sup>12</sup>

Glory to you who has the privilege of constantly looking at the enchanting face of Lord Shiva much like the female bird ‘Chakori’ (Indian red-legged partridge) who intently watches the full moon with intense love for it in her heart.<sup>3</sup> (5)

Glory to you who are the mother of gods Ganesh (‘Gajbadan’) and Kartikeya (‘Shadaanan’)<sup>4</sup>! You are the Mother Goddess of this world<sup>5</sup>, and your body is splendid and radiant with a divine glow. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 1/72 also.

Sita had fallen at the feet of the goddess as a gesture of earnest and urgent request as well as of total surrender. When one falls down or kneels down before an Authority, the latter is morally obliged to listen to the prayer or petition of the person who has submitted himself to this Authority. So when Sita knelt before goddess Parvati to place her petition before her—which was to ask the goddess to ensure that she marries the prince she has begun to love and whose image she has enshrined in her heart, leaving no place for anyone else—the goddess was obliged to kindly consider her pleas favourably.

<sup>2</sup>By reminding Parvati about her past when she was born as a daughter in the household of the king of mountains, had determined to marry Lord Shiva when sage Narad had told her parents that she was destined to be the consort of the Lord, and had to do undergo the severest form of Tapa and physical sufferings in order to fulfill her wishes that she is eternally dedicated to Lord Shiva and no one else, Sita intended to implore upon the goddess to help her as she was facing the same dilemma and piquant situation in her life as the goddess had faced in her own life earlier*. This would naturally make the goddess sympathetic to her situation and help her in all possible ways so that she is finally able to have the hands of Lord Ram in marriage and be the Lord’s partner in life. {*This episode is narrated in detail in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 66—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 75.}

<sup>3</sup>The bird Chakor is famed for its love for the moon. By citing this example Sita wished to convey to the goddess that like the case of her own self when she finds eternal happiness and bliss by constantly watching the face of her beloved husband Lord Shiva, she (Sita) also wished to spend the rest of her life watching the beautiful face of Lord Ram. So, will goddess Parvati please help her? Since she loves Lord Shiva so much, is it not possible for her to prevail upon her husband, Shiva, to kindly pay attention to the emotional torments faced by Sita and help her by making it so happen that the bow is broken by no one else but Lord Ram? Surely goddess Parvati can do this if she is pleased.

<sup>4</sup>Lords Ganesh and Kartikeya are the two sons of Lord Shiva and Parvati. Ganesh is called ‘Gajanan’ because he has the head of an elephant, and Kartikeya is called ‘Shadaanan’ because he has six mouths. Ganesh is regarded as the chief amongst Gods, and is offered first worship during rituals. He is said to be very wise and erudite. Kartikeya is the chief of the army of Gods. A detailed note on Ganesh has been appended below to Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 257.

By placing Ganesh ahead of Kartikeya, Sita showed her wisdom—that she was well aware that he was God who is always worshipped before others, and that he is the fulfiller of all wishes. So, goddess Parvati being the mother of Lord Ganesh, she is all the more obliged and competent to fulfill Sita's wishes.

Kartikeya is the chief of the army of Shiva as well as of the Gods in general. So by invoking him Sita implied that if goddess Parvati wants she can instruct her son Kartikeya to ward off all evil spirits and opposing stars that might play spoil-sport and ruin Sita's future happiness by not allowing her to be married to Lord Ram. Kartikeya and Ganesh should work together so that Sita's future is auspicious, her wishes are fulfilled, and Lord Ram can obtain victory in the fierce battle that would rage for her in the arena of the bow-breaking ceremony.

<sup>5</sup>Goddess Parvati is also known as 'Maha-devi', the Great Goddess. She is the 'Mother' of this world because Lord Shiva, her divine husband, is the 'Maha-deva', the Great God who is regarded as the Father of creation.]

नहिं तव आदि मध्य अवसाना । अमित प्रभाउ बेदु नहिं जाना ॥ ७ ॥

भव भव बिभव पराभव कारिनि । बिस्व बिमोहनि स्वबस बिहारिनि ॥ ८ ॥

nahim tava ādi madhya avasānā. amita prabhā'u bēdu nahim jānā. 7.

bhava bhava bibhava parābhava kārini. bisva bimōhani svabasa bihārini. 8.

There is no beginning, middle or an end of your divine form. Your influence and powers are immeasurable and infinite; even the Vedas are unable to fathom them and describe them. (7)

You are the one who creates, sustains and concludes this creation. You are the one who casts her veil of delusions over this world and keep it enthralled. You are independent in all respects, and move in this world freely as you wish. (8)

[Note—This is a perfect portrait of the Supreme Being known in the scriptures as the 'Viraat Purush', the all-pervading, all-encompassing, invisible and cosmic form of the Lord. Mother Goddess is this Viraat Purush's 'Shakti' or dynamic aspect. The Lord uses his 'Shakti' to carry out all his cosmic functions—creation, sustenance and conclusion. This Shakti is also known as 'Maya' or the delusion creating power of Brahm, the Supreme Being. It is this Maya that keeps the world spinning like a wheel endlessly.

Brahm's cosmic Shakti is as infinite as the sky. Its powers and energy are endless. It represents the dynamism and energy of Brahm that acts like an invisible dynamo that powers all activity in this creation.

Now, Sita invokes all these qualities of goddess Parvati to inspire her to become active, realise her immense potentials, and utilise her cosmic abilities to fulfill her small wish—which is to make Lord Ram her partner for life. If she wants, Parvati, being the Supreme Goddess, can very conveniently and easily do it; it is within her capabilities. She can for instance cast her deluding veil on all the competing warriors so that none of them would be able to lift and break the bow; she can make the bow heavy when others begin lifting it and make it feather-light when Lord Ram tries his hand on it. She can turn the mind of her father so that he may ask Sita for her views, and then tamper with his vows and tweak them to somehow accommodate her.

By telling the goddess that “she is independent in her moves in the world” Sita indicated to her that she (the goddess) too had independently decided to marry Lord Shiva inspite of advice given to the contrary by the seven celestial sages known as the Saptarishis—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand (i) from Doha no. 77—to Doha no. 81, and (ii) from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 89—to Doha no. 90.

Therefore, she must also help her (Sita) because she also wants to chart an independent path for her self much against the wishes of her father.

There is another way of interpreting this statement—it may mean that Sita requests goddess Parvati that like her, she (Sita) too should be granted permission to move freely in life with the partner of her choice. If Parvati had chosen Shiva then, let Sita choose Lord Ram now!]

दो०. पतिदेवता सुतीय महँ मातु प्रथम तव रेख ।

patidēvatā sutiya mahum̐ mātu prathama tava rēkha.

mahimā amita na sakahim̐ kahi sahasa sārādā sēṣa. 235.

Oh Mother! Among all the virtuous women who regard their husbands as a personified form of God (and give them due respect befitting this stature), you are counted first—i.e. you head this list, you are the best amongst such women. Thousands of Saraswatis (the goddess of speech and knowledge) and the legendary serpent with thousands of heads (and therefore thousands of tongues and mouths), known as Seshnath, are unable (or rather ‘would be unable’) to sing and praise your immense and infinite glories and virtues<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 235)

[Note—In Hinduism, the husband is a woman’s most precious and adorable asset in this life. She is expected to show him the greatest of respect as she would show to a revered God. Sage Atri’s wife named Anusuiya has also outlined the duties of a good woman when Sita met her in the sage’s hermitage where Lord Ram had gone during his 14-year forest exile—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Sortha no. 5 and the entire length of Chaupais that precede it.

Sita has cited three sources which together can’t sufficiently praise the glories and powers and abilities of goddess Parvati, the cosmic Mother Goddess—the Vedas, goddess Saraswati, and Seshnath, the thousand-hooded serpent who holds the earth aloft. This is to stress the immensity and profundity of the goddess’ glories. The ‘Vedas’ pertain to the wisdom of the terrestrial world, the earth; goddess Saraswati represents the heavenly Gods, and Seshnath stands for the wise ones who live in the subterranean world or the nether world. In other words, no one is able to sufficiently praise goddess Parvati’s great glories.

<sup>1</sup>Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 342 that employ the same metaphor to stress on the immensity of Lord Ram’s glories and virtues when king Janak has praised the Lord.]

चौ०. सेवत तोहि सुलभ फल चारी । बरदायनी पुरारि पिआरी ॥ १ ॥

sēvata tōhi sulabha phala cārī. baradāyanī purārī pi'ārī. 1.

dēbi pūji pada kamala tumhārē. sura nara muni saba hōhim sukhārē. 2.

Oh the one who bestows boons and is very dear to Purari (Lord Shiva)! By serving you the server (i.e. your devotee) is blessed with the four legendary rewards of life (which are—‘Artha’ or material prosperity, ‘Dharma’ or religious merit, ‘Kaam’ or fulfillment of desires, and ‘Moksha’ or spiritual liberation). (1)

Oh Goddess! By worshipping your lotus-feet, the Gods, the humans and the great sages find contentment and bliss. (2)

[Note—Sita shows her prudence in the way she prays—first she extols the glories of goddess Parvati, and now she praises her benevolent and magnanimous nature, rounding up the praise by saying that her worship rewards everyone—the gods, the ordinary humans and the learned sages.

This prepares the ground for submitting Sita’s actual wish before the goddess. The prayer is cleverly worded to ensure that the goddess would be compelled to think over the submission many times over before rejecting it if she prefers to neglect it, because if that happens (i.e. if she decides not to concede Sita’s requests) then it will go against the very virtues for which this goddess is famed and worshipped. Therefore, the chances of her accepting Sita’s requests are great.

Lord Shiva is known as ‘Purari’ because he had slain the demon named Tripura. To emphasise the fact that the affection and love between Lord Shiva and goddess Parvati is mutual and not one sided, Sita stresses here that “Parvati is very dear to Shiva”. Previously she has already highlighted the immensity of Parvati’s love for Shiva when she had said that “you affectionately look at Shiva’s face just like the Chakori looks at the full moon”—refer: Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 235.

The implication is simple and obvious—Sita wishes to convey to the goddess that the love and affection between her self and Lord Ram is mutual just like the case between the goddess and Shiva. This is very evidently borne out by the narration in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Doha no. 229—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 235. Hence, the goddess must pay heed to Sita’s pleadings and concede to her requests.]

मोर मनोरथु जानहु नीकें । बसहु सदा उर पुर सबही कें ॥ ३ ॥

You are well aware of the wishes of my heart—because you dwell in the heart of all living beings and no thoughts are secret from you. (3)

This is the reason why I have not expressed my wish clearly and have refrained from disclosing it openly in public.’

Saying this, Sita (‘baidēhīm’) caught hold of the divine feet of the goddess Parvati (as an emotional gesture of abject surrender and earnest request that one makes to an Authority in emergency situations of life and death). (4)

[Note—Sita was very desperate and vexed. It was a last chance for her to plead with and please the goddess to intercede on her behalf and fulfill her wishes of marrying Lord Ram, because later in the day and the day following her fate would be sealed for all times to come. If something was to be done by the goddess, then it must be done today before it is too late. This answers the urgency in her pleas and demeanours.

The goddess is supposed to be all-knowing and omniscient. Being so, it would be superfluous and irrelevant to tell her in articulate terms what was in Sita’s mind and heart. The lesson we draw from this particular event is that one must pray to one’s Lord God silently, with lips closed because the Lord God knows very well what his devotee wants. Then, everything else should be left in the hands of the Lord God, giving the latter a free hand to decide what is good for his devoted worshipper. The odds are stacked high in favour of a positive decision by the Lord, a decision that would be for the long-term good of the worshipper.

So, after saying her prayers, Sita clasped the holy feet of the goddess to surrender completely to the goddess’ wish. Now it was up to the deity to listen to and answer the prayers and pleadings of her devotee. This happens quickly as we shall read below. This is another lesson that we learn: if our prayers are sincere and from the inner depth of the heart, then not only we do not need to say our wishes to the Lord God in clear words as if the latter does not know them but we must be sure that our prayers are being heard, considered and answered by the Lord God with a positive attitude.

Sita did not articulate her wish to marry Lord Ram out of shyness. Remember that her companions were closely watching her. If the goddess is all-knowing and all-pervading, she is bound to know what Sita thinks and feels.

By citing the instance of gods, humans and great sages finding bliss and happiness by worshipping the holy feet of the goddess (refer: Chaupai line no. 2 above), Sita implies that since she too has worshipped the goddess’ feet and has surrendered herself at the feet, the goddess must honour her reputation by making her blissful and happy too.]

बिनय प्रेम बस भई भवानी । खसी माल मूरति मुसुकानी ॥ ५ ॥

सादर सियँ प्रसादु सिर धरेऊ । बोली गौरि हरषु हियँ भरेऊ ॥ ६ ॥ binaya prēma basa bha’ī bhavānī. khasī māla mūrati musukānī. 5.

sādara siyam’ prasādu sira dharē’ū. bōlī gauri haraṣu hiyam’ bharē’ū. 6.

Goddess Bhavani (Parvati; the divine consort of Bhava, Lord Shiva’s another name) was extremely pleased by the humble and polite prayers of Sita as well as the love and affection that she showed towards the goddess<sup>1</sup>.

The garland around her image slid down (as a token of the goddess offering it as ‘Prasad’ or divine blessing to Sita who was lying at her feet)<sup>2</sup>. And the image of the goddess smiled benevolently<sup>3</sup>. (5)

Sita devotedly and with a lot of reverence picked up this Prasad (the blessing of the goddess in a token form of the garland) and put it on her head as a mark of the greatest respect towards the goddess, as well as a welcoming sign that the goddess is pleased with her.

Then, Gauri (goddess Parvati) spoke with a cheerful heart. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Three forms of devotion and worship ('Bhakti') are depicted here in the incident of Sita praying to goddess Parvati—(i) physical worship by Sita falling at the feet of the goddess and clasping them reverentially; (ii) worship by speech that Sita does when she offers oral prayers; and (iii) subtle form of devotion that manifested in the way of Sita having great affection for the goddess and her praying to her silently without actually expressing her desires.

<sup>2</sup>An image does not move in physical terms. But a consecrated image of a deity is supposed to harbour life in a very subtle and sublime form. Though the consecrated image of a revered god or goddess is made of worldly material things such as a stone or wood or metal, but it is not lifeless and gross like the sample kept in a museum. This image in a temple has the relevant deity's divine qualities present in it in a very subtle and atomic form. Even as the actual deity is invisible to the eye, these qualities in the consecrated image are also invisible to the lay person's eyes, and under the veil of delusions he begins to see this image as being as lifeless and gross as the sample in a museum. But for devotees, for the wise and learned ones, this image is a manifested form of the revered deity—and if the devotee's devotion, faith, belief and conviction is firm and unwavering, then this very idol begins to exhibit all signs of divinity that the original deity does.

Hence, since Sita had the greatest faith in goddess Parvati and saw her presence in the image or the idol in the temple, this image rewarded her faith and conviction by exhibiting signs of life—giving Sita the garland, and beginning to speak.

There is a remarkable point to note here: the goddess' words were heard by Sita as well as by her companions—refer: Chanda stanza no. 2 that precedes Sortha/Doha no. 236 below. It was Sita who had prayed, and none of her companions. But when the goddess spoke everyone heard it. This proves that Sita was not hallucinating; she was not hearing imaginary voices under delusions.

The physical incident of falling of the garland was interpreted by Sita correctly as a blessing by the goddess and a sign that the latter is pleased with her. For the rest of her companions it must have been a mere coincidence that the garland snapped and fell down at the instant when Sita was lying at the feet of the goddess, though it was an auspicious sign.

<sup>3</sup>The same logic applies here. The image of the goddess was crafted in a way that it had a perpetual smile on her face. But for Sita, this smile assumed a significant contour and delivered a special message—something her companions could not decipher. So while Sita could actually see the goddess smile, the rest of the maids did not see anything significant.

Later on in the story we shall read that when Sita prayed to the holy river Ganges for the well-being of her self, Lord Ram and Laxman while they were on their way to the forest, the deity of the river replied to her and blessed her. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 103—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 104.

In Tulsidas' book "Geetawali Ramayan" also we read that Parvati has blessed Sita in passionate term, telling her that all her wishes would be fulfilled. Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 72, stanza nos. 2-3.]

सुनु सिय सत्य असीस हमारी । पूजिहि मन कामना तुझारी ॥ ७ ॥
नारद बचन सदा सुचि साचा । सो बरु मिलिहि जाहिं मनु राचा ॥ ८ ॥ sunu siya satya asisa hamārī. pūjihi mana kāmanā tumhārī. 7.

nārada bacana sadā suci sēcā. sō baru milihi jāhim manu rēcā. 8.

The Goddess said—'Listen Sita to my blessings. I honour your wishes. (7)

Sage Narad's words are always true (and I have experience of it)<sup>1</sup>. Hence, be certain that you will get the groom whom you wish in your heart<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Parvati was told by Narad that Shiva is destined to be her husband, and inspite of all odds stacked high against this prophesy, it turned out to be true. This entire episode is narrated in Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 66—to Doha no. 98.

Therefore, goddess Parvati has had a first hand experience of how Narad's words come true. In the case of Sita, Narad had also foretold that she would be married to Lord Ram, and hence it can't go wrong. Sita was aware of this prophesy of Narad—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, line no. 1 of Doha no. 229.

One thing worth noting here is that goddess Parvati is blessing Sita to reassure her that she need not worry at all because notwithstanding the goddess' blessings, her wishes of being betrothed to Lord Ram is bound to come true as it has already been prophesised by Narad, and the words of this sage never go in vain because he always speaks the truth.

<sup>2</sup>Remember: Sita had not expressed her wishes in articulate words before the goddess, and therefore goddess reciprocated her sentiments by also not disclosing what she has accepted, except to say that she (the goddess) honours Sita's wishes. This was a privileged communication between the devotee and her deity.]

karunā nidhāna sujāna sīlu sanēhu jānata rāvarō. 2.

Be sure and rest assured that you will get the groom of your choice; the prince who is naturally handsome and dark-complexioned with whom your heart has found fondness, with whom you are enamoured, is sure to be your groom. (Chanda line no. 1)

He (the groom, Lord Ram) is an ocean of grace and mercy, and is indeed wise and a thorough gentleman. He is well aware of your unstinted love and affection for him, as well as your virtuous qualities.' (Chanda line no. 2)

[Note—Sita had prayed to goddess Parvati and had said that “the goddess is all-knowing as she resides in the heart of all living beings, and therefore Sita does not wish to tell her desire to the goddess in articulate words”. Refer: Chaupai line nos. 3-4 above that precede this Chanda.

Since the goddess lives in the heart, she has become aware that Sita has already enshrined the marvelous dark-complexioned image of Lord Ram in her temple-like heart, and has shut its doors so that no one can steal this image from her and also to ensure that no other image can come in to replace Lord Ram's image. This is why the goddess has clearly said that “Sita will get the dark-complexioned prince, whose image she has so lovingly installed in her heart, as her groom”.

What was the necessity for the goddess to outline the important qualities of Lord Ram? Well, Sita had fallen head-over-heels in love of Lord Ram, but she had no way to ascertain what sort of a man he was, what character he had, what his hidden qualities were. That means she may have had certain doubts deep inside her mind. Hence, the all-knowing goddess was aware of this too, so she prudently decided to remove them once and for all by expressly telling Sita that her groom was a thorough gentleman, gracious, merciful and wise. He was all-knowing and omniscient as well—because he knew that she (Sita) loved him. This last statement was intended to assure Sita that she can expect reciprocal affection even after marriage.

An interesting thing that we note in the events in the garden is that while Sita has expressed her clear desire to have Lord Ram as her groom, which is clear from goddess Parvati's assurance to her to this effect in these verses, Lord Ram has neither here nor later said anything of this kind. When the Lord returns to sage Vishwamitra with the flowers that the two brothers had plucked from the garden for his worship rituals, the Lord has simply told the sage everything that happened in the garden, without making any specific request or prayer to the sage to bless him so that the desire of his heart is fulfilled like Sita had prayed to Parvati, though of course it is undeniable that even Lord Ram had wanted to marry Sita. But in spite of the Lord not saying anything expressly, the wise sage could read what was in the Lord's mind. So, the sage blessed the Lord, saying that his wishes would be fulfilled. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 237.

Here, Sita is like the 'Jiva', the living being, and Lord Ram of course is the 'Parmatma', the Supreme Being. A time comes in life when the Jiva and the Parmatma are face to face with each other. The Jiva should then recognise his or her Lord; if this chance is lost then it is lost for good. The Parmatma welcomes the Jiva with an open arm, but the Jiva must have a burning desire to meet the Lord and surrender him/herself to him for the rest of his/her life. In other words, it is the Jiva who has to step forward to express a sincere desire to attain the Lord, and while the Lord is welcoming he must make sure that this desire is honest and truthful.

In the case of Sita, Lord Ram had tested her will and sincerity before actually accepting her by breaking the bow. First in the garden itself the Lord observed her trance-like state as soon as they met, then he observed how she was looking back over her shoulders to have a last glimpse of the Lord, then the way she begged goddess Parvati to bless her. Later on, at the time of the actual breaking of the bow, the Lord had waited for some time to closely observe the emotions of Sita and her facial expressions, and when he determined that she was on the verge of collapse if he delayed a little longer, he grabbed the bow and broke it in an instant—refer: Baal Kand, Doha no. 260—to Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 261 that wonderfully describe those delicate moments of make-or-break.

What conclusion do we draw from this? Well, the inference is clear: If the creature, the living being, is sincere in his heart to attain the Lord, he should be rest assured that his desires would be fulfilled. But at the same time he should be prepared to pass a tough test. It's not possible to cheat upon the Supreme Lord like the way one cheats the world by external pretensions and use of clever words.]

Hearing this blessing of Gauri (i.e. goddess Parvati), Sita and her friends felt very glad in their hearts (because it was now certain that their cherished wish would be surely be fulfilled). (Chanda line no. 3)

Tulsidas says Sita worshipped and paid her obeisance to the goddess repeatedly, and after that she headed back to her palace with a lot of cheer and bliss in her heart. (Chanda line no. 4)

[Note—Tulsidas was a very clever, sagacious and erudite author. He was expert with words, and crafted his narration in such a way that at many places one can interpret a stanza in different ways.

For instance, line no. 2 of this stanza has the word “Tulsidas” so strategically placed that besides the meaning given above this line may also mean—“Tulsidas joins Sita in repeatedly thanking and worshipping goddess Parvati, and pleading with her that Sita gets the dark-complexioned groom. After the prayers, Sita headed for her palace with a cheerful heart”.]

Realizing that goddess Gauri (Parvati) is favourable towards her, the happiness, the contentedness and bliss in Sita's heart was so immense that it cannot be described or spoken of in words.

As a sign of auspicious future, the organs on the left side of her body began fluttering. (Sortha/Doha no. 236)

[Note—This Sortha, which is a sort of Doha, concludes the narration of Sita coming to the garden to offer worship to goddess Parvati to request the latter to grant her a suitable groom, and returning home with a bag-full of fulfilled wishes by way of an assurance from the goddess that she will get a husband whom she desires.

What a wonderful way of winding up the worship ritual—a devotee coming to his or her deity with an empty bag of hopes and expectations, and returning with this bag filled according to his or her wishes!]

चौ०. हृदयँ सराहत सीय लोनाई । गुर समीप गवने दोउ भाई ॥ १ ॥

rāma kahā sabu kausika pāhīm. sarala subhā'u chu'ata chala nāhīm. 2.

Lauding and extolling the bewitching beauty and the extraordinary charm of Sita in their hearts, the two brothers (Ram and Laxman) returned to their Guru (sage Vishwamitra). (1)

Lord Ram did not hide anything from Kaushik (sage Vishwamitra), and narrated everything as it happened to him. This is because Ram had no guilt in his conscience and was free from any mental taints. (2)

[Note—These two lines are very important for removing any doubts in the mind of the reader about the character of the two brothers. For a modern man who knows only the grosser aspects of creation, the incident of the garden is like a fairy-tale romance between a prince and a princess wherein both fall in love with each other. Though it is undeniable that it did happen, but there wasn't an element of physical passion and lust in it. It was a divine love—it was an eternal love between two souls that were separated by the physical world; it was a reiteration of an eternal bond between two individuals that had existed earlier also, and that went beyond the present life. This is proved by the fact that sage Narad had already predicted that Sita would be betrothed to Lord Ram—refer: (i) Doha no. 229, and (ii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 236.

Sita had known this, but what about Lord Ram? By telling everything to sage Vishwamitra the Lord came out clean; he had nothing to hide; there was no deceit. Only when a man's heart is free of moral corruption will he gather courage to tell his elders about such personal experiences as witnessed by the Lord in the garden which, on the face of it, smacks of worldly grossness and passion. Ordinarily a boy would make all sorts of attempts to hide such an incident, but the two brothers had no taint in their pure heart, and therefore disclosed everything to the sage voluntarily.

There is another important reason for telling the Guru whatever happened in the garden. Lord Ram had subtly wanted to inform the sage that he is enamoured with Sita and would prefer if things turn favourable and he is given a chance to marry her. This message was important because it would give the sage a free hand to find a chance where he would order Lord Ram to break the bow and marry Sita. This was a very sensitive matter of the heart, and a personal thing as well. The Lord did not expect the sage to openly ask him if he would like to marry Sita; that would look very indecent and improper. The Lord also knew about the sage's immense mystical powers—so by subtly informing him that he has fallen in love with Sita and would welcome a chance to marry her, the Lord gave a clear signal to the sage to employ his mystical powers to maneuver things in his favour.

We have already read how Sita had prayed to Parvati to make it possible for her to marry Lord Ram. Sita knew about the great powers that the goddess possessed, besides the fact that she was the divine consort of Lord Shiva whose bow was to be broken. Thus, if Parvati wished she can turn things to favour Sita. This is exactly what Lord Ram might have thought while disclosing his experience to sage Vishwamitra—he knew that the sage had mighty powers and if he wanted he can make things happen in such a way that Sita is married to the Lord.

The sage was very wise and prudent. We will read soon that during the bow breaking event, when nobody could as much as move the bow an inch, sage Vishwamitra ordered Lord Ram to get up and break the bow. This helped to maintain decorum and dignity of the Lord; it showed to the assembly that Lord Ram had broken the bow only on the instructions of the great sage Vishwamitra, and that otherwise he wasn't eying to marry Sita. This sequence of events pre-empted all tongues from wagging and spreading a scandal. After all, once the sage had given the order, Lord Ram had no choice but to obey it. The Lord could not say 'no', for it would be utter disobedience of the sage and something unthinkable. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 254.]

suphala manōratha hōhum' tumhārē. rāmu lakhanu suni bha'ē sukhārē. 4.

When the sage received the flowers brought by the two brothers, he performed his worship ritual. After that he blessed the two brothers. (3)

The sage blessed them by saying 'let your hopes be fulfilled'. Hearing these words of the sage, Lord Ram and Laxman felt very happy and contented. (4)

[Note—The two brothers had gone to the royal garden to bring flowers for the sage. So when they returned, the sage completed his worship.

At the time of his worship the sage requested the deity he worshipped to fulfill the wishes of the two brothers because he was very obliged to them. The reason was that they had helped the sage complete his fire sacrifice by eliminating the demons who were constantly defiling it. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 210. So the sage wished to reward them, and what greater reward can he give them than fulfilling their wish.

Now, an interesting development has occurred here. The sage has blessed both the brothers that their wishes would be fulfilled. Of course we know that the wish of Lord Ram was to marry Sita; but what about Laxman? Well, Laxman was Lord Ram's younger brother, and he always respected Ram and his wishes. So there is no question of Laxman having any secret thoughts about Sita. All he wished was that his elder brother Ram could marry Sita so that he will also have a chance to see her and keep company with them for the rest of his life.

But it is also possible that Laxman had harboured an inner desire to marry along with Lord Ram. Though it was impossible for Laxman to marry Sita because his elder brother Lord Ram should be married first, there was all possibility that Laxman could be married to one of Sita's sisters. Laxman guessed, and guessed correctly, that if Sita is so beautiful then her sister would be also equally beautiful. As we shall see later on, this is exactly what happened: Laxman was married to Sita's sister named Urmila—refer: Baal Kand, line no. 1-2 of Chanda stanza no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 325.

Like goddess Parvati blessing Sita that her wishes would be fulfilled, sage Vishwamitra also blessed the two brothers that their wishes would be fulfilled. Is this not a remarkable play of Providence and Fate that both Sita and the two brothers, Lord Ram and Laxman, are blessed almost simultaneously that their wishes would be fulfilled? ]

At the end of the day, when twilight came, the two brothers took the Guru's permission and went out to perform their evening worship called 'Sandhya'. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This was a standard practice with sages. After performing worship and taking their meals, they used to take rest for a while, and then in the afternoon hours they used to preach and listen to discourses revolving around ancient scriptures. This session continued till the time of sunset when they would perform their evening worship.]

At that time a beautiful moon rose in the eastern direction (on the horizon in the eastern sky). Seeing that it resembled the face of Sita in its charm and beauty, Lord Ram felt happy and cheerful. (7)

But he had second thoughts in his heart: the ‘Himkar’ (the moon) was no match for Sita’s face (or Sita’s body—‘sīya badana’; ‘Siya’ = Sita’s, and ‘Badan’ = body, meaning here her full form). (8)

[Note—The moon had a full disc, and hence it was a full-moon night. The disc of a full moon has been traditionally used as a metaphor for beauty and bliss. So when Lord Ram first saw the moon he remembered Sita’s face and likened it with her. But he immediately changed his thoughts when he started analyzing and comparing them. Though apparently the moon looked astoundingly beautiful, but it had some negative qualities in it, and therefore it would be inappropriate to compare it with the immaculacy of Sita.

What are some of the inherent defects with the moon? They are enumerated in the verses following below.

It should be carefully noted here that only the face of a woman of a noble family is visible to the onlooker as she is expected to keep the remaining part covered by her wearing apparel. This is a sign of modesty and good behaviour. So was the case with Sita; only her face was visible. When the poet says ‘body’ he means the face, and if the face is beautiful one deduces that the rest of her form would also be in the likeness of the face—because the ‘face is the mirror of the person’.]

‘The moon has its birth from the ocean; it has poison as his sibling; its shine dims and vanishes from sight during the daytime; and its disc is marred by dark spots which are tantamount to some form of scar on its reputation.

Say, how can this poor and wretched moon ever be compared with the perfectly immaculate face of Sita? (Doha no. 237)

[Note—Legend has it that the moon was born when the celestial ocean was churned by the gods and the demons in search of Amrit, the elixir of eternal life. One of the things that were produced by this churning was a pot of severe poison known as Halaahal. Therefore, the moon has this poison as his sibling.

Though wonderful during the darkness of the night, its glory fades during the day under the more brilliant shine of the sun. This is not a fit comparison with Sita because she would stand out in a crowd as the finest lady on earth. No other lady would be able to eclipse Sita’s beauty and charm with her own.

The face of the moon has dark spots whereas Sita’s face is perfectly clean and spotless, and shining radiantly.

Hence, to compare the fullness of the beauty of Sita’s face with the disc of the moon would be wrong and faulty. In the verses following herein below, some of the inherent faults with the moon are given, which would show why the comparison is inappropriate.]

The moon waxes and wanes throughout its life<sup>1</sup>, its appearance gives a lot of emotional pain (torment) to those who are love-struck and separated from their beloved<sup>2</sup>, and is devoured by the demon named Rahu when it crosses its path<sup>3</sup>. (1)

It torments the 'Koka' (or 'Chakravaak', the ruddy goose)<sup>4</sup>, and it is inimical to the lotus because the latter shrivels and withers on appearance of the moon<sup>5</sup>.

Therefore, oh Moon, you have a lot of defects or shortcomings<sup>6</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The face of the moon does not constantly remain rounded—except for one night, it waxes and wanes for the rest of the month. It means that its beauty is unsteady and it goes on becoming lesser each night till it is completely surrounded by darkness on the dark-moon night. When the moon is personalised, this is used to indicate that its beauty and shine are reduced as it grows older, and finally its glories vanish on the dark-moon night. Nothing of the sort happens with Sita—the radiance and youthfulness of her face is ever so constant and brilliant.

There is an ancient story in the Purans about the face of the moon waxing and waning. It is narrated in Mahabharat, Shalya Parva, in the conversation between Vaishmpaayan and Janmanjaye.

It is briefly as follows—Twenty-seven daughters of Prajaapti Daksha were married to the Moon God. They were called 'Nakshatra' or stars that shine around the moon. Out of them, Rohini was the most beautiful. That is why the Moon God spent the most of his time with her. The rest of the wives complained to their father, Daksha, about this partisan attitude of the Moon God who was expected to treat all of them equally.

Daksha summoned the Moon and requested him to treat all the wives equally and spend equal time with all of them. But the Moon did not pay heed, and so the other wives complained to their father Daksha once again that the Moon God is not obeying his instructions. Daksha once again summoned Moon and finally ordered him to treat all his wives equally, otherwise Daksha would curse him. But the Moon God still did not pay heed.

Angry, Daksha then created 'Yakshma' or the disease known as Tuberculosis. Yakshma entered the body of Moon. This disease began to eat into the innards of the Moon God, and over time the latter's glory and radiance began to fade. Since the Moon God was also responsible for nourishing herbs and medicinal plants, the latter's growth was stunted. Those which managed to germinate somehow had no taste or curative powers.

The Gods were alarmed as this would lead to annihilation of creation as no diseases would be cured, and people and animals would die like in the plague. So they approached Daksha and pleaded with him to neutralize the effects of his curse on the Moon God, for otherwise all the medicinal herbs would be destroyed.

Daksha replied—‘If the Moon begins to treat all his wives, the Nakshatras, equally, and takes a bath in the river Saraswati on an auspicious occasion as a token of repentance, then his curse would be nullified and he would regain his lost health and glory. But my curse cannot be permanently eliminated, so the Moon would be subjected to decrease in his radiance for half the month and increase for the next half. This will also help to keep him reminded about his duty towards all his wives, the Nakshatras.

Let him (Moon God) go to the shores of the western ocean where river Saraswati meets the ocean, and worship Lord Shiva there. This is the only way he will regain his lost glory and radiance.’

The Moon God, also known as ‘Som’, went to the designated pilgrim site known as Prabhaas Kshetra on the night of Amaawasya (dark moon night), and performed penance as advised by the Gods. Then he began to gradually regain his radiance till it reached its zenith on the full moon night known as Purnima.

When the moon attains its full health and vigour on the full moon night, the Gods begin to draw Amrit or the elixir of life that is stored in the body of the moon. This is why from the next day the moon begins to be reduced in shine and glory till everything stored is exhausted and it becomes dark. Once again, due to Lord Shiva’s blessings, the moon begins to regain its glory till it reaches full on the full moon night.

This is a continuous cycle of creation and destruction as envisioned in the Purans in a symbolic manner. This also explains why the moon waxes and wanes constantly.

<sup>2</sup>Whereas the moon provides emotional support to love-struck couples who are together, it torments those who are separated. Hence, its value as an enhancer of love, provider of bliss and happiness, and an intensifier of emotions is doubtful. On the other hand, Sita always gives bliss and happiness to all when she is around; her presence is equally welcomed by those who are happy as well as those who are tormented.

<sup>3</sup>The moon is eclipsed when it is devoured by the mythical demon named Rahu. But no one dare eclipse the glory and the radiance of Sita.

The story of the moon being devoured by Rahu is briefly as follows— The legend has it that Rahu was the eldest son of the demon Viprachitti and his wife Shinghikaa. His younger brothers were Ilvala, Vaataapi, Narak amongst others. When Lord Vishnu, disguised as the beautiful Mohini, was distributing the ambrosia of eternity called Amrit to the Gods during the episode of the churning of the ocean as told in the Purans, Rahu assumed the form of a God and surreptitiously entered the lines of the Gods to take this Amrit. When his cheating was discovered, Vishnu cut off his head with his weapon called the Chakra Sudarshan (a circular saw-like discus). But it so happened that before the head was severed Rahu had already drunk some Amrit, and so did not die. His head and torso became two independent entities. The former was called ‘Rahu’ and the latter ‘Ketu’.

Since the Moon God and the Sun God had betrayed him, Rahu takes revenge by devouring them periodically to satisfy his hunger. He devours them when they are in their full glory—viz. he devours the Moon God during the full moon night, and the Sun God only during the day time, either when the sun rises or during its journey across the sky, but never at sunset when the sun is already losing its radiance and is on the decline.

Again, since the head of Rahu was severed from the neck, hence both the Moon God and the Sun God re-emerge from the lower end of the head after they have been devoured by the mouth of Rahu. This is why the moon and the sun appear to be getting gradually cut-off from view from one end of their discs, symbolizing their gradually entering the mouth of Rahu as the latter begins to devour them. Then for some time they remain dark or obstructed from view symbolizing the period when they remain inside the mouth of Rahu. Finally, they gradually regain their original shape symbolizing their ejection from the lower end of Rahu's neck where it was severed from the trunk.

The story of Rahu appears in Srimad Bhagwat Maha Puran, Chapter 8, Canto 9.

Actually however, the phenomenon of the lunar eclipse is due to the earth's shadow falling on the moon's surface when it comes in the path of this shadow during its revolution around the earth. This scientific fact was known to the great Rishis (sages and seers) who had preached the Upanishads, and it is clearly mentioned in Varaaha Upanishad, Canto 2, verse no. 74 of the Krishna Yajur Veda tradition which says "When the moon is said to be devoured by the demon Rahu (the severed head of a demon) during the lunar eclipse, people start offering worship, making sacrifices, doing penances, taking purifying baths, giving alms and making charities, observing austerities etc. so that the Moon God is freed from the demon's curse, but all their deeds are a waste of effort and done in utter ignorance because there is no such event, and the darkness on the moon's disc is actually a shadow of the earth falling upon it. This shadow would go away on its own when the time comes even if no such hue and cry is raised by worried worshippers. So it is a height of stupidity and profound ignorance to even think that the Moon God has been cursed or is being devoured, and by doing so many religious deeds it can be freed from its torments."

Similarly, the solar eclipse is caused when the moon comes in between the shiny surface of the sun and the view from earth, thereby blocking the former's view from the latter's surface.

The elongated torso of Rahu came to known as 'Ketu' and it is recognized as the comet in modern science. That is why sighting of the comet is regarded as a bad omen.

Both Rahu and Ketu are placed amongst the nine planets. They represent the two nodal points where the celestial equator cuts the ecliptic.

In iconography, Rahu is depicted as just a head or even as a snake's hood.

<sup>4</sup>The male and female birds known as 'Chakravaak' or the ruddy goose stay together in the day, but as soon as night appears they separate from one another. They are not disturbed by the scorching sun during the daytime, but the wretched moon, though reputed to be cool and calm, is so unbearable for this bird that as soon as the moon appears in the sky they separate from one another. In other words, instead of creating an environment wherein two lovers come together, this fellow moon is a creator of nuisance so much so that its mere appearance terrifies the Chakravaak and the couple separate in the fear that their union would be disrupted by the moon as it may harm one of them and cause the partner's death. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 29.

<sup>5</sup>The moon also acts as a nuisance for the lotus. The lotus opens its petals at day-break and blooms, but as soon as night appears and the moon rises on the horizon the lotus closes. In other words, the lotus does not like to see the moon; it hates the moon.

How ironical it is! The harmless bird Chakravaak is tormented by the moon forcing the couple (the male and the female birds) to separate, and the lotus flower which is loved by all is also sneered at by the moon, forcing it to shut down its petals.

<sup>6</sup>There are three types of creatures in this world: those who live on land, those who live in the sky, and those who live in water. The moon does not refrain from tormenting all of them. It torments lovers who are separated—an instance of its hate for those who live on land. It torments the bird Chakravaak—an instance of its hate for those who live in the sky. It torments the lotus—an instance of its hate for those who live in water.

The moon, therefore, is a source of grief and pain to all sorts of living beings. This is not true with Sita—whose mere presence spreads cheer, happiness, joy and bliss. So, it is absolutely wrong and incredulous to even think of drawing a parallel between the two, Sita and the moon.]

siya mukha chabi bidhu byāja bakhānī. gura pahim calē nisā baṛi jānī. 4.

Comparing the moon with the face of Vaidehi (Sita) would therefore be very wrong and highly inappropriate. One would not like to be blamed for such foolishness (and surely I, Ram, would not commit this mistake).' (3)

Thus, finding in the moon a pretext for lauding the magnificent charm and beauty of Sita's face or countenance, and holding that she is far better than the Moon God himself, Lord Ram returned to his Guru (sage Vishwamitra) because it was getting late in the night. (4)

[Note—To whom was Lord Ram speaking? Well, he was speaking to his younger brother Laxman. Remember: the two brothers had nothing to hide from each other. This is proved on two earlier occasions—(i) when Lord Ram first saw Sita in the garden, he told Laxman briefly about her: Refer:- from Doha no. 230—to Doha no. 231 which clearly endorse this point; and (ii) when the two brothers together told sage Vishwamitra everything about their meeting with Sita: Refer:- Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 237.

Again, Lord Ram tells his inner thoughts to Laxman in Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 238. We shall be reading it below. We shall discover that on this occasion, Laxman has answered to his brother's emotional outpourings.

Laxman had kept quiet on the earlier occasion in the garden and had let Ram do the talking. Similarly here too Laxman quietly listened to the emotional outbursts of his elder brother.

Verse no. 4 says that “it was late in the night”—this shows that Lord Ram has spent quite a bit of time gazing at the moon and thinking of Sita, so love-struck was he.

Another reason for being late in the night was that first the two brothers had performed the evening worship known as ‘Sandhya’ which is best done after sunset. It must have taken some time. Then they sat down and begin to gaze at the full moon, so wonderful it looked in the sky. It was then that Lord Ram begins to think of Sita, and must have been so lost in his thoughts that he forgot how time passed.]

After returning to their Guru's place, the brothers bowed at the lotus-like feet of the sage. When the sage ordered them, they retired for the night<sup>1</sup>. (5)
 At the end of the night, Raghunaayak (Lord Ram, the chief of the Raghu dynasty) woke up. When he saw his brother Laxman, he began to speak as follows—(6)

--- 'Oh dear brother! Look, the sun has risen. It is a provider of cheer and happiness to the 'Koka' (the bird Chakravaak) as well as to the lotus<sup>2</sup>. (7)

Laxman joined the palms of his hands as a token gesture of respect and said politely—'Oh Lord! They (the bird Chakravaak and the lotus) stand for your glory and potentials<sup>3</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Ram and Laxman had wished to massage the feet of their guru, sage Vishwamitra, as a token of their service for the guru which is a standard practice for disciples. They had done this earlier also—refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 226. But on that occasion it was not late in the night as it is on this present occasion. So the Guru ordered them to go to take rest immediately.

Ram has not forgotten the two instances he had cited the previous night—the Chakravaak and the lotus. So he repeats it again. This shows that during the night he was thinking of Sita all the time.

But this time, Laxman cut him short; he interjected and used these two examples as metaphors to say how they stand for Lord Ram's own glory and portend victory over adversaries in the battle of the bow to gain success in obtaining the hands of Sita in marriage. Let us read on and find out what Laxman says.

<sup>3</sup>It's very interesting. Laxman feared that if he did not interject and cut his lovelorn elder brother short then he would launch into another lecture on some subject related to the sun, and compare its brilliance and stunning dazzle with Sita. So, despite cutting Lord Ram's anticipated long-drawn lecture short, Laxman did not want to offend his elder brother whom he loved and respected highly. Therefore, he wisely found an excuse to politely turn the conversation away from another emotional outburst of Ram to something that would sound encouraging to him and motivate him to keep his spirits and hopes high as his wish of marrying Sita would surely be fulfilled.

We shall now read below how Laxman has compared the rising sun and its effect on the Chakravaak as well as the lotus with the rising glory of Lord Ram and the effect his presence has or would have on his devotees. Refer: Doha no. 238—to Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that precede Doha no. 239 herein below.]

With sun-rise, the lily has faded (i.e. it has closed its petals indicating lose of its vigour and glory), and the brightness of the stars have also dimmed and begun to gradually vanish altogether.

It is just like the case of your arrival (at the bow-breaking venue) that would make the assembled kings and princes shrivel up or shrink and lose their strength, valour, radiance and glory, reducing them to a lack-lustre assembly of defeated and dejected persons. (Doha no. 238)

[Note—Here, Laxman compares Lord Ram with the splendorous Sun. The sun's rising in the horizon is like Lord Ram's arrival at the venue of the bow ceremony. The shriveling of the lily is like the kings and princes drooping when they see Lord Ram walking in majestically at the venue. And the fading of the stars is equivalent to decimation of the glory of all the kings and princes who would assemble at the venue.

In this assembly, Lord Ram would be like the sun which sits majestically in the sky and shines alone, eclipsing all other heavenly bodies, including the stars as well as the moon. In other words, small as well as big kings and princes, all would be decimated and trounced in the competition to break the bow. Once they see Lord Ram in their midst, they would be dejected and ashamed of themselves. The Lord's handsome personality and overbearing presence would make all of them lose confidence in themselves and be overwhelmed by an inferiority complex. Their morale would go for a toss, and even if they attempt to break the bow they would do it half-heartedly because the fear of defeat would be constantly nagging at their minds, reducing their abilities and confidence.

All the assembled kings and princes are twinkling like stars. Their inconsequential light would not be able to remove the darkness symbolised by the heaviness of the bow<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Just like the case of the lotus, the Chakravaak (ruddy goose), the honey-bees and the countless birds have become happy that the night has ended (and the sun has risen) [2], Oh Lord, all your devotees and followers would also feel extremely exhilarated and blissful when the bow is broken by you [3]<sup>2</sup>. (2-3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In this verse, Laxman has compared all the kings and princes who have assembled to break the bow to countless stars twinkling with feeble light in the dark night, and the darkness of the night is compared to the heaviness of the bow. These thousands of stars aren't able to remove even a bit of the darkness of the night. Similarly, even if all the princes and kings would try their hands simultaneously at lifting the bow, they would fail to move it even a fraction of an inch because the bow would prove too heavy for them. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 245.

Then who or what removes the darkness of the night? The irony is that the moon is also not able to remove the darkness of the night even though it is the brightest body in the night sky. Then what removes this darkness? The obvious answer is—'it is the sun'.

Now, from this we make some interesting deductions. At the bow breaking venue, besides the kings and princes who were like the twinkling stars, there was Sita who is compared to the 'moon' by none other than Lord Ram himself. But we shall find when we reach the point of the story which describes the actual breaking of the bow that inspite of Sita's presence the 'gloom or depression represented by the darkness caused by the heaviness of the bow remained intact'. That is, her presence at the venue could do nothing to remove the cause of uncertainty of her future by making the bow light. Even as Lord Ram approaches the bow, Sita has prayed fervently to so many gods and goddesses to make the bow light, and had at last took the refuge of the mighty bow itself to plead with it to become light so that Lord Ram can lift and break it. In other words, this 'moon' could not remove the darkness represented by the heaviness of the bow.

Then we shall read that as soon as Lord Ram neared the bow and stood close to it, the bow suddenly became light as a feather. It was easily lifted by him, pulled and broken. This removed the gloom that had cast its dark shadow on Sita and the rest of her family as well as the entire city of Janakpur. So what does it signify? Well, as soon as the 'sun' represented by Lord Ram neared the darkness of the night symbolized by the bow, the darkness vanished and the bow became light as a feather. What did this 'darkness' imply? It implied gloom and depression because the stubborn heaviness of the bow would prevent anyone from breaking it and it would result in Sita remaining unmarried for life. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 251—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 252.

This entire episode is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 240—to Doha no. 261.

Now let us examine the effect that Lord Ram's presence had on the bow. We have already read that the Lord is compared to the sun. There are three stages in the relationship between the sun and the night. (i) Everyone knows that even during the night the sun is present in the heavens, but it is present on the other side of the earth. This is the first stage in this relationship—which shows that in spite of its presence near the earth, the sun does not remove the darkness of the night. (ii) The second and third stages are closely related to each other and the latter follows the former quickly. The second stage is when the sun is below the horizon as it approaches to remove the darkness of the night. During this stage only the eastern sky is illuminated while the rest of the sky and the western horizon still remain dark. The night has not gone altogether; it still lingers on. (iii) Then we reach the third and final stage when the sun actually rises up the line of the horizon and makes its presence clear to the night sky. The darkness of the night now leaves the sky immediately, from corner to corner. Before the sun actually rises above the horizon, we can't say that the night has ended.

A similar thing has happened in the case of Lord Ram and the bow losing its heaviness when he came close to it. While the Lord was sitting on his chair amongst other guests in the assembly, it was similar to the first stage when the sun is near the earth but unable to remove its veil of darkness. Remember: The bow was placed on a raised platform specially erected for the purpose of the bow ceremony. Steps led to it. The guests sat at a distance in a circle around this special raised platform. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 240 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 8, and Doha no. 244.

When sage Vishwamitra ordered him to go and break the bow and remove the darkness of gloom that had fallen on the assembly like a thick blanket of fog, Lord Ram rose from his seat. This was tantamount to the sun coming near the horizon to prepare to remove the darkness of the night. But the Lord was still below the platform where the bow was kept—like the sun still remaining below the horizon in the early hours of dawn before sunrise. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 254.

Then the Lord actually stepped on the platform and came close to the bow. This was like the sun actually stepping up from below the line of the horizon and making its majestic presence visible in the sky. As soon as this happened—i.e. as soon as Lord Ram stepped up the platform and came close to the bow—it lost its heaviness. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Doha no. 254; (ii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 260; and (iii) Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 261.

<sup>2</sup>All the entities listed here become active as soon as the sun rises. The lotus opens, the Chakravaak couples unite, the bees start buzzing and hovering over flowers in search of nectar, and the birds start chirping and hopping as soon as the day breaks. Here, Laxman has compared them to the devotees and followers of Lord Ram. All of them would be excited and happy.

Now, who are the followers who will be glad and feel rewarded? Well, all the citizens of Janakpur had yearned that Sita be married to Lord Ram. This is abundantly clear in the narration that is described at the following places—

(i) when the two brothers had gone to visit Janakpur for the purpose of sight-seeing: refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 220—to Doha no. 223; and

(ii) during the bow breaking ceremony itself: refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 240; Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 249; Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precedes Doha no. 255; Chaupai line nos. 1 and 8 that precede Doha no. 262; Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 286 (that says that besides the citizens, king Janak and Sita too found extreme happiness when Lord Ram broke the bow); and Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 263 as well as Doha no. 318 (that say that the queen mother and her companions were happy too).

Not only them, but the rest of the world, including the gods in the heaven were also very happy—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 4-6 that precede Doha no. 240; (ii) Doha no. 264; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 265; (iv) Doha no. 285; (v) Doha no. 324.]

The sun, as soon as it rises, removes the darkness of the night without making any effort; it is spontaneous and natural. The stars have gone into hiding, and light (of happiness and cheer) has spread throughout the world. (4)

The splendorous sun has used its rising as a sign to reveal to all the kings and princes about your brilliant glories and excellent virtues. (5)

[Note—These observations of Laxman have been endorsed later on in the narration when the assembly gathered at the venue of the bow breaking ceremony. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 245 which says that “when the assembled kings saw Lord Ram in their midst, all of them felt defeated in their hearts just like the stars lose their shine as soon as the sun rises”.

The glory and potentials of Lord Ram have been consistently compared with the sun in Ram Charit Manas. For instance, refer—(i) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 31; (ii) Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 209.]

The incident of the bow-breaking ceremony has been designed by the creator as a valley from which the sun representing your valour, strength of arms and glory would rise up to illuminate the rest of the world. In other words, the creator has devised this simple means to highlight and introduce to the world the might of the strength of your arms, your splendorous glory and your majestic personality, as well as to establish you as the mightiest warrior on earth.<sup>1</sup> (6)

Lord Ram smiled upon hearing the words of his brother<sup>2</sup>. Then he performed his ablution to clean himself though he is always clean and without any (mental, emotional and physical) corruption. (7)

After finishing his daily routine, Lord Ram (and Laxman) came back to their Guru and bowed their graceful heads at the lotus-like feet of their Guru (as a token of showing respect to him). (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Everything that happens in this mortal world is determined by the creator. He wished to tell the world about Lord Ram's arrival to eliminate the formidable demons. So he devised a clever ruse of the bow-breaking ceremony. This would make it possible to bring together under one roof all the great warriors and kings and princes of the world of that time. Even the gods and demons had come there to participate or just to witness the bow ceremony. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 251.

If Lord Ram achieves some miraculous success in this assembly then there would be no need to devise other elaborate methods to establish him and his glory on earth.

According to legend, even the king of demons, Ravana of Lanka, had come there. But he did not attempt to approach the bow but had surreptitiously sneaked out and went home.]

<sup>2</sup>Lord Ram smiled at the clever way in which Laxman had interpreted the things, and how he has subtly encouraged the Lord to cheer up as he is sure to break the bow and marry Sita. What made Laxman so certain that this would really happen?

Well, earlier, sage Vishwamitra had blessed them that their wishes would be fulfilled—refer: Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 237 above. Laxman knew what his brother's wish was, and he used this opportunity to encourage him to cheer up and remain confident.

In the story of the Ramayana we find that like a true friend and companion, Laxman has consistently helped Ram when he is passing through a depressing and uncertain moment. Refer Ram Charit Manas—(i) Ayodhya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 70—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 73 which narrate how Laxman decided to accompany the Lord when he was sent to 14 years of forest exile; and (ii) Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 30 which says that at the moment when Lord Ram was crestfallen and extremely dejected when he found that Sita has been abducted, it was Laxman who lent gave him immense moral support and encouraged the Lord not to lose hope and make efforts to find and retrieve her.

Another reason for the Lord smiling is this: Normally Laxman did not interject when his elder brother was speaking. But in this case he immediately began to speak as soon as Lord Ram opened his mouth and said something about the sun. Refer: Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 238. This was an improper conduct for Laxman. But he had managed not to offend his elder brother by giving such a positive spin to his interjection that though he had cut short his love-struck elder brother's anticipated long-drawn emotional outpourings like the one witnessed on two previous occasions—the first one was in the garden when he had first seen Sita (refer: Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 231), and the second one was during the evening prayers when he had seen the rising moon (refer: from Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 237—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 238)—he only caused Lord Ram to feel amused. The Lord realized that Laxman wished to keep him shut, and was so wise and clever that he managed to do without offending the Lord by praising his glories and comparing him to the sun.]

King Janak then (i.e. at approximately the time when Lord Ram had returned to his Guru after completing his morning routine chores) summoned Satanand (Janak's royal priest; pronounced “satānanda”) and immediately sent him to sage Kaushik (Vishwamitra). (9)

He (Satanand) came to sage Vishwamitra and told him about the request of Janak (i.e. he invited the sage to the bow-breaking ceremony). Vishwamitra became glad and he cheerfully called the two brothers. (10)

[Note— Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 84, stanza no. 2 also.

Other invited guests, the countless king and princes, had already started arriving at the venue and occupying their seats. All of them were anxious and eager to take a vantage point so that they do not miss the excitement of the rare event even a bit. It was getting late. But the king had to wait before he could allow the ceremony to start because sage Vishwamitra had to arrive at the site first. The sage was a special invitee, and he was the only great sage who was personally invited by the king; the king had shown special respect to him and had gone personally to meet him when the sage, along with Lord Ram and Laxman, had come to Janakpur, and after paying his due respects to him the king had escorted him inside the city and lodged him at a palace close to the royal residence. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 214—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 217.

Other guests had arrived early at the venue and were scrambling for seats, but the sage maintained his dignity and waited patiently for a formal invitation from the king. Remember: The king had posted attendants at the place where the sage and the two brothers were lodged. They were assigned the duty to take care of the sage's needs. They gave the king feedback about who had entered and left the place. This is a normal treatment given to special invitees of a host. So it was only when they informed the king that the two brothers had returned back after their morning prayers and bathing rituals, and the sage had finished his worship formalities that the king summoned his priest Satanand and hurriedly sent him to invite the sage and the two brothers because it was getting late and the crowd was getting restive.

It is to be noted that the two brothers were not present when Satanand met sage Vishwamitra. The brothers always maintained decorum and dignity by not unnecessarily staying too close with the Guru and not disturbing his privacy. Of course they would immediately come as soon as the Guru called them as they stayed close by. They did not want to be an irritating element when the Guru meets someone privately and have some talk with the guest, for it may happen that their presence might not be liked by any one of them, the Guru or the guest, and they did not want to give them a chance to tell them to move out of the place. This had happened earlier also: when king Janak had come to meet sage Vishwamitra outside the city, the two brothers were not present at that moment. They had arrived a little later. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 214—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 215.

Again we find that still earlier when sage Vishwamitra had arrived in the court of king Dasrath, the father of the brothers, at Ayodhya, all the four brothers had paid their respects and had moved away, leaving the sage and their father to converse in private. That is why the king had ‘called the two brothers, Lord Ram and Laxman’ once again to send them with the sage to the latter’s hermitage to protect the fire sacrifice. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 207; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 208 respectively.

Sage Vishwamitra was waiting for this moment because he had brought Lord Ram and Laxman to Janakpur precisely to attend the bow breaking ceremony. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 9-10 that precede Doha no. 210. That is why when Satanand came to invite him, he felt glad and called in the two brothers cheerfully.]

दो०. सतानंद पद बंदि प्रभु बैठे गुर पहिं जाइ ।

satānanda pada bandi prabhu baiṭhē gura pahim jā'i.

calahu tāta muni kahē'u taba paṭhavā janaka bōlā'i. 239.

The Lord (Sri Ram) paid his obeisance at the feet of Satanand and then went and sat down near his Guru (sage Vishwamitra). The sage then told him—‘King Janak has sent in his invitation (for us to attend the bow-breaking ceremony). So come dear son, let us go there. (Doha no. 239)

[Note—How could Lord Ram recognise Satanand? The Lord had seen him earlier with Janak when the latter had come to welcome them earlier upon their arrival outside the city. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 214—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 215.

Besides this, Satanand was the royal priest of Janakpur, and obviously he had the naturally majestic aura and demeanours of a man who occupies this exalted stature. His priestly cloak and other paraphernalia distinguished him from rest of the Brahmins of the place.

Not only this, since he was seated close to sage Vishwamitra and the latter had welcomed him and was talking with him proved beyond doubt that the guest was an honoured personality. Therefore he must be shown respect. And so the Lord and his younger brother bowed before Satanand to pay their respects to him.

It will be noticed upon close examination that on the earlier occasion when Lord Ram had seen Satanand in the company of Janak when the latter had arrived to welcome sage Vishwamitra, the Lord and his brother had not bowed before him, but went straight to their Guru, sage Vishwamitra, and sat down near him. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-6 that precede Doha no. 214. But here they came in and first bowed before Satanand and then sat down near their Guru. The reason is that earlier they had not known the head priest as he was accompanying others who came with king Janak. But now in the present instance he was acquainted with him, and therefore it was obligatory to pay respects.]

lakhana kahā jasa bhājanu sō'ī. nātha kṛpā tava jāpara hō'ī. 2.

Let us go and see the marriage ceremony of Sita. Let us see whom Isha (literally the 'Lord'; but traditionally the word is used to mean Lord Shiva as Shiva is the "Lord of the world", and he is also called 'Mahadeva', the 'Great God') bestows the privilege of victory and fame (by breaking the bow and accepting the hands of Sita in marriage).<sup>1</sup> (1)

Laxman said, 'Oh Lord! The person upon whom you (sage Vishwamitra) are pleased would get this privilege and fame of breaking the bow.' (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>After all, this was the very reason why sage Vishwamitra had come to Janakpur. He had told the two brothers after they had protected his fire sacrifice that he wished to take them along to witness the bow-breaking event that Janak was organizing. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 9-10 that precede Doha no. 210.

Now, it was Lord Shiva's bow, and it could be broken only if Shiva wants. So sage Vishwamitra made this observation. Earlier when Lord Ram and Laxman had narrated to the sage the events of the garden and about the Lord developing a soft corner in his heart for Sita, the sage had blessed the two brothers that their wishes would be fulfilled. Now, Laxman is hinting to this blessing. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 237.

Remember: Laxman had himself prophesised the victory of Lord Ram in the bow-breaking competition relying on the blessings of the sage. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 238—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 239. Hence, Laxman is merely reiterating what is destined to happen. Further, he is subtly reminding the Guru about his blessings, and stresses that if he wants than Lord Ram would be victorious.

Laxman was aware of the fact that Vishwamitra was no ordinary sage. He was known to be a ‘Trikaalagya’, one who knows the events of the three phases of time—viz. the past, the present and the future. So, if the sage had blessed them their wishes would be fulfilled upon learning about their experiences in the garden, then it is sure that Lord Ram would marry Sita. And this can happen only if the Lord breaks the bow.

Sage Vishwamitra’s deity was also Lord Shiva, and the sage had prayed to the Lord before blessing the two brothers. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 237. How do we know that Shiva was the deity whom the sage worshipped? Well, all great sages, seers and hermits adore and worship Lord Shiva as their favourite God because Shiva is known as ‘Maha-deva’, the Great God. Besides this fact, a person always invokes his favoured god or goddess when he faces an uncertain future. Sage Vishwamitra has explicitly invoked Lord Shiva in line no. 1 by saying “Isha”, which is one of the many famous names of Lord Shiva. This proves that the deity whom he worshipped was none else but Shiva.]

haraṣē muni saba suni bara bānī. dīnhi asīsa sabahim sukhu mānī. 3.
puni munibṛnda samēta kṛpālā. dēkhana calē dhanuṣamakha sālā. 4.

The entire company of sages (who had accompanied Vishwamitra as well as Satanand) felt very delighted when they heard the prudent, clever and wise words of Laxman, and all of them collectively blessed him (that his words would come true)<sup>1</sup>. (3)

After that, the merciful Lord (Ram) accompanied all the sages and went to the venue of the bow-breaking ceremony to see it (and witness the event)<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Both sage Vishwamitra and priest Satanand occupied a high stature in society. Even today we observe that when some great or renowned seer moves around he is always accompanied by a large number of junior seers. So, Vishwamitra and Satanand were not alone; there must have been many more sages and Brahmins present on the occasion. When they heard what Laxman has said, that “anyone upon whom sage Vishwamitra is pleased would be able to break the bow and marry Sita”, thereby showing the greatest of respect to his Guru sage Vishwamitra, it was natural for them to feel happy and bless Laxman.

We must note how clever Laxman was. Till this moment, the only sage who had blessed the two brothers that their wishes would be fulfilled was sage Vishwamitra. Now all of them have blessed Laxman. What was Laxman’s wish? Obviously it was that his beloved elder brother should break the bow and fulfill his wish of marrying Sita. This is abundantly clear by reading Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 238—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 239 above. Later on we shall read that in the assembly when none of the kings and princes could move the bow and king Janak had expressed his annoyance and dejection, going to the extent of saying that the earth is devoid of strong warriors inspite of being aware that Lord Ram was present in the assembly and had yet not been given a chance to lift the bow, Laxman becomes extremely angry and had sternly rebuked king Janak against the rules of etiquette and without any fear of consequences. At that time Laxman would warn the king that he (Laxman) can turn the earth upside down if Lord Ram permits; how dare Janak could make such a disparaging remark in the presence of Lord Ram. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 251—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 254.}

Then we find a little later that as soon as Lord Ram was instructed by sage Vishwamitra to go and break the bow, Laxman has warned all the legendary supporters of the world, such as Seshnath, the serpent who supports the earth on its hood, the tortoise named Kamath who supports the earth from sinking into the nether world by keeping it lifted on its back, and the Digpals, the custodians of the directions, to get ready as the Lord was about to break the bow and it would create an unprecedented shock that may turn the whole world upside down. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Doha no. 259—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 260.}

So we find that Laxman has played the perfect role of a true friend, a faithful companion and a loving brother who is totally committed to the happiness of his elder sibling.

Here it is said that when the sages and Brahmins heard the “prudent, clever and wise words of Laxman” they collectively blessed him. What was so nice about what Laxman has said? Well, Laxman has praised his Guru sage Vishwamitra, and this is regarded as an excellent character; one should always give his Guru more respect than even the gods. This pleased the sages and they blessed Laxman.

<sup>2</sup>The verse does not say that Lord Ram has gone to ‘see the bow’, but that he went to ‘see the venue of the bow-breaking ceremony’, the “dhanuṣamakha sālā”. [‘dhanuṣa’ = bow; ‘makha’ = a great ceremony on the lines of fire sacrifices; and ‘sālā’ = the venue, the arena.]

Now, what does this mean? It means that the Lord was not charmed by the bow at all as he knew that it was old, rusty and unattractive. On the other hand, the venue was colourfully decorated and a huge number of kings and princes from all corners of the earth had assembled there. It would be an exceptionally fascinating sight to behold, with kings, princes and their attendants sporting unique attires, exhibiting demeanours, languages and faces from various corners of the earth, and accompanying this would be the wonderful spray of myriad colours and cacophony of sounds representing diverse cultures and societies in this world. Like any other young boy of his age, Lord Ram was eager to enjoy this rare opportunity.]

When the citizens of Janakpur heard that the two brothers have come to the arena of the bow ceremony [5], all of them—the children, the adults and the old, the men and the women—abandoned whatever work they were engaged in and rushed to the venue (giggling and babbling excitedly all the way). (6)

[Note—Refer also to Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 68, stanza no. 7; verse nos. 73—80; and verse no. 84, stanza no. 2.

Earlier we have already read how the entire city had poured out into the streets of Janakpur when the two brothers had gone to see the sights. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 220—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 225.}

Now, the same thing is repeated. Note that the citizens have shown no interest to leave their jobs and attend the ceremony till the time they heard that Lord Ram and Laxman have come. They weren't interested in seeing the countless kings and princes; they remained engaged in their routine affairs of life. But as soon as the news spread that the two brothers have arrived at the venue, there was a sudden rush of people to see them so much so that king Janak had to send more volunteers to control the surging crowd and get them seated in an orderly manner. This would be clear in the next line below.

Refer also to Tulsidas' book "Geetawali Ramayan", Baal Kand, verse no. 68, stanza no. 7 that says exactly the same thing that as soon as the citizens heard that the Lord has come to the venue of the bow ceremony, all of them abandoned whatever they were doing and rushed to the arena.]

turata sakala lōganha pahim jāhū. āsana ucita dēhu saba kāhū. 8.

When king Janak found that there was a sudden huge crowd, he called in clever and competent attendants and volunteers (who could manage the crowd wisely) [7] and ordered them—'Go immediately to the people and give all of them proper seats. [8]'. (7-8)

[Note—This endorses the deduction made above that as soon as Lord Ram and Laxman arrived at the arena, virtually the entire city poured in. There was a sudden burst of commotion as everyone jostled with each other to find a vantage seat in the stadium. To control the surging crowd, the king summoned extra hands.

The king had not expected such a huge crowd because in that case he would have planned for it in advance and would have stationed sufficient guards to control the people. This surge of the crowd was so sudden that it was like a flash flood that virtually swamped the entire arena, and overflowed its seating capacity, so much so that every available inch of space was jam-packed by enthusiastic citizens of Janakpur who stood cramped up, elbow-to-elbow, and jostled with each other to watch the once-in-a-lifetime spectacular ceremony of the breaking of the bow that was to unfold before their eyes very soon.]

These attendants and volunteers spoke sweetly, and they politely directed the arriving men and women to take their respective seats keeping into consideration their age and stature in the social hierarchy. (Doha no. 240)

[Note—Usually, the king’s guards are rude to the common man; they push and shove. But king Janak had called in guards who were decent in their behaviour and knew good manners. They politely guided the people to separate enclosures—such as the ones for old, the young, the women, the single men, families, couples, and so on. Then they also took into consideration their social background and financial standing; after all, all were not equal. Then they had to take into view whether the arriving men and women were Brahmins, Kshatriyas, Vaishyas or Sudras, the four distinct sections of tradition-bound society.]

Just at that moment (when the king’s guards were guiding the citizens to their seats) the two princes (Lord Ram and Laxman) arrived at the venue. They were so adorable to look at as if beauty and magnificence had spread themselves like a paste on their handsome bodies. (1)

They were an ocean of virtues, were good mannered and cultured, were wonderful warriors, were handsome to look at, and were of a dark and a fair complexion respectively. (2)

[Note—The dark complexioned prince was Lord Ram, and the fair complexioned one was Laxman.

It ought to be noted here that both of them have same good virtues, are equally wonderful to look at, and are equally handsome, strong and good mannered. This verse is very important in the sense that it, once and for all, removes the doubt in the mind of the reader of this epic story that Lord Ram was more handsome, virtuous, mannered and strong than the rest of the brothers. It is not so, but since Lord Ram is the hero of the story, the narrator, Goswami Tulsidas, has positioned him prominently and has always concentrated on highlighting the Lord’s glories and virtues. But this does not mean that his other brothers, Laxman, Bharat and Shatrughan, lacked in any of these virtues. Being the eldest brother and the hero of the story it is apt to give Lord Ram a special treatment.]

They looked outstanding in the galaxy of kings and princes as if two moons were shining brilliantly in the midst of a huge collection of inconsequential twinkling stars in the night sky. (3)

Everyone in the assembly gazed at the Lord and saw his form according to the conception he or she had of him. (4)

[Note—Once again, both the brothers are compared to the moon, removing all distinctions between them. The only way to distinguish between Lord Ram and Laxman was the colour of their complexion—Lord Ram had a dark complexion and Laxman was fair.

Chaupai line no. 4 has a great spiritual message—it essentially says that all living beings have the right to view and approach the Lord in the way they like, and the Lord welcomes all of them by reciprocating their emotions and giving them rewards or blessings which are in consonance with each individual's conception and view of the Lord.

There were hundreds of people in the assembly, and each saw the Lord differently. For those who were friendly inclined saw a friend in him; those who were jealous saw an invincible competitor; those who were inimical to his presence saw a powerful enemy that instills fear in his opponents. The men and the women saw him as the beloved groom of Sita, their beloved guest and someone most dear to their hearts, the children saw him as their fast friend, and Sita saw in him her refuge and succour, her true love and partner in life.

Devotees saw their revered Lord in the form of Ram, and non-devotees saw a handsome prince who would be the future husband of princess Sita.

It must be remembered at this point that Lord Ram was not an ordinary human being like the rest of the people. He was an incarnate Lord Vishnu, the Supreme Being, who had to come down to earth in a human form to eliminate the demons led by their king Ravana of Lanka. There were other reasons also for Lord Vishnu to become a human being. These are enumerated and narrated in the earlier part of Baal Kand. Hence it was no wonder that the same unchanging form of the Lord could assume various forms to give the visual effect of so many different persons standing there.] purabāsinha dēkhē dō'u bhā'ī. narabhūṣana lōcana sukhadā'ī. 8.

[These four lines describe how different people viewed the same form of Lord Ram differently.]

Those who were valiant, strong, fearless and brave warriors saw that the virtues of bravery, courage, strength, fearlessness, resilience and valiance, which are characteristics of warriors, have assumed a physical form and standing before them (in the form of Lord Ram). (5)

Those kings who were wicked and pervert were scared out of their wits, feeling terrified when they saw the horrifying image of the Lord as if terror and horror have personified themselves (to attack and kill them). (6)

Demons ('Asurs') were also present in the assembly in the disguise of kings. They saw the Lord as a living monster who was none other than 'Kaal', the Death God, personified himself. (7)

And the citizens of Janakpur saw the two brothers as jewels of the human race, as the princes whose mere sight gives comfort and happiness to the eyes (of the beholder). (8)

[Note—So we see how the same image or form of Lord Ram and Laxman were perceived and interpreted differently by different people depending upon their attitude, thoughts, outlook and conception.

Though it is not mentioned here, even the gods had come in the form of human kings and princes—refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 251.]

Meanwhile, the ladies of the city saw the image of Lord Ram in accordance with the conception they had of the Lord in their hearts. For some the Lord was a most attractive and fabulous personified form of cupid who has enamoured, beguiled, captivated and enthralled their hearts. (Doha no. 241)

[Note—The young damsels of the city fell in love by the handsome form of the Lord. This is a natural phenomenon with young girls of impressionable age. In their hearts they all began to harbour love for Lord Ram. It is believed that the Lord fulfilled the wishes of all of them in his next incarnation as Lord Krishna during whose time these ladies had taken birth as the countless Gopis (milk maids) with whom Krishna played around during his childhood days.]

Those who were learned, enlightened and well-versed in the philosophy of metaphysics as envisioned in the scriptures saw the Lord in his ‘Viraat’ form that had many mouths, hands, legs, eyes and heads<sup>1</sup>. (1)

The relatives, the kith and kin of king Janak look at Lord Ram and loved him as if he was a dear member of the family. (2)

Similarly, Videha (king Janak) and his wife, the queen, watched the Lord as if the latter was their young son. With this conception, the intensity of love and affection that developed in them cannot be described in words<sup>2</sup>. (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The word “Viraat” means vast, colossus, infinite and all-encompassing. This form refers to the cosmic manifestation of the Supreme Lord known as Brahm. It encompasses the entire creation; nothing escapes it. It is all-pervading and endless. Since this creation has countless varieties of creatures, from the single-celled to the most complex, and each unit is a form of this Viraat, it follows that Viraat has as many mouths, hands, legs, eyes and heads as there are number and varieties of creatures in this creation. This form of the Lord has no beginning, middle or end; it is infinite and eternal.

The form of the Viraat Purush has been described in the Shwetashwatar Upanishad, Canto 3, verse nos. 14-16 as the form which has “thousands of heads, eyes and legs. Since the Lord is all-pervading and immanent, his hands, legs, eyes, head, mouth and ears are present everywhere. He surrounds everything in the universe from all sides, and is established within each unit of it.” This Upanishad belongs to the Krishna Yajur Veda tradition and is its 5th Upanishad.

The Mundak Upanishad of Atharva Veda, in its Canto 2, section 1, verse nos. 9-10 clearly affirm that it is the Viraat Purush, the macrocosmic all-pervading gross body of the supreme transcendental Brahm, that resides in the body of all living beings as their Atma. To quote—“Verse no. 9 = It is this Viraat Purush that lives in all the living beings as their Atma that resides in their inner self (9).

“Verse no. 10 = A wise and enlightened aspirant who knows that this Brahm is established in the subtle heart of all living beings (as their Atma, their pure conscious self) is able to dismantle all the knots of ignorance in this world. [That is, he attains supreme knowledge of the Truth that is absolute and like nectar.] (10).”

In fact, the entire Mundak (Canto) 2, section 1 of the Mundak Upanishad is devoted to the theme of Viraat Purush, and it says that the entire creation has been created as a manifestation of the Viraat Purush.

The Ram Purva Tapini Upanishad of the Atharva Veda, in its Canto 3, verse no. 2, clearly states the supreme Lord resides in this creation as its Atma and Pran. To quote—“We bow and pay our respects to the supreme Lord (Brahm referred to as Lord Ram here because this particular Upanishad is dedicated to Lord Ram) who lives in this world and uniformly pervades in it as its ‘Atma’ and its ‘Pran’—i.e. as the creation’s soul and life, as its essence, its fundamental basis and its core.”

Now let us quote the Tripadvibhut Maha Narayan Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition that precisely describes the Viraat Purush as follows:—

“Canto 2, paragraph no. 11 = The Viraat Purush, the macrocosmic, all-encompassing and all-pervading form of the Supreme Being, has countless heads, eyes, hands and legs. [This is a symbolic way to highlight the fact that the Viraat is the sum-total of all the gross bodies that live in this creation. The Viraat Purush is a metaphor for the all-inclusive form and all-encompassing nature of the supreme Brahm, as the former represents all living organisms in this creation. According to the theory of Genesis of Creation as outlined in the Upanishads, it is from the Viraat Purush that the whole creation has been moulded; the creation is a manifestation of the Viraat Purush. Since the Viraat is the macrocosmic gross body of Brahm as outlined in the forgoing paragraphs, it follows that the creation moulded out of this Viraat is also a manifestation of the Brahm. Therefore, this creation represents the gross body of Brahm. It is this Viraat Purush who created the creature in his own image. Since there are uncountable forms and varieties of creatures or living beings in this creation, from the single cell organisms to the most complex human, and each individual is an image of the Viraat, it is easy to understand the meaning and import of the statement that the Viraat has thousands of hands, mouths etc. as stated above. Besides this point, another interpretation is that Brahm in the form of the Viraat lives in all the places of this creation at the same time. This is in consonance with the eclectic virtue of Brahm as being omnipresent all-encompassing and all-pervading.]

The Viraat Purush, having countless ears*, surrounds the entire creation from all sides and uniformly pervades in it. He is omnipresent, all-pervading and all-encompassing. [*The phrase ‘having countless ears’ simply means that Brahm, in the form of the Viraat Purush, assumed as many forms as there were creatures who could hear. It also means that Brahm, as the living being’s consciousness, heard or became aware of everything that was happening in this creation. It is a metaphoric way of saying that a wise man who knows the truth of Brahm is also one who is well aware of everything in this creation; nothing is hidden from his knowledge; he is wise, erudite, knowledgeable, enlightened, omniscient and all-knowing. He receives all information and knowledge, but then picks and chooses what is auspicious and righteous. He is not ‘deaf’ to the teaching of the scriptures. It ought to be noted here that the creature, the living being, especially the human being, is said to be replica of the Viraat Purush. Refer Aiteriya Upanishad of the Rig Veda, Canto 1, Section 2, verse no. 3. ]

He (the Viraat Purush) is both Saguna and Nirguna. [That is, the Lord has revealed himself in numerous forms, thereby becoming ‘Saguna’—or the one with discernible characteristics, definable attributes and specific qualities. At the same time, the Lord has no visible form as his primary nature is formless and without attributes—i.e. he is ‘Nirguna’. This concept has been elaborately described earlier in paragraphs 2-8 of this present Canto 2.]

He (the Viraat Purush) is a personification of the grand virtues of Gyan (knowledge, wisdom, erudition and enlightenment), Bal (strength, valour, vitality and potent), Aishwarya (fame, majesty, grandeur, magnificence, glory), Shakti (power, dynamism, energy, punch and vitality), and Tej (splendour, radiance, glory, energy, magnificence, dynamism, agility and speed).

He (the Viraat Purush) is established in the form of innumerable worlds of diverse varieties and forms.

It is he (the Viraat Purush) who is the supreme Lord of creation known as the Parmatma, the supreme Atma or soul of creation. He is an embodiment of eternal and unbound bliss, as well as is endowed with all the noble and auspicious virtues and glories that exist in this creation.

He (the Viraat Purush) is absolutely independent (because he is supreme and not subservient to anything). He is all-knowing and omniscient. He is almighty and all-powerful. He is the ultimate controller of everything in existence. And he is an image of all the most auspicious virtues that ensure all-round well being in this creation.

He (the Viraat Purush) is established in the form of a majestic fount of immense 'Tej' (splendour, radiance, glory, energy, magnificence, dynamism etc.) that cannot be described, is endless, and is most divine.

This Supreme Being having the above grand and magnificent virtues pervades throughout the cosmic Anda created from the Avyakta due to Avidya (as narrated in paragraph no. 9). This Anda or the cosmic egg is the basis of Maha-Maya that has surrounded the Supreme Being (i.e. it is the basis of creation of the great delusion because it is in this form of the cosmic egg that the Supreme Being had allowed himself to assume a form which is not in consonance with his primary nature of being formless).

[As is clear by now, the Supreme Being that is referred to here is the cosmic Consciousness that infuses life in the cosmic egg. The egg has been literally 'fertilised' by Brahm, the Supreme Being, who has passed on to it his 'genes' in the form of 'consciousness' possessing all the virtues enumerated herein above. Therefore, these virtues of Brahm would naturally be passed on to the 'embryo' that developed in this egg, and the subsequent 'creation' that would emerge from this cosmic egg upon its maturity. It follows that this is the evident proof why Brahma known as Hiranyagarbha representing the 'embryo', and Vishnu known as the Viraat Purush representing the 'creation' would be an image or a 'gene-bearer' of Brahm, the Supreme Being. Now, once the 'formless' (or Nirguna and Avyakta) Brahm assumes the 'formed' shape of an egg (becomes Saguna and Vyakta) he is bound to be affected by the characteristics of something that has a 'form', something that is 'Saguna' (one that has various Gunas or qualities) and 'Vyakta' (expressed, revealed). In other words, the Brahm which was without any Maya (delusions) prior to the entire process of creation rolling out has now become surrounded by it, or tainted and affected by it.] Therefore, the 'Maha-Maya' is the gross body created out of delusions of the almighty Lord God known as Brahm who is naturally and inherently almighty, all-powerful, universal, uniform, non-dual, and an embodiment of un-bound bliss and beatitude.

It is in each pore of the macrocosmic form of Brahm known as the Viraat Purush that numerous universes or worlds and their gross things are born or created. Each one of them is a revelation of the same Lord Narayan; they are images of the same Brahm. [It is because, as has been explained above, they carry the genes of their parent known as Brahm. In this context, refer to Canto 3, paragraph nos. 11-12 which will make it clear that the 'Viraat Purush' meant here is not the one which is regarded as being synonymous with Vishnu, but is the ‘Adi-Viraat Purush’ that precedes Vishnu and from whom even Vishnu, the commonly known form of Viraat, was created. This creation has been visualised as being in different layers like many concentric circles, one higher than its previous one. This concept will be discussed in Canto 6.] (11).”

Tulsidas himself has described the concept of the “Viraat Purush” on many occasions in this epic ‘Ram Charit Manas’ at the following places:--

(i) Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 54—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 55 where Parvati, the consort of Lord Shiva, has seen the Virrat form of Lord Ram; (ii) Baal Kand, from Doha no. 201—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 202 where Kaushalya, the mother of Lord Ram, has seen the Virrat form of the Lord; (iii) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 242 where the wise kings allude to this Viraat form of the Lord while advising pervert kings to desist from attempting to break the bow and marrying Sita as it would be a futile exercise; (iv) Lanka Kand, from Doha no. 14—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 15 where Mandadori, the wife of Ravana, the demon king, has tried to persuade her belligerent husband not to fight Lord Ram as he is not an ordinary human being but the Virrat form himself in the form of Lord Ram; and (v) Uttar Kand, from Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 81—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 81 where Kaagbhusund, the saintly crow, has seen the Virrat form of Lord Ram.

<sup>2</sup>These two lines, verse nos. 2-3, describe how the king, the queen and the rest of the royal family looked at Lord Ram and Laxman, the emotions and sentiments that developed in their minds and hearts.

King Janak had a large family. His father Hriswaraam had three queens. Their names were Shubhaa, Sadaa and Sarwadaa. Shubhaa had two sons—Shirdhwaj and Kushdhwaj; Sadaa had four sons—Shatrujeet, Yash-shaali, Arimardan and Riputaapan; and Sarwadaa had four sons—Mahi-mangal, Balaakar, Tejastha and Mahaa-virya. {Total 10 sons.}

The eldest queen’s sons, i.e. Shirdhwaj and Kushdhwaj, had two daughters each. They were Sita and Urmila who were the daughters of the king, Shirdhwaj, and Maandavi and Srutikirti were the daughters of his younger brother Kushdhwaj. Sita was married to Lord Ram, Urmila to Laxman, Maandavi to Bharat, and Srutikirti to Shatrughan.

Shirdhwaj’s other step brothers had one daughter each. All of them accompanied Sita to Ayodhya, her in-law’s place, as her companions.

Hence, the entire family of king Janak perceived Lord Ram and Laxman as a close member of their family.

It is essential to note here that the word “Janak” or “Videha” is a title or surname assigned to the kings of the kingdom of Nimi dynasty, and not the name of an individual.]

जोगिन्ह परम तत्वमय भासा । सांत सुद्ध सम सहज प्रकासा ॥ ४ ॥ haribhagatanha dēkhē dō'u bhrātā. iṣṭadēva iva saba sukha dātā. 5.

Ascetics perceived the Lord as a personified form of the supreme Tattwa (the fundamental Truth and Reality of existence; the Supreme Consciousness). They found the form of the Lord as being an image of peace, tranquility and serenity, an image that was pure and uncorrupt, an image that represented equality and equanimity, an image that was simple, unpretentious and divine, and an image that was self-illuminated, splendid and radiant<sup>1</sup>. (4)

Those who were devotees of Hari (Lord Vishnu) could see the two brothers as a personified form of their revered deity, i.e. Lord Hari, who bestows all imaginable bliss, joy and happiness to his devotees<sup>2</sup>. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Since ascetics focus on doing meditation and realizing the truth of the Atma, the pure conscious 'self' that is an image of the supreme Self or cosmic Consciousness that is at the foundation of the entire living world, which is therefore the only and absolute Truth and Reality in this creation, when they watched Lord Ram they could see this essential Truth standing before them in a personified form. In other words, just like the learned and enlightened persons could observe the Viraat Purush in the form of Lord Ram, ascetics could see the supreme Self or the cosmic Consciousness in a personified form in the person of Lord Ram.

This is obviously true because Lord Ram was indeed an incarnation of Lord Vishnu.]

ēhi bidhi rahā jāhi jasa bhā'ū. tēhim tasa dēkhē'u kōsalarā'ū. 8.

The way Sita perceived Lord Ram, and the intensity of bliss and joy that she derived from this was so mysterious, immense and intense that they cannot be described. (6)

She could feel this emotion heaving inside her heart, she could experience the bliss, the happiness, the ecstasy and the thrill that it created within her bosom, but even she could not express it in words (or would be unable to do it even if she had wanted). Then say, how can another person, such as a poet, ever be able to narrate or describe it<sup>1</sup>? (7)

On this wise, every individual saw the Lord of Kaushal (Lord Ram) in different ways in accordance to his likings, preferences, conceptions, sentiments and emotions<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It ought to be noted that none of the observers had expressed their emotions and sentiments vocally. All of them just sat and enjoyed the sight in accordance to the conception they had in their hearts and minds about Lord Ram and Laxman. All of them felt exceedingly delighted and exhilarated.

However, those who were jealous and inimical to the presence of the two brothers were terrified out of their wits at their sight (refer: Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 241). Their faces lost radiance, they all felt despaired, and their heads drooped in dejection.

The greatest happiness was that of Sita's; it is obvious. When she left the garden after enshrining Lord Ram in her temple-like heart and closing its doors shut to keep the Lord's image permanently established close to her bosom (refer: Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 232; and Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 234), she had no way to be sure that she will ever see her beloved Lord again in life. Well, she could not be sure for certain that sage Vishwamitra would bring them to the arena. It could be that the sage would come when her father invited him, but there were chances that he could order the two brothers to stay back at the place where they were lodged, or send them on some errand, or the brothers themselves would want to see more of the city of Janakpur and would go out wandering around while the 'bow rituals' were underway as they might have no interest in this mega-circus!

Therefore, when Sita saw the two brothers once again it is natural that she would feel delighted. The chances of Lord Ram breaking the bow and marrying her brightened when she saw the great sage Vishwamitra, whose mere presence was awe-inspiring and majestic, sitting in the middle of the two brothers on a special seat meant for them. Then she guessed that like the other invited kings and princes who would try to lift the bow, Lord Ram would also be given a chance. With the mighty sage Vishwamitra personally present to bless Lord Ram, the chances of the Lord winning over others were extremely bright. This thought cheered Sita's heart no end.

<sup>2</sup>The realm of the kingdom of Ayodhya was also known as "Kaushal". This verse sums up the subject introduced in Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 241.]

Thus were present the two wonderful princes of the king of Kaushal ('kōsalarāja kisōra'; king Dasrath's sons Lord Ram and Laxman) in the middle of the grand assembly of kings and princes.

They were beautiful to behold—being handsome, having a dark and fair complexion respectively, and being so attractive that they stole the attention of the world in the sense that when anyone saw them his eyes become riveted to their magnificent forms. (Doha no. 242)

[Note—This idea is expressed elsewhere also. For instance: (i) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 241 says “the two brothers had beautiful dark and fair complexioned body”; (ii) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 244 says “the people felt very blissful and happy upon seeing them so much so that gazed at them fixedly, and their eyes refused to move away even if they wanted to”; and (iii) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 215 says “the dark and fair complexioned princes were of a tender age and sweet to look at; they provided comfort to the eyes (or their sight soothed the eyes) and were so attractive that they virtually stole the attention of the world which had its eyes fixed on them”.]

चौ०. सहज मनोहर मूरति दोऊ । कोटि काम उपमा लघु सोऊ ॥ १ ॥

सरद चंद निंदक मुख नीके । नीरज नयन भावते जी के ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

sahaja manōhara mūrati dō'ū. kōṭi kāma upamā laghu sō'ū. 1.

sarada canda nindaka mukha nīkē. nīraja nayana bhāvatē jī kē. 2.

The two enchanting images (of Lord Ram and Laxman) were inherently, intrinsically and naturally beautiful, charming and magnificent (without any artificiality or pretentiousness with them). Even numerous Kamdeos (cupids) would fade in attractiveness and glamour when compared to them<sup>1</sup>. (1)

The beauty and charm of their faces put to shame the glory of the full moon during the winter night (when the moon is supposed to look most glamorous and wonderful). Their lotus-like eyes were pleasing for the heart. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It is a constant refrain in classical literature to compare somebody exceptionally beautiful and attractive to ‘Kamdeo (cupid)’ as he is the patron god of beauty, attraction, love and passion. He is supposed to be the most handsome, charming and attractive god in physical terms.

Another such metaphor universally used for beauty and charm is the ‘moon’. The ‘sun’ is used for radiance and splendour, the ‘lotus’ for purity, and the ‘swan’ for wisdom as well as purity. More such metaphors and similes are cited in the verses that follow below.

So, essentially this verse means that the charm, beauty and attractiveness of the two brothers were incomparable in the entire creation.

In Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 68, stanza no. 10, the same idea is expressed when it says “the creator had mixed together the virtues of beauty, good manners and affection, and out of this mixture he had created or crafted the fabulous image of Lord Ram and Laxman; many millions of Kamdeos and Moons have been offered to their images so that the essential qualities of the former are transferred to the latter”.]

चितवनि चारु मार मनु हरनी । भावति हृदय जाति नहिं बरनी ॥ ३ ॥

कल कपोल श्रुति कुंडल लोला । चिबुक अधर सुंदर मृदु बोला ॥ ४ ॥

citavani cāru māra manu haranī. bhāvati hdaya jāti nahim baranī. 3.
kala kapōla śruti kuṇḍala lōlā. cibuka adhara sundara mṛḍu bōlā. 4.

Their glances were so bewitching and captivating that they enthralled the Mana (mind and heart) of even Kamdeo (cupid) (so what to talk of ordinary humans). Their glances and their general charm pleased one's heart, but it is not possible to describe how and how much<sup>1</sup>. (3)

Their cheeks were beautiful too. The ear-rings or pendants that adorned their ears swung majestically (when they move their heads). Their chins were charming, their lips were glamorous, and their voices were very sweet (i.e. when they chatted, they spoke pleasantly and sweetly). (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Since Kamdeo (cupid) is the most handsome god in creation, he finds no attractiveness in any other god or human; he treats all living beings as being inferior to him as far as the virtues of beauty, charm, attractiveness, glamour and other physical attributes are concerned. But when he sees the two brothers, Lord Ram and Laxman, he is transfixed by wonder at their magnificence and charm.

This means that the sight of the two brothers is so compelling that even the patron god of beauty and charm is dumbfounded, beguiled and enchanted by it. If this is the condition of Kamdeo, one can easily understand that ordinary mortals would be simply mesmerized by this sight that was beyond the purview of being described in words, and was so magnificent that words such as 'beauty, loveliness, prettiness' etc. do not do justice to its excellence and fineness and majesty. When the eyes of the two brothers and Kamdeo meet, the latter is mesmerised into a trance; he can't move his eyes away for from Lord Ram and Laxman because in all sooth he hasn't, in all his living days, seen such a fabulous and enchanting sight of exceeding magnificence and beauty in this creation, and he marvels at it, being wonderstruck!]

कुमुदबंधु कर निंदक हाँसा । भृकुटी बिकट मनोहर नासा ॥ ५ ॥
भाल बिसाल तिलक झलकाहीं । कच बिलोकि अलि अवलि लजाहीं ॥ ६ ॥ kumudabandhu kara nindaka hāmśā. bhr̥kuṭī bikaṭa manōhara nāsā. 5.

bhāla bisāla tilaka jhalakāhīm. kaca bilōki ali avalī lajāhīm. 6.

Their laughter and smile were so attractive that it put to shame and ridiculed the light of the moon (known as 'Kumud-Bandhu', the friend of the lily, because the latter blooms as soon as the moon rises)<sup>1</sup>. Their eyebrows were perfectly curved in an arch, and their noses were equally crafted in an expert manner. (5)

The 'Tilak Mark' (which is a mark on the forehead made by all of noble birth) on their broad foreheads were visible amid big locks of hairs that dangled from their heads. These locks of hairs were so attractive that they would put to shame a swarm of black bees<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The moonlight is deemed to create an environment of happiness and joy which leads to people feeling exhilarated and rejuvenated. The weariness of the day is replaced with cheer and energy. Young couples laugh and enjoy themselves in the soothing and inspiring light of the moon. But the smile and laughter of Lord Ram and Laxman creates an atmosphere of cheer and joy that far surpasses the charm created by the moon's light. The moon feels ashamed and ridiculous when its glories and virtues are compared to those of the two brothers.

The moon's pride of being a harbinger of cheer, happiness and joy is nullified and trounced when it is compared to the same virtues exhibited by Lord Ram and Laxman.

<sup>2</sup>The two brothers had thick and large lock of black hairs which were plaited, and these tresses were carefully combed to make their faces look exceptionally beautiful. The sight resembled the moon's face when thick dark clouds hover just above it!

The Tilak mark consists of three horizontal lines marked on the forehead just above the root of the nose. So it looked as if the Tilak was a pillar that supported the meticulously carved and artistically arranged roof of hairs on their faces. Whenever they shook their heads or turned in any direction, the hairs parted from the center, revealing this fabulous Tilak mark.

The darkness and the density of the hair are compared to a swarm of black bees. These bees are very proud of their handsome black bodies, but when these bees are compared to the brothers' hairs, they fade in beauty and attractiveness.]

पीत चौतनीं सिरन्हि सुहाई । कुसुम कलीं बिच बीच बनाई ॥ ७ ॥
रेखें रुचिर कंबु कल गीवाँ । जनु त्रिभुवन सुषमा की सीवाँ ॥ ८ ॥ pīta cautanīm siranhi suhā'īm. kusuma kalīm bica bīca banā'īm. 7.

rēkhēm rucira kambu kala gīvām. janu tribhuvana suṣamā kī sīvām. 8.

Yellow-coloured elegant caps (or turbans) of rectangular shape (pīta cautanīm)<sup>1</sup>, on which were embroidered wonderful patterns resembling flower-buds, adorned their heads. (7)

Their necks were well-built, smooth and well-shaped in contour like a conch-shell, and they also exhibited three semi-circular lines on the surface of the skin (like the lines marked on a conch-shell at its upper end). These lines symbolized the three worlds and stood as epitomes of beauty of these worlds<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A 'turban' looks more dignified and majestic on a prince or king's head than the humble 'cap'. Though it is not certain what the two brothers wore at the time, but in all probability it was a 'cap' rather than a 'turban' because it is said in this verse that the head gear was 'rectangular', and a turban is always wound around the head manually so that it takes up the circular shape of the head.

<sup>2</sup>The neck is that part of the body that contains the vocal cords through which a wind passes and makes a sound that enables a person to make himself heard, loud and clear. It is likened to the conch because of this reason, for the conch also makes a loud sound when air is blown in it.

The neck had three fine folds in the skin resembling three lines present in the upper end of a conch-shell. Since these lines were parallel and one above the other, they resembled the three worlds—viz. the lower nether world, the middle terrestrial world, and the upper heavenly world. These three worlds are known as ‘Tribhuvan’.

But all these worlds have some ugly aspect in them as well. So here it is said that this comparison with the three worlds does not mean that the three lines made the neck of the two brothers look ugly in any sense. Rather, they represented all the beautiful and wonderful aspects of this creation.

We can also refer to the beautiful and most enchanting image of Lord Ram, who was a manifestation of the Supreme Being, as has been described elsewhere in Ram Charit Manas—viz. (a) Baal Kand, (i) Doha no. 146—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 148 (when the Lord appeared before Manu and Satrupa to bless them); (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1-10 that precede Doha no. 327 (Lord Ram as a groom during the wedding ceremony); and (b) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 76—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 77 (the divine form of the Lord that the saintly crow Kaagbhusund saw).]

#A band made of ‘Gajmukta’ (“the elephant’s gem”, ‘kuṇjara mani’) adorned their necks<sup>1</sup>.

Garlands of leaves of the Tulsi (Basil) plant adorned their chests.

Their shoulders were (muscular, rounded, high and broad) like the hump on the back of a healthy bull.

And the way they stood up and gestured resembled the majestic demeanours of a lion (the unquestionable ‘king of the forest’). (Doha no. 243)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The word “kuṇjara” means an elephant, and “mani” means a gem. The phrase refers to pearl-like dried globules of sap effusing from the head of mature elephants, and it is so extremely rare that great kings used them as gems that were embedded in the ornaments they wore just like priceless pearls and other precious jewels.

#Tulsidas’ book “Janki Mangal” that is exclusively dedicated to the divine marriage of Lord Ram and Sita describes the Lord’s glamour and magnificent sight in its verse nos. 49-54.

After describing the sublime beauty of the two brothers, now other attributes are being enumerated to remove any doubt that with such manicured bodies the two princes had delicate, fragile and weak frames. Of course they were beautiful and handsome, but that does not mean that they had weak bodies. Hence, their bodies are compared to that of a healthy bull and a lion, both of whom are very muscular and strong.]

They had the Pitambar<sup>1</sup> wrapped around their waists and quivers tied securely above it. They held arrows in their hands, and bows were slung across their left shoulders. (1)

Yellow-coloured<sup>2</sup> sacred threads, known as the 'Yagyopavit', adorned their abdomen (because this thread is slung diagonally across the abdomen, going around the left shoulder).

In short, the two princes were exceedingly charming and looked fabulous from foot (or the 'toe nail' = 'Nakha') to head ('Sikh' = top of the skull) as if they were embodiments of the virtue of great beauty and magnificence. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A 'Pitambar' is a length of seamless yellow silk cloth worn around the waist and wrapped around the two legs. It is a standard attire of Lord Vishnu.

<sup>2</sup>The colour 'yellow' is a favourite with warriors and royalty. This is why this colour has been chosen for the cloth worn by the two brothers as well as for the sacred thread. Though the Pitambar is usually yellow, but other colours such as white are also used under normal circumstances. On the other hand, the sacred is usually white, but yellow coloured thread is preferred on auspicious occasions such a marriage and other religious ceremonies.]

Watching this magnificent sight of the two brothers, all those present on the occasion felt very delighted and happy. The people gazed at the brothers un-blinkingly, the pupils of their eyes riveted un-movingly on the latter<sup>1</sup>. (3)
